And from this thing that is as simple as 'good day', it seems that people have not drawn the consequences which are nevertheless visible there, which is that every tongue that uses something that can be taken as figures, and that are called something or other, pictograms, ideograms, it is unbelievable, this ended up with absolutely mad consequences. There are people who imagined that with logic, namely the manipulation of writing, one would find the means for what? "New ideas", de nouvelles idées. As if we didn't have enough of them already. Whatever it may be, this pictogram, (88) this ideogram, if we study a writing, it is only because of this, there is no exception, it is because of the fact because it seems to represent, it is pronounced like that. Because of the fact that it seems to represent your mammy with two teats, it is pronounced wu. And after that, you can make whatever you want of it. Everything that is then pronounced wu, what the hell does it matter, whether there are two teats and that it represents your mammy? There is someone called, I no longer know what, Fu-hsien, that does not date from today or yesterday, you understand, you will find that more or less at the beginning of the Christian era, it is called the Chouo-wen, namely, precisely, what is said qua written. Because wen, is 'written', huh? There you are, try to write it all the same, because for the Chinese it is the sign of civilisation. And what is more it is true. So then, representation of a word, means something, it means that the word is already there before you make the written representation of it, with everything that it involves. What it involves, is that the gentleman from Chouo-wen had already discovered, at the beginning of our era, that one of the most essential sources of writing, is what is wu (wu)

wen (wen)

http://www.lacaninireland.com

called, what he believes he has to call, because he still has prejudices the little darling, he imagines that there are written signs that resemble the thing that the word designates. I need room to write that, for example. That's it isn't it? What is it? It's a man. Ah! the people who knew that! They have been taught things! It is obvious that this for you is a man. What is represented? What I mean is how is it the image of a man? There is the head and the legs. I completely agree! And why not? There are dreamers. For my part what I see there is rather an inner leg...why not?

There is something funny, huh? The fact is all the same that we have signs since the yin. The yin, there is some little time, huh, this has lasted at least 2000 years, but before? And we still have these signs. (89) Which proves that all the same they knew something about writing. They are found on tortoise shells, there were people, fortune-tellers, people like us, who scribbled that, like that, alongside other things that were put on the tortoise shell, in order to give a commentary on it in writing. This probably created a greater effect than you believe. Anyway what matter. But there is something in effect that vaguely resembles – I do not know why I am telling you this, I am telling you this because I am letting myself be drawn along, I still have things to tell you, I am allowing myself to be drawn along all the same; anyway, too bad! It's done. Good – so then there is something that you see like that, that is good enough, right? Ah, it's pretty! Good, we will follow it because as you know writing, does not let go from one day to the next, if you are depending on the audio-visual, you can stick around, right! You will still have writing for a while because I tell you that it is the support of science, science is going to abandon its support like that. It is all the same in these little scribblings that your fate is going to be played out, just as at the time of the yin, the little scribblings that these guys did in their little corners, guys like me, and there are a lot of them. So then you follow me, you follow me epoch by epoch, you go down to the Tchou, to the Tchou, right, and after that, you have the Tsin, right, the epoch when

jen (ren)

yin

jen (ren)

i de i wei

http://www.lacaninireland.com

they burned the books. He was someone. He had the books burned. This Tsin had understood things, he was an emperor, it did not last twenty years. Right away writing started up again, and all the more painstakingly, anyway I will spare you the different forms of Chinese writing because the essential relationship of the writing with what was used to inscribe it, the quill, is absolutely superb. Anyway, I do not want to anticipate what this gives us as regards the value of the instrument, the quill. Well, you follow that, right, and then after a while, what do you find? You do not find at all what you are expecting, the dear little darling, here, which is called the jen. I am pronouncing it right or I am pronouncing it wrong, in any case I did not put in the tone, I apologise if there is a Chinese here, they are very sensitive to that, the tone, this is even what proves the...one of the ways of proving the primacy of the word, it is that in the four contemporary present ways, huh, this does not mean that in the Chinese world, the four usual ways of saying – precisely, this comes (90) at the right moment – of saying i, well that means four things at once, and which are not at all unrelated. Anyway I am going to let myself be carried along, perhaps I will tell you, I will often take it into account, when I have carefully practised the four pronunciations of yi, there is i, i, there is i, there you are. And this has not at all the same meaning, but I have learned from a very learned man that this has its place in linguistic consciousness. I mean that the tone itself, and that is why it is necessary to look at this more than once, before talking about arbitrariness, that the tone itself – can you hear me, Jenny? – that the tone itself has for them an indicative substantial value, and why reject that, when there is a tongue much more within our reach, English, whose modulatory effects are obviously quite seductive.

Naturally of course, it would be completely exaggerated to say that it has a relationship with the meaning, only for that you have to give to the word meaning a weight that it does not have. Because the miracle, the marvel of something that proves that from language,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

there is something to be made. I mean the witticism; that depends precisely on non-sense. Because anyway, if one refers to some other writings which have been published (poubelliqueés), one might have said to oneself that it is all the same not for nothing that I wrote The agency of the letter in the unconscious. I did not say the agency of the signifier, this dear Lacanian signifier, that people say, that people say, that people say, when people mean that I wrongly stole it from Saussure. Yes! The fact that the dream is a rebus, as Freud says, is naturally not something that will make me yield for a single instant on the fact that the unconscious is structured like a language, only it is a language in the midst of which there appeared its writing. That does not mean, of course, that one should put the slightest faith - and when indeed would we do so - in these figures that stroll around in dreams, once we know that they are representations of words. Because it is a rebus, it can be translated, überträgt, into what Freud calls thoughts. The thoughts, die Gedanken, of the unconscious.

And what is meant by the fact, what is meant by the fact that a lapse, a blunder, a mistake in some psychopathology of everyday life, no but what can that mean that you call at least three times in the same five minutes...I do not know why I am saying this to you, because it is not all the same an example in which I am revealing one of my patients, but anyway, in effect, not long ago, one of my patients, for five minutes, and every time correcting himself and laughing, but he (91) was not particularly worried about it, right, called his mother "my wife". "It is not my wife, because my wife...." etc and he went on for five minutes, he repeated it at least 20 times. But what is missing in this word, when what I am killing myself telling you, is that it is really a successful word, all the same! And it was like that because his mother was his wife! He called her what he should have called her. So then there is only a lapse with respect to what? With respect to what the authors of archiécriture, the writing that is in the world from all time prefigures the word. A funny exercise, right? I don't mind ...it is a function of the university discourse, to confuse things like that. So then everyone fulfils his function, so I also do mine, it also has its effects ... so then we are going to have a new figure of progress which is the coming into the world, the emergence, it is a substitute given to this idea of evolution which ends up as you know, at the top of the animal scale, with this conscience that characterises us, thanks to which we shine with a brilliance that you know all about. So then, it appears in the world of programming, I will only take up this remark, in effect, that there would be no conceivable programming without writing, in order to remark from another angle that the symptom, lapse, faulty action, psychopathology of every day life, does not have, cannot be sustained, has no meaning, unless you start from the idea that what you have to say is programmed, namely, written. Naturally if he writes "my wife" instead of "my mother", there is no doubt that it is a lapse, but there is no lapse except calami, even when it is a lapsus linguae. Because the tongue for its part, knows very well what it has to do. It is a little phallus that tickles nice and gently. When it has something to say, well then, it says it. There was already someone called Aesop who said that it was at once the best and the worst. That means many things.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

In any case, you can believe me if you wish, given the state of weariness in which you certainly find me, after having tackled these things on writing, from one end to the other, right, because I do that, right? I believe myself obliged to do it, the only thing that I have never dealt with, is the superego. I believe myself obliged to read this stuff from one end to the other. That's how things are! To be sure, to be sure of the things that are affirmed or demonstrated by my experience of everyday life, but anyway all the same, I respect learned people. There are some perhaps who might well have unearthed something here, which might go against, and in effect why not, an experience that is so limited, so narrow, so short, limited to an (92) analytic consulting room, when all is said and done, there is perhaps all the same a certain need to know. Anyway, all that, I must say, I cannot impose on anyone, but on the whole, it is not appreciated.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

There is something else, The debate on writing and hieroglyphs in the 17th and 18th Century. I hope you are going to rush. But you would perhaps not find it because for my part, I had to order it from a library, the general library of the Ecole pratique des Hautes Etudes, 6th section, and I see the indication S.E.V.P.E.N., so that this must be some sort of publishing organisation, 13 rue du Four, Paris, if, it exists. Well then! This work by Madeleine David – you should all the same from time to time take the trouble to read something, you could read that, anyway let us go on – because for what I am going to end up by telling you, what I am going to end up telling you, that writing, this is where we will remain for today, that writing in short is something which is found, because of being this representation of the word on which, as you clearly see, I did not insist, representation, that also signifies repercussion, because it is not at all sure that without writing there would be words. It is perhaps the representation as such that makes these words.

When you have tinkered a little with a tongue like the one that I am in the process of learning here, and in effect I am not after all sure that in this case it is an effect of the superego, the Japanese tongue, well then, you will notice then the degree to which a writing can work upon a tongue. And as it is constructed, this melodious tongue, which is a marvel of subtlety and ingenuity, when I think that it is a tongue in which the adjectives are conjugated, and that I had to wait to be my age to have that at my disposition, I really do not know what I was doing up to now. For my part I aspired to nothing but that, that adjectives could be conjugated. And a tongue in which the inflections had this absolutely marvellous quality that they go off on their own. What is called the moneme, here, in the middle, is something you can change. You give it a Chinese pronunciation, quite different to a Japanese pronunciation, so that, when you are in the presence of a Chinese character, you have, if you are initiated, but naturally only the naturals know it, when you pronounce it oniomo or kuniomi depending on the case, which are always very precise, and for the chap who arrives there, like me, there is no question of knowing which of the two must be chosen; furthermore, you can have two Chinese characters. If you pronounce them kuniomi, namely, the (93) Japanese way, you are absolutely incapable of saying to which of these Chinese characters the first syllable of what you are saying belongs, and to which the second belongs, the one in the middle, of course, still less. It is the totality of the two Chinese characters that dictates to you the Japanese pronunciation in several syllables, that can be perfectly well understood, a pronunciation that corresponds to the two characters at once, because you must not imagine, on the pretext that a Chinese character corresponds in principle to a syllable, that when you pronounce it in the Chinese way, oniomi, if you read it in the Japanese way, one does not see in effect why one should be obliged to decompose this representation of words into syllables. Anyway, that teaches you a lot. That teaches you a lot about the fact that the Japanese tongue is nourished by its writing. How is it nourished by it? In a linguistic way of course, namely, at the point at which linguistics affects the tongue, namely, always in writing.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Because you have to admit naturally, that something that leaps to the eye, is that if M de Saussure found himself relatively in a position to qualify signifiers as arbitrary, it is uniquely by reason of the fact that what is at stake were written representations. How could he have done his little bar with this thing underneath and these things above, that I have sufficiently used and abused, if there were no writing? All of this to remind you that, when I say that there is no metalanguage, this leaps to the eye. It would be enough for me to give you a mathematical proof, you would see that I am forced to talk about it because it is something written, otherwise nothing would get across. If I speak about it, it is not at all metalanguage, it is what is called, what the mathematicians themselves, when they present a logical theory, call discourse, the common discourse the ordinary discourse. It is the function of the word, in so far as it is applied, not in an altogether unlimited, undisciplined way, this is what I earlier called "to prove", of course, but language, this is what is at stake, writing is what is at stake, what one is speaking about. There is no metalanguage in this sense that you never speak about language unless you start from writing.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then, I am telling you all of this, all of this, I must say that this does not weary me, if you wish, it wearies me a little bit all the same. You can believe me if you wish, what I said to myself this morning, as I woke up, having read Madeline David until one o'clock, I said to myself that all the same it was not for nothing that my Ecrits began (94) with the seminar on the Purloined Letter. The letter is taken there in a different sense than that of The agency of the letter in the unconscious, the letter, the epistle. I am not very fresh, I went to bed late, after midnight; anyway, Gloria will bear witness to you that I spent from eight o'clock to half past nine re-reading the seminar on the Purloined Letter. It was worth the trouble, it is something that is quite clever. I never re-read myself but when I do re-read myself, you cannot imagine how much I admire myself! Obviously I had taken the trouble, I did something that was worked out with great difficulty, which was not too bad, which got across, which got across, when I did it, I no longer know at what date, it was still in front of the rabble at Sainte-Anne. Anyway I laboured at that in a place that I put at the end, I am conscientious, San Casciano, in the neighbourhood of Florence, and it really spoiled my holiday. Anyway, you know I have a tendency for that, for spoiling my holidays. Listen, it is getting late, and after all, I think it would be better for me to talk to you about it the next time.

But anyway, perhaps, who knows, that may tempt you to read it, and after all, it would be better not to tell you where you should go right away, I am going to tell you all the same, because, there are some people who may not notice, that at the end, in speaking about the Purloined Letter, when I speak about that, the function of the letter, you will remember perhaps, this letter that the Queen receives, you have perhaps read the story by Poe that is in question, the Queen receives..., it is a rather funny letter all the same. We will never know what was in it. This is precisely what is essential, it is that one will never know what is in it. And all the same nothing contradicts the fact that she is the only one who knows it when all is said and done. Moreover, to set the police on it, you understand, it is all the same necessary, she clearly has the idea that in any case, this would give no information to anyone. There is something, which is that it is certain that it has a meaning. And since it comes from a certain Duke of something or other who has addressed himself to her, if the King her good Master, gets his hands on it, even if he understands nothing either, he will say: "All the same! There is something funny going on!" and God knows where that might lead. I regret the old business that this led to in the past. It led the Queen to the scaffold, things like that. Good! So then at this point, at this point, I cannot do for you the thing I did on what Poe did, under the title the Purloined Letter, that I translated like that, approximately, la lettre en souffrance. Well then, read that between now and the next time, right? Because that will perhaps allow me to continue to bring out, to support you, what you see converging in my discourse today, from page 31 of the Ecrits (95) to the end.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

What I am talking about, in speaking about what is at stake, you have perhaps vaguely heard talk of the effect of the displacements of this letter, of the way it changed hands, as you know, the minister pinched it from the Queen, after which Dupin, Dupin, Poe's genius, right, the most cunning of the cunning, who is not as cunning as all that; but Poe for his part is cunning, namely, that Poe for his part is the narrator of the story...I put a little question to you, here I am opening a parenthesis, the narrator of the story, this is of general importance, is he the one who writes it? Ask yourself this question for example when you read Proust. It is very necessary to pose it, because otherwise you are screwed, you think that the narrator of the story is a simple someone, like that, a little asthmatic, and after all a bit of a dope in his adventures! That has to be said, right! Only you do not at all have the impression, when you have worked on Proust, that it is in any way stupid. It is not what Proust says about the narrator, it is something different that he writes, anyway let us go on. From page 31, at a particular page, you will see when I speak about the letter, of its conveyancing, of the way in which the Minister took it from the Queen or when Dupin takes the baton from the Minister, and the consequences that result from being the one who holds (le détenteur) this letter; it's a funny word, right? That means perhaps: to have the possibility of détente (relaxation), this letter, you will see that from this page to this page, what I am talking about, I am the one who wrote it, did I know what I was doing? Well, I will not tell you. What I am talking about, is the phallus. And I would even say more, no one has ever spoken better about it. That is why I am asking you to consult it. It will teach you something.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 6: Wednesday 17 March 1971

As regards this seminar on The purloined letter, then...I do not know yet what it may yield. Can you hear me there, in the fourth row? Wonderful! At least we can breath. That may allow more effective relationships. For example, in one case, I might ask someone to leave. In the extreme case I might have an attack of nerves, and leave myself. Anyway in the other one, in the other amphitheatre, it was a bit too much like the majority of cases where people think a sexual relationship exists. Because you are stuck together in a sardine tin. This is going to allow me to ask you to raise your hand. Who are the people who, following my explicit suggestion, made the effort to re-read pages 31-40 of what is called my Ecrits? Anyway, lift your hand all the same! Here you can raise your hand. There are not as many as all that. I don't know if I might not have an attack of nerves. Simply to leave, because in short it is necessary to have some minimal resources to ask someone what relationship he was eventually able to sense in these pages, in these pages, to what I said I was speaking about there, namely, the phallus. Who feels in the mood – you see I am very nice, I am not challenging anyone – who feels himself in the mood to say something, even that, why not, that there is scarcely any way of seeing it. Would someone be kind enough to communicate to me some of the reflections that may have been inspired in him, I am not saying by these pages but by what I said the last time about what they consisted of, according to me. X, listen, you, have you re-read these pages?

http://www.lacaninireland.com

X: .....

You haven't re-read them? Get the hell out of here! Anyway, it's very annoying. You don't expect me to read them for you. That (98) really is asking too much of me. But anyway, I take it as it comes. I am a little bit astonished all the same, I am a little bit astonished, not to be able to get an answer unless I take a teasing line. Yes! All the same it is very annoying. In these pages, I am very precisely only speaking about the function of the phallus in so far as it is articulated, as it is articulated in a certain discourse. And this was nevertheless not a time at which I had even sketched out the construction of this whole variety, this tetrahedric combination, with four vertices, that I presented to you last year. And I note nevertheless, from this level one cannot say, from this level, I mean, of my construction, from this time if you also wish, I directed my attack, as I might say, I directed my attack – this is saying a lot - to being able to shoot (tirer), it is already that, in such a way that it seems to me now not to be misleading. I mean in a further stage of this construction. Naturally, when I said the last time, I let myself go like that, especially when it is necessary to pretend one is breathing, I said the last time that I admired myself, I hope that you did not take that literally. What I was admiring, was in effect rather the outline that I had created at a time when I was simply beginning to plough a certain furrow as a reference point, which is not now to be completely rejected, which does not make me feel ashamed. It was on this that I ended last year, and it is rather remarkable. One might even perhaps take something from it, an outline, like that, some encouragement to continue. That it is altogether striking that everything that can be caught in it (y est péchable), as I might say, in terms of the signifier, is there. This indeed is what is at stake. I started to fish from this seminar on the Purloined Letter on, and I think that after all this time, the fact that I put it in first place, in spite of any chronology, showed perhaps that it was necessary, that I had

http://www.lacaninireland.com

the idea, that it was in short the best way to give an introduction to my Ecrits. So then the remark that I make about this famous man who dares all things, those unbecoming as well as those becoming a man, it is quite certain that if I insisted at that moment to say that not to translate it literally "ce qui est indigne aussi bien que ce qui est digne d'un homme" shows that it is in a block that the unsayable, shameful aspect, what is not said, as regards what concerns a man, is indeed there, in a word, the phallus. And it is clear that to translate it by fragmenting it in two: "Ce qui est digne d'un homme aussi bien que ce qui est indigne de lui", that what I am insisting on here, is that (99) it is not the same thing to say "the robber's knowledge of the loser's knowledge of the robber", that this element of knowing who knows, namely, by having imposed a certain phantasy of oneself, precisely the man who dares everything, is here as Dupin says right away, the key to the situation. I am saying that, I am saying that and I am going to come back to it. Because to tell the truth, what I indicated to you could have - for someone who would have taken the trouble - allowed there to be advanced directly in a text like this, most of the articulations that I will perhaps have to develop, to unfold, to construct today. As you are going to see, if you do not mind, in a second phase, after having heard what I will more or less have succeeded in saying. It was in fact well and truly written there, and not simply written there, with all and the same necessary articulations, those that I believe I have to take you through. So then everything that is there is not simply sieved and bound, it is clearly made up of signifiers that are available for a more elaborate meaning. That, in short, of a teaching - my own - that I can say is without precedent, other than that of Freud himself. And precisely in so far as it defines the previous one in such a way that one must read its structure in its impossibilities.

Can one say that properly speaking, for example, Freud formulated this impossibility of sexual relationships? Not as such. I am doing it simply because, and after all it is very simple to say, it is written everywhere. It is written in what Freud wrote. It only has to be read. Only you are going to see later why you cannot read it. I am trying to say it. To say why I for my part do read it. The letter then, purloined, not stolen, but as I explain, I begin with that, which makes a detour, or as I translate it for my part, the letter en souffrance, it begins like that and it ends, this little écrit, with the fact that it arrives nevertheless at its destination. And if you read it, I hope that there will be a few more who will read it between now and the time I am going to see you again, which will not be in the near future. Because all of this is very well calculated. The second and third Wednesday, I chose them because during the month of April, they fall during the Easter holidays. So then, you will only see me in May. You will have the time to read the 40 pages of The purloined letter. At the end I try to underline what is essential in it, and why the translation of "la lettre volée" is not a good one. The purloined letter, this all the same means, this all the same means, that it reaches its destination. And I give the destination. I give it as the fundamental destination of every (100) letter, I mean epistle. It reaches, let us say, not even him or her or those that can understand nothing about it, including the police on this occasion. Naturally they are completely incapable of understanding anything whatsoever, as I underline and explain for a number of pages – precisely that is even why they were not able to find it – about this substratum, this material of the letter. This is very prettily said, this invention, this magnificent fabrication of Poe, the letter is of course beyond the reach of explanation by space, since this is what is at stake. This is what the Prefect has come to say, indeed what the police first of all came to say, which is that everything in the Minister's house, given that they know that the letter is there, that it is there so that he always has it within hand's reach, they say why, that the space had literally been cross-ruled.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It's amusing, right?, to let myself go, like that, I don't know, every time I allow myself a little, from time to time, to follow a certain slope, why not, to certain considerations, like that, about space. This famous space which has been indeed for our logic, for a good while, since Descartes, the most bothersome thing in the world. This is all the same a good occasion to talk about it, even if it is necessary to add it on as a sort of note in the margin, like something that I isolate, like something that I distinguish as the dimension of the imaginary. There are all the same people who worry themselves, not necessarily about that écrit, about others, or even also sometimes who kept notes of what I may have said at a certain time, for example on identification. It was the year, 1961/62, I must say that all my listeners were thinking about something else, except, I do not know, one or two who came from outside, who did not know what exactly was happening. I spoke there about the unary trait and people worry themselves now, it seems that this is legitimate, about where this unary trait should be put. On the side of the Symbolic, or of the Imaginary? And why not of the Real? In any case just like, because this is how it is passed on, a baton, ein einziger Zug, because it is of course in Freud that I picked that out. This poses some questions, since I introduced it to you a little the last time, by this remark that it was completely impossible to think about anything whatsoever that holds up about this bipartition that is so difficult, so problematic for mathematicians. This is, namely, whether everything can be reduced to pure logic, namely, to a discourse that is sustained by a well-determined structure. Is there not an absolutely essential element that (101) remains, whatever we do to insert it into this structure, to reduce it, that all the same remains as a final kernel and that is called intuition. Assuredly, it is the question from which Descartes started. I mean, I would point out to you, that mathematical reasoning, as he saw it, extracted nothing efficacious, creative, anything whatsoever that was of the order of reasoning, but simply its start, namely, an original intuition, the one that is posited, established by its original distinction between space and thinking. Naturally, this Cartesian opposition, having been constructed more by a thinker than by a mathematician – one who was certainly not incapable of producing things in mathematics, as the effects have proved – was of course

http://www.lacaninireland.com

http://www.lacaninireland.com

much more enriched by the mathematicians themselves. It is indeed the first time that something came to mathematics by way of philosophy. Because I would ask you to note something which seems to me to be very certain – let people contradict me if they can, it would be easy to find someone more competent than I on this matter – it is all the same very striking that the mathematicians of antiquity should have, for their part, pursued their progress without paying the slightest attention to everything that might have been happening in the schools of wisdom, in any of the schools of philosophy whatever they may have been. It is not the same in our day in which assuredly the Cartesian impulse concerning the distinction between intuiting and reasoning is something which has really tormented mathematics itself. This is indeed the reason why I cannot fail to find in it a vein, an effect of something that has a certain relationship with what here, in the field that is at stake and that I am struggling with. And that it seems to me that the remark that I can make, from the point that I am at, about the relationships between the word and writing, about what there is, at least in this first line, about what there is special about the function of writing with respect to any discourse, is of a nature perhaps to ensure that the mathematicians notice what I indicated the last time, that the very intuition of Euclidean space owes something to writing. On the other hand, if as I am going to try to push it a little further for you, what is called in mathematics logical research, logical reduction, a mathematical operation, is something that in any case is not going, cannot have any other support – to notice it, it is enough to follow history – than the manipulation of small or big letters, diverse alphabetical lots, I mean Greek letters or German letters, several alphabetical lots. Any manipulation by which logistical reduction in mathematical reasoning is advanced requires this support. As I am repeating to you, I do not see the essential difference between it and (102) what was, for a long time, for a whole epoch, the 17th and 18th centuries, the difficulty of mathematical thinking. Namely, the necessity of a drawing for Euclidean proof, that at least one of these triangles should be traced out. And at this point everyone gets

http://www.lacaninireland.com

frantic. This triangle that has been traced out, is it the triangle in general or a particular triangle? Because it is quite clear that it is always particular, and that what you prove for the triangle in general, namely, always the same story, namely, that the three angles made by two straight lines, well it is quite clear that you must not say that this triangle has not the right to be at once an isosceles rectangle at the same time as being equilateral. So then it is always particular. This worried mathematicians a great deal. I pass over, of course, this is not the place to recall it here, I am not here to show my erudition, through what and from what this flows since Descartes, Leibnitz or others. It goes up as far as Husserl. They seem to me, all the same, never to have seen the real problem, that writing is there on both sides. It is indeed homogenising intuiting and reasoning, that writing, in other words little letters, has no less of an intuitive function than the one outlined by our friend Euclid. What is at stake all the same is to know why people think that this makes a difference. I do not know whether I ought to point out to you that the consistency of space, of Euclidean space that ends with its three dimensions, should, it seems to me, be defined in a quite different way. If you take two points, they are at equal distance from one another, as I might say, the distance is the same from the first to the second as from the second to the first. You can take three of them and arrange for it to be still true, namely, that each one is equidistant from the two others. You can take four of them and organise it so that it is still true. I don't know, I have never heard that being explicitly highlighted. You can take five, don't rush into saying that here also you can put them at equal distance from each of the other four because, all the same in our Euclidean space, you will not manage it. It is necessary, in order to have five points at equal distance, you hear what I am saying, from each of all the others, for you to fabricate a fourth dimension. There you are! Naturally, it is very easy, to the letter, and then it holds up well, it can be proved that a four dimensional space is perfectly coherent in the whole measure that one can show the link between its coherence and the coherence of real numbers. It is in this very measure that it can be sustained. But anyway, it is a fact, that beyond the tetrahedron, already, intuition has to be supported by the letter. I got into this in order to tell you, because I said that the letter that (103) reaches its destination is the letter that reaches the police, who understand nothing about it, and that the police as you know, did not come to birth today or yesterday, three pikes like that in the earth, three pikes in the campus, provided you know a little bit about what Hegel wrote, you will know that it is the State. The State and the police, for anyone who has reflected a little, one cannot say that Hegel takes up such a bad position in this regard, is exactly the same thing. It is based on a tetrahedric structure, in other words, once we put in question something like the letter, we have to leave my little schemas of last year, which were constructed as you remember like that:

http://www.lacaninireland.com

$$\frac{S_1}{$} \rightarrow \frac{S_2}{o}$$

Here is the discourse of the Master, as you perhaps remember, characterised by the fact that of the six lines (arêtes) of the tetrahedron, one is broken. It is in the measure that one makes these structures turn on the four lines of the circuit that follow one another in the tetrahedron, this is a condition, are fitted in the same direction, in this direction that turns around one, it does not matter which of the two others, of the three others, that the variation is established about what is involved in the structure of discourse, very precisely in so far as it remains at a certain level of construction which is the tetrahedric one, this tetrahedric one that we cannot be satisfied with once the agency of the letter is brought out. It is even because one cannot be satisfied with it, that to remain at its level, there is always one of the sides of what makes the circle which is broken. So then, it is from this that it results that in the world as it is structured by a certain tetrahedron, the letter only reaches its destination by finding the one who in my discourse on The purloined letter, I designated by the term Subject which is not at all to be eliminated in any way or to be withdrawn, on the pretext that we are making some steps in structure, and as regards which it is all the same necessary to start from the fact that if what we have discovered under the term unconscious has a meaning, the Subject, I repeat, which is irreducible - we cannot, even at this level, not take it into account - but the Subject is distinguished by its very special imbecility. This is what counts in Poe's text, because of the fact it is not for nothing that the one whom he jokes (104) about on this occasion is the king, who here manifests this function of Subject. He understands absolutely nothing and his whole police structure will not prevent, nevertheless, the letter coming within his reach, given that it is the police that are holding onto it and that they can do nothing about it. I even underline that, even if it were found in their files, it would be of no use to the historian. In one or other page of what I wrote in connection with this letter, one can say that very probably only the Queen knows what it means, and that what gives it its weight, is the fact that, if the only person that it involves, namely the Subject, the King, got his hands on it, the only thing he would understand is that it surely has a meaning and this is the scandal, that it has a meaning that escapes him the Subject. The term of scandal, or again of contradiction, is in the right place in these last four little pages that I gave you to read, I underline.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is clear that it is uniquely in function of the circulation of the letter that the Minister – because there must have been all the same some people here who have read Poe sometime, you ought to know that there is a Minister involved, the one who had nicked the letter – that the Minister shows us in the course of the displacement of the aforesaid letter, variations, like a fish going through variations of colour and in truth that its essential function, that my whole text plays on a little bit too much – but one cannot insist too much in order to make oneself understood – plays on the fact that the letter has a

http://www.lacaninireland.com

feminising effect. But once he no longer has the letter, because he knows nothing about it himself, once he no longer has it, we find him in a way restored to the dimension, precisely that his whole plan was designed to give to himself, that of a man who dares all things. And I emphasise this turn of events. It is on this that this statement of Poe ends. It is that at this moment that the thing appears, monstrum horrendum, and it is put in the text, what he wanted to be for the Queen, who naturally had taken account of it, because she tried to recover it, this letter, but anyway the game was played out with him. This is for our Dupin, namely, the cutest of the cute, the one to whom Poe gives the role, the role of throwing something that I would be quite happy to call, I underline it in the text, some dust in our eyes. Namely, that we believe that the cutest of the cute exists, namely, that he really understands, knows everything, that being in the tetrahedron, he can understand how it is made.

I have sufficiently ironised about these certainly very clever things, namely the play on words around ambitus, of religio or of honesti homines, to show and to say simply, in my own regard, that I went (105) further in seeking out the little beast, is that not so, and that in truth it is somewhere; it is somewhere to follow Poe, one can ask the question of whether Poe really noticed it. Namely, that the simple fact of the letter passing through the hands of Dupin, feminised him in his turn, enough to ensure that, with respect to the Minister, even though he nevertheless knows that he has deprived him of what might allow him to continue to play his role if ever he has to show his hand – it is precisely at this moment that Dupin cannot contain himself and manifests with respect to the one who is believed to be already sufficiently at his mercy in order to no longer leave a trace, sends him this message in the piece of paper that he substitutes for the stolen letter, "un destin si funeste.....", anyway you know the text, "s'il n'est digne d'Atrée, est digne de Thyeste".

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The question, as I might say, is to notice, as I might say, whether Poe on this occasion clearly sees the import of the fact that Dupin, in this sort of message that goes beyond all possibilities because, God knows, if the Minister ever took out his letter, and found himself at the same time deflated, this to tell you that castration is here, like it, suspended, perfectly realised.

I am also indicating this perspective which seems to me anyway not to be determined in advance. This only gives a greater value to what Dupin writes as a message to the person that he has just deprived of what he thinks is his power. This little billet doux, which makes him exult at the thought of what will happen when the person involved, before whom, to what end, will have to make use of it, what one can say is that Dupin enjoys (jouit). So then, here is the question, the question that I opened up the last time by asking you, whether the narrator and the one who writes are the same thing? What is incontestable, is that the narrator, the subject of the statement, the one who speaks, is Poe. Does Poe enjoy the enjoyment of Dupin or is it from elsewhere? This is what I am going to try to show you today.

I am speaking to you about The purloined letter as I articulated it myself, this is an illustration that I can give to the question that I asked the last time. Is the one who writes not radically different from the one who speaks in his own name as the narrator in a writing? At this level it is tangible. Because what happens at the level of the narrator, when all is said and done, is what I could call, I apologise for insisting on the demonstrative character of this little essay, is that when all is said and done, it is the most perfect castration that is demonstrated. Everyone is equally cuckolded, and no one knows (106) anything about it. It is certain that the King, of course, is asleep from the beginning and will sleep to the end of his days without noticing anything; the Queen does not realise that she is almost fated to become mad about this Minister, now that she has him in her grasp. Now that she has castrated him, right, it is love!

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The Minister has really been had, but when all is said and done it does not matter to him. Because as I very clearly explained somewhere, it is either one thing or another: either he will be happy to become the Queen's lover and that ought to be agreeable, in principle, people say that. Not everybody likes it, or if really he has for her one of these feelings which are of the order of what I for my part call the only lucid feeling, namely hatred, as I very clearly explained to you, if he hates her, she will only love him all the more, and that will allow him to go so far, that he will end up all the same by becoming sure that the letter has not been there for a long time. Because he will surely make a mistake. He will tell himself that if she goes that far with him, it is because she is sure of things, so then, he will open his little paper in time, but in no case will he get back to what he wished for, the fact is that the Minister will end up by making himself ridiculous. He will not be so! Good! Well then, there you are, here is what I succeeded in saying in connection with what I wrote, and what I wanted to tell you, is that it takes on its importance from the fact that it is unreadable.

That is the point, which if you would not mind listening to me again I am going to try to develop. Like many people, I am saying it to you right away because there are worldly people, the only people who are capable of telling me what they think about what I palm off on them. It was at a time when my Ecrits had not yet appeared, they gave me their point of view as technicians, "we can't understand anything in it" they told me. Note that this is quite something. Something that one understands nothing about, is full of hope, it is the sign that one is affected by it. It is a good thing that they understood nothing about it! Because one can never understand anything except what of course one has already in one's head. But anyway, I would like to articulate it a little better. It is not enough to write something that is deliberately incomprehensible, but to see why the unreadable has a meaning. I would point out to you first of all that...our whole business, which is the story of sexual relationships, is it not, revolves around the fact that you may think that it is written because in short, this is what was discovered in psychoanalysis, we were all the same clearly referred to a writing. The Oedipus complex, is a written myth and I would even say more, this is very exactly the thing that specifies it. One could have taken precisely any one at all, provided it was written. What is proper to a myth that is written, as Claude (107) Lévi-Strauss has already pointed out, is that by writing it, it has only a single form. While what is proper to myth, as the whole work of Lévi-Strauss tries to demonstrate, is to have a great deal of them. This is what a written myth constitutes as myth.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then this written myth might very well seem to be the inscription of what is involved in sexual relationships. I would like all the same to point out a certain number of things to you. There you are! The fact is, that for that it is not a matter of indifference that I started from this text, the fact is that if this letter, this letter on this occasion may have this function, this feminising function, is that not so, it is with respect to what I told you about the fact that the written myth, the Oedipus complex is designed very exactly to highlight for us that it is unthinkable to say: the woman (la femme). Why is it unthinkable? Because one cannot say: all the women. One cannot say all the women because it is only introduced into the myth because of the fact that the Father possesses all the women, which is manifestly a sign of an impossibility. On the other hand, what I underline in connection with this purloined letter, is that there is only one woman, that in other words the function of the woman is only deployed in what the great mathematician Brouwer in the context of what I stated for you, put forward earlier about the mathematical discussion called multiunity(?) (multinunité), namely, that there is a function which is very properly speaking that the Father is there, the Father is there because he makes himself recognised in his radical function, in the one he has always manifested, every time for example monotheism was at stake. It is not for nothing that Freud landed on this, because there is an altogether essential function that should be reserved as being at the origin very properly speaking of writing. This is what I will call the not more than one (pas plus d'un). Aristotle, of course, makes altogether entrancing, considerable efforts, as he usually does, to make this accessible to us by stages, in the name of his principle that can be described as the principle of climbing the ladder from cause to cause and from being to being, etc. You really do have to stop somewhere, anyway what is very nice is that he really spoke for imbeciles. Hence the development of the function of the subject. The not more than one is posited in an altogether original way. Without the not more than one, you could not even begin to write the series of whole numbers. I will show you that on the board the next time. There must be a one, and then all you have to do subsequently is purse your lips anytime you want to start again, so that each time (108) this gives a further one, but not the same one. On the contrary, all those that are repeated in this way are the same, they can be added up. That is called an arithmetical series. But let us come back to what seems to us essential for this subject as regards sexual enjoyment. It is that, from experience, there is only one structure, whatever may have to be the particular conditionings, it is that sexual enjoyment is found not to be able to be written, and it is from this that there results the structural multiplicity, and first of all the tetrahedron in which something is outlined that situates it, but is inseparable from a certain number of functions that have nothing to do, in short, that can specify in the general case the sexual partner. The structure is such that man as such in so far as he functions is castrated, and on the other hand, something exists at the level of the feminine partner that one can simply trace out by this feature, whose importance I highlight, the whole function of this letter on this occasion, that the woman has nothing to do with it, if she exists – now, that is why she does not exist, it is in so far as the woman, has nothing to do with the law.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then, how are we to conceive of what has happened? All the same we make love, right? All the same we make love and people have noticed from the time they became interested in it, for a long time, and people have perhaps always been interested in it, only we have lost the key to the way in which people were previously interested, but for us, at the heart, in the efflorescence of the scientific era, we learn what is involved in it through Freud. What is it? When what is at stake is to structure, to make function by means of symbols the sexual relationship, what creates an obstacle to it? It is that enjoyment gets mixed up in it. Can sexual enjoyment be treated directly? It cannot be, and it is for this reason, let us say, let us say no more, that there is the word. Discourse begins from the fact that here there is a gap. We cannot remain at that, I mean that I reject any position of origin, and after all, nothing prevents us from saying that it is because discourse begins that the gap is produced. It is a matter of complete indifference for the result. What is certain is that discourse is implied in the gap and since there is no metalanguage, it cannot get out of it. The symbolisation of sexual enjoyment, as is made obvious by what I am in the process of articulating, is the fact that it borrows all its symbolism from what? From what does not concern it, namely, from enjoyment in so far as it is prohibited by certain confused things, confused but not all that much, because we have managed to articulate it perfectly under the name of pleasure (109) principle. Which can only have one meaning, not too much enjoyment. Because the stuff of every enjoyment is close to suffering, this is even how we recognise how it is dressed up. If the plant was not manifestly suffering, we would not know that it was alive. It is clear then that the fact that sexual enjoyment only found as a way to structure itself the reference to prohibition, as named, of enjoyment, but an enjoyment which is not the one, which is this dimension of enjoyment, which is properly speaking a fatal enjoyment, in other words that sexual enjoyment takes on its structure from the prohibition laid on the enjoyment directed at one's own body, namely, very precisely at this crunch point, the frontier where it is close to mortal enjoyment. And it only reconnects with the dimension of the sexual by bringing a prohibition to bear on the body, from which one's own body emerges, namely the body of the mother. It is only in this way that there is structured, that there is connected up in discourse, what alone the law can contribute to it, what is involved in sexual enjoyment. The partner on this occasion is indeed in effect reduced to one, but not just anyone whatsoever, the one who gave birth to you. And it is around this that there is constructed everything that can be articulated once we enter the field in a way that can be verbalised. When we shall have advanced further, I will come back to the way in which knowledge comes to function as enjoying. We can skip it here. The woman as such finds herself in this position uniquely assembled because of the fact that she is, I would say, subject to the word. Naturally, I am sparing you the detours. That the word is what establishes a dimension of truth, the impossibility of this sexual relationship, is indeed also what gives its import to the word in the fact of course that it can do everything, except be of use at the point where it happens. The word strives to reduce the woman to subjection, namely, to make of her something from which one expects signs of intelligence, if I can put it this way. But naturally, we are not dealing with any real being here, to say the word, the woman on this occasion, as this text is designed to prove, the woman, I mean the woman in herself, the woman – as if one could say all the women – the woman – I insist, who does not exist – is precisely the letter. The letter, in so far as she is the signifier that there is no Other: S(O) (sic).

http://www.lacaninireland.com

http://www.lacaninireland.com

And it is about this that I would like, before leaving you, all the same to make a remark to you that outlines the logical configuration of what I am in the process of putting forward. In Aristotelian logic, you have the affirmatives, I am not going to put them in the usual (110) letters of formal logic. I am not writing A, I am writing the universal affirmative, and I am writing this as universal negative, this is what that means. I write here particular affirmative and particular negative. I would like to point out that at the level of Aristotelian articulation, it is between these two poles – because it is from

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Aristotle that these propositional categories are borrowed – it is between these two poles that logical discrimination is carried out. The universal affirmative states an essence. I insisted often enough in the past about what is involved in the statement every stroke is vertical and that it is perfectly compatible with the fact that no stroke exists, the essence is essentially situated in logic. It is a pure statement of discourse. Logical discrimination, its essential axis in this articulation, is very exactly this oblique axis that I have just noted here. Nothing runs contrary to any identifiable logical statement whatsoever, nothing, except the remark that: "There are some that...do not" A particular negative, there are some strokes that are not vertical. This is the only contradiction that can be made against the affirmation that it is a matter of the essence. And the two other terms are, in the functioning of Aristotelian logic, quite secondary. Namely, "there are those that...", a particular affirmative, and afterwards how can we know if it is necessary or not, this proves nothing, and to say "there are none that" which is not the same thing as to say: "there are some who are not", namely, the universal negative. There are none that, well that proves nothing either. It is a fact. What I can point out to you, is what happens when, from this Aristotelian logic, we pass to their transposition in mathematical logic, the one that is constructed by means of what are called quantifiers. Don't complain that you cannot hear me for a while, first of all I am going to write it and precisely this is what is at stake. The universal, I was saying, the universal affirmative is now going to be written in this unverbalisable notation: it is an 'A' upside down; I say an 'A' upside down, anyway it is not part of discourse, it is writing. But it is a signal as you are going to see, in order to be able to babble on. $\forall$ x.F(x), the universal affirmative, $\exists$x.F(x) here particular affirmative. $\overline{\forall}$x.F(x), I want to express that this is a negative. How can I do so? I am struck by the fact that it has never been really articulated the way I am going to do it. What you have to do is to put a bar of negation above the F(x) and not at all, as is usually done above both. You are going to see why. And here, it is on the $\exists$ x that you have to put the bar. I am putting here now myself a bar (111) equivalent to the one that was here, and since the one that was there separated out in two zones the group of fours, here, it divides up by two in a different way.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

What I am putting forward, is that in this way of writing, precisely, everything depends on what one can say about writing, and that the distinction in two terms united by a point from what is written in this way has the value of saying that one can say about every 'x' – it is the signal of the upside down 'A' – that it satisfies what is written, F(x), that it is not displaced into it. In the same way, but with a different accent, the fact that there is something unwriteable, namely that it is here that the emphasis of writing is brought to bear, there exist x's that you can make function in F(x), of which you then speak, that what is at stake, in what is here called a quantifying transposition by means of the quantifiers of the particular. On the other hand, it is so true that it is around writing that there pivots the displacement of the distribution, namely, that for what is put in the foreground, is acceptable, nothing is changed for the universal. It still has its value, even though it is not the same value. On the contrary what is at stake here, the cleavage consists in noticing the non-value of the universal negative, since here, the fact is that whatever 'x' you speak about, cannot be written as F(x). And that just as for the particular negative, there is the fact, that just as here the 'x' could be written, was acceptable, inscribable in this formula, here simply, what is said, is that it is not inscribable. What does that mean? The fact is, what has been neglected in a way, without value, in these two structurings, namely, the universal negative, the universal negative in so far as it is what allows there to be said that you must not write this if you are speaking about any 'x' whatsoever, in other words that it is here that there functions an essential cut. Well then, it is the very one around which there is articulated what is involved in the sexual relationship. The question concerns what cannot be written in the function F(x), from the moment when this, the function F(x), is itself not to be written, namely, that it is what I said, stated, a little earlier, which is the point around which there is going to revolve what we will take up when I see you in two months time, namely, that it is properly speaking what is called unreadable.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 7: Wednesday 12 May 1971

Lituraterre

This word that I have just written gives its title to what I am going to offer you today. Because needs must, since you have been summoned here, that I should throw out something to you. It is obviously inspired by current events. It is the title with which I strove to respond to a demand that was addressed to me to introduce an issue that is going to appear on Literature and psychoanalysis.

This word, lituraterre, which I invented, is legitimised by Ernout et Meillet, since there are perhaps some people here who know what it is; it is a Latin dictionary that is described as etymological. Look up lino, litura, and then liturarius. It is clearly specified that this has nothing to do with littera, the letter. I don't give a damn about the fact that it has nothing to do with it. I do not necessarily submit to etymology when I let myself go in this word play with which from time to time one constructs a witticism, the art of the spoonerism, which is obvious on occasion, coming to my lips and upsetting the ear. It is not for nothing that when you learn a foreign tongue, you put the first consonant of what you hear second, and the second first.

So then this dictionary, you should consult it, is a lucky omen for me, because of being grounded on the same starting point that I took in a first movement. You should understand starting point in the sense of restart, a starting point from an equivocation with which Joyce, I am talking about James Joyce, slips from a letter to a litter, from a lettre, I am translating, to ordure.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(114) There was, perhaps you remember, but very probably you know nothing about it, there was a rich patron who wanting, to do him a good turn, offered him a psychoanalysis, and she even offered to pay for him to do it with Jung. From the word play that we are recalling, he would have gained nothing from it because he went straight away, with this a letter, a litter, straight to the best thing that one can expect at the end of an analysis.

By making stable litter of the letter, is it St Thomas again - you remember perhaps, if you ever knew it, sicut palea - St Thomas again, who comes back to Joyce, as his work bears witness throughout its whole length? Or indeed is it psychoanalysis that bears witness to his convergence with what our epoch shows up in terms of an undoing of the link, of the ancient link by which pollution is contained in culture?

I had embroidered on this, as it happens, a little while before May 1968, in order not to disappoint, on that day, the wretches among the crowds that I now find come to see me when I visit somewhere. It was at Bordeaux. Civilisation, I recalled as a premise, is a sewer. It should no doubt be said, that it was a little while after my proposition of October '67 had been welcomed in the way you know, to tell you no doubt that, in playing on that, I was a little weary of the dustbin with which I had thrown in my lot. Still, you know that I am not the only one, in order to share things around, to admit it, l'avouère, to pronounce it in the old way, the 'having' that Beckett puts in the balance with the deficit that makes rubbish of our 'being'. This avouère saves the honour of literature and, which pleases me a great deal, relieves me of the privilege that I might believe I hold in my own place.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The question is whether, what the manuals seem to display ever since they have existed, I am talking about manuals of literature, that literature is only a way of accommodating oneself to leftovers. Is it a matter of collecting in a writing, what was first of all, primitively, song, spoken myth, dramatic procession?

As regards psychoanalysis, the fact that it is appended to Oedipus, to the Oedipus of the myth, in no way qualifies it to find its way in Sophocles' text. It is not the same thing. The evocation by Freud of a text by Dostoyevsky is not enough to say that textual criticism, up to now the preserve of university discourse, has received any more fresh air from psychoanalysis.

Here, nevertheless, my teaching takes its place in a change of configuration that, currently, under the heading of actuality, currently is promoted in terms of slogans that promote the written (l'écrit). But, this change, including this testimony, for example, that it is in our day that Rabelais is finally being read, shows that it (115) is based perhaps on a literary shift that suits me better.

As an author I am less implicated than people might imagine. My Ecrits, a title that is more ironic than people might believe because what is at stake in short are reports produced in function of congresses. Or let us say, I would really like them to be heard like that, as open letters, in which no doubt I bring into question every time a slice of my teaching, anyway, that gives their tone.

Far in any case from my committing myself to this literary brou-ha-ha, which a psychoanalysis short of alibis is attaching itself to, I expose in it an unfailing tendency, by demonstrating the incapacity of its practice to justify the slightest literary judgement.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is nevertheless striking that I opened this collection of my Ecrits, with an article that I isolated by extracting it from its chronology - chronology was the guiding principle there - and that here, what is at stake is a story that one must say is quite curious because it cannot be entered into the organised list - you know that this has been made - of dramatic situations.

Anyway let us leave that. The story for its part, is constructed from what happens with the posting of a letter, a missive, without knowing what is going to happen. It is about following it and from what terminus there can be based the fact that I for my part can say about this letter, say in connection with it, that a letter always reaches its destination. And this, after the detours that it underwent in the story, renders a final account, as I might say, without having any recourse to the contents of the letter. This is what renders remarkable the effect that it brings to bear on those who one after another come into possession of it, however ardent they may be about the power that it confers. And to claim that this effect of illusion can only be articulated, which is what I did, as an effect of feminisation. This means - I apologise for coming back to it - clearly distinguishing, I am talking about what I am doing, the letter and the master signifier in so far as here it carries it. It carries it in its envelope, since here what is at stake is a letter in the sense of an epistle. Now, I claim that I am not making here a metaphorical use of the word letter, since precisely the story consists in the fact that there passes in it like 'Hey presto!' the message of which it is the writing (l'écrit), the letter itself then, which makes the journey.

My critique, if there is any reason to take it as literary, can only be brought to bear then, and this is what I try to do, on what Poe does, being a writer himself, in formulating such a message about the letter. It is clear that in not saying it as such, in the way that I for my part say it, he is not avowing it inadequately but all the more rigorously.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(116) Nevertheless, the elision, the elision of this message can in no way be elucidated by any trait whatsoever of his psycho-biography; this elision would rather be filled in by it. A psychoanalyst who, perhaps you remember, scoured the other texts of Poe, here abandons her dishcloths! Marie does not even touch it! So much for Poe's text.

But as regards my text, could it not be solved by my own psycho-biography? The wish that I might formulate, for example, of being one day properly read. But, for that, for that to be worthwhile, it would be first of all necessary to develop, that whoever undertakes this interpretation, should develop what I mean by the fact that the letter carries far enough to always arrive, as I say, at its destination.

It is there perhaps that I am for the moment closely linked with those devoted to writing (l'écriture). It is certain that as usual psychoanalysis here is on the receiving end from literature and it might first of all take from it the line which would make of resorting to repression a less psycho-biographical idea. For my part, if I propose the text of Poe, with what is behind it, to psychoanalysis, it is precisely because it is unable to tackle it without showing its failure. It is in that way that I illuminate psychoanalysis, and you know, you know what I am invoking in this way, it is at the back of my book, in this way I am invoking those who seek enlightenment (les lumières). Nevertheless I illuminate psychoanalysis by demonstrating where the hole is in it. There is nothing illegitimate in that. It has already borne fruit, as has been known for a long time, in optics, and the most recent physics, that of the photon, makes use of it. It is by this method that psychoanalysis may better justify its intrusion into literary criticism. This means that literary criticism may effectively renew itself from the fact that psychoanalysis is there so that texts can measure themselves against it, precisely from the fact that the riddle is on its side, and that it remains coy about it. But those, those psychoanalysts about whom it is no lie to say that rather than they exercising psychoanalysis, they are exercised by it, badly understand my remarks, at least when they are taken as a body.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

As a way of getting to them, I oppose truth and knowledge. It is the first, in which immediately they recognise that their office is put in the dock, it is their truth that I am waiting for. I insist, correcting my aim, by saying a knowledge that is checkmated (en échec), this is where psychoanalysis shows itself at its best. A knowledge that is checkmated as one might say a shape that is damaged, that does not mean a failure of knowledge (échec du savoir). And forthwith I learn that people feel themselves dispensed from showing that they have any knowledge.

Is it supposed to be a dead letter that I put as a title to one of these (117) pieces that I call Ecrits, The letter the agency (La lettre l'instance) as reason of the unconscious? Does this not sufficiently designate what in the letter, by having to insist, is not there of right, if it is with the force of reason that it advances. To say that this reason is mean or extreme, I have already done it on occasion, shows clearly the bifidity in which any measure is engaged. But is there nothing in the real, which can do without this mediation? This might be perhaps a frontier. A frontier, by separating two territories, has only one defect, but it is an important one. It symbolises that they are the same, as I might say, in any case for whoever crosses it. I do not know whether you have thought about it, but it is the principle for which one day a man called von Uxküll made up the term Umwelt. This is done on the principle that it is the reflection of the Innenwelt, it is the promotion of the frontier to ideology. It is obviously an unfortunate starting point that a biology, because it was a biology that von Uxküll wanted to found with that, a biology which already gives itself right at the beginning, the fact of adaptation, in particular, which forms the basis of this

http://www.lacaninireland.com

coupling Umwelt-Innenwelt. Obviously, selection, selection is no better when it is an ideology. It is in canonising itself as natural that it is shown to be all the less so.

I am going to propose something, like that, quite bluntly to come after a letter, a litter. For my part I am going to say, is not the letter the literal because it is founded on the littoral? Because that is something different to a frontier. Moreover you have perhaps noticed that they are never confused. The littoral, is something that posits a domain, as being entirely making with another, if you wish, a frontier, but precisely because they have absolutely nothing in common, not even a reciprocal relation. Is the letter not properly speaking littoral? The edge of the hole in knowledge that psychoanalysis designates precisely, when it tackles it, from the letter, is this not what it designates?

The funny thing, is to note how psychoanalysis is obliged in a way by its own movement to fail to recognise the sense of what nevertheless the letter says literally (à la lettre), make no mistake, when all its interpretations can be summed up in enjoyment. Between enjoyment and knowledge, the letter might be the littoral. All of this does not prevent that what I said about the unconscious remaining there, all the same taking precedence, otherwise what I am putting forward would have absolutely no sense. We still have to know how the unconscious, which I say is the effect of language because it presupposes its structure as necessary and sufficient, how it commands this function of the letter.

(118) The fact that it is the instrument proper for the inscription of discourse does not make it in any way inappropriate to serve for what I make of it, when in the agency of the letter, for example, that I spoke about just now, I use it to show the operation of what your man, someone called Jean Tardieu, called one word taken for another, indeed the word taken by another, in other words metaphor

http://www.lacaninireland.com

and metonymy, as an effect of the sentence. So that it easily symbolises then all the effects of signifiers, but this does absolutely not require that the letter, in these very effects, for which it serves me as an instrument, should be primary. An examination is required less about this primary character, which is not even to be supposed, but about what in language calls the littoral to the literal.

Nothing of what I inscribed with the help of letters about the formations of the unconscious in order to rescue them from the way Freud formulates, states them, more simply as facts of language, nothing allows there to be confused, as has been done, the letter with the signifier. What I inscribed with the help of letters about the formations of the unconscious does not authorise making a signifier of the letter and of granting it, what is more, a primacy with regard to the signifier.

Such a confusing discourse could only arise from the discourse that is important to me, and precisely, which is important to me in another discourse that I pinpointed when the time had come as University discourse. In other words, as I have underlined sufficiently for a year and a half, I think, in other words knowledge put to use starting from the semblance.

The slightest feeling for the experience that I am warding off, can only be situated from a different discourse than that one. I should have protected the product of this discourse which I designated, no more, without admitting it, as mine. I was spared it, thank God, even though by bringing it to me, in the sense I mentioned earlier, I am being pestered.

If I found acceptable the models that Freud articulates in a project about how to describe the clearing, the drilling of imprecise routes, I would not for all that have taken up the metaphor of writing. And precisely, it is on this point of the Project that I do not find it

http://www.lacaninireland.com

acceptable. Writing is not an impression, despite everything that is being said in terms of a blah-blah about the famous Wunderblock.

When I took advantage of Letter 52, it was in order to read there what Freud was able to state under the term that he forges of WZ, Wahrmehmungszeichen, and to note that it was what he was able to find closest to the signifier at a time when Saussure had still not (119) brought to birth this famous signifier, which, all the same, does not date from him, because it dates from the Stoics. That Freud writes it there with two letters, since I moreover only write it with one, in no way proves that the letter is primary.

So then I am going to try to indicate to you today the core of what for us the letter appears to produce as a consequence, and of language, precisely from the fact that I say, that it dwells in whoever speaks. I will borrow its features from what in an economy of language allows to be outlined what advances, to my way of thinking, that literature may be in the process of turning towards lituraterre. You must not be surprised to see me setting about a literal demonstration because this means marching in step with the way in which the question is advanced. One might perhaps see in it, indeed see there being affirmed what a demonstration that I call literary might be. I am still a little bit at the edge. Why not, this time, throw myself into it?

I have just come back from a trip that I had wanted to make to Japan, because on a first, a first trip, I had experienced the littoral. You can understand me from what I said a little earlier about the Umwelt which I repudiated, precisely because of that, because of making the trip impossible, which, if you follow my formulae, would be to guarantee its real. Only there you are, it was premature. It is the departure that this makes impossible, unless we sing: "Let's go, let's go!" That is done a lot moreover. I would only note one moment of this trip, the one that as it happens I gathered, from what, from a new route, which as it happens I took simply because of the fact that the first time that I went there, it was simply prohibited. I have to admit that it was not on the outward journey, along the Arctic Circle, which traces this route for the aeroplane, that I managed to read what? What I was seeing of the Siberian plain.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I am in the process of proposing for you a Siberian trial (un essai de sibériétique). This trial would not have seen the light of day if the distrust of the Soviets, not in my regard, but with regard to aeroplanes, had allowed me to see the industries, the military installations which makes Siberia important. But anyway, this distrust, is a condition that we will call accidental. Why not even occidental, if one puts a little killing (occire) into it; what is being piled up in southern Siberia is what we are in for!

The only decisive condition is here precisely the condition of littoral. For me, because I am a little hard of hearing, it only operated on the return journey as being literally what Japan, from its letter, had no doubt done to me, a little bit too much tickling, which is just what is necessary for me to experience it. I say that I am (120) experiencing it because of course, in order to locate it, to anticipate it, I had already done it here, when I spoke to you a little bit about the Japanese tongue. About the fact that what properly creates this tongue, is writing, I already told you that.

What was required no doubt for that, was just this little bit too much that I needed in terms of what is called art should represent something. This stems from the fact of what Japanese painting shows here about its marriage to the letter, and very precisely in the form of calligraphy. I am fascinated by things that are suspended, kakemono, that is how it is said, things that are suspended on the wall of every museum over there, bearing the inscription of characters, Chinese in formation, that I know a little, very little about. But inasmuch as I knew it, it allowed me to measure what is elided in cursive writing where the particularity of each hand crushes the universal, in other words, taking up what I teach you, only takes its value from the signifier. You remember? The stroke is always vertical. It is still true even if there is no stroke.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then, in cursive writing I cannot find the character, because I am still a novice; but this is not the important thing, because what I am calling this particularity can be based on a firmer shape. The important thing is what it adds to it. It is a dimension, or again, as I taught you to play on that, a demansion, where there dwells what I have already introduced to you in the last or the second last seminar, a word that I write to amuse myself as papludun. It is the demansion which you know allows me, it is all very well to say all that, from the little mathematical game of Peano, etc., and the way in which Frege has to tackle it to reduce the series of natural numbers, in inverted commas, to logic, the one then, from which I establish the subject in what I am going to call again today, because I am doing literature and I am happy, you are going to recognise it, I had written it in a form, in recent times, as the Hun-en-peluce. The Hun is of great use, it can be put in the place of what I call l'Achose, and that puts a stopper in it with the small o (petit a) which not by chance can be reduced like that, as I designate it, to a letter. At the level of calligraphy, this is the letter that is at stake in a wager, but which one? That is won with ink and a brush.

There you are, this is how it invincibly appeared to me in a circumstance that must be remembered, by the fact that it is necessary then that there should be distinguished erasure. Namely, that between the clouds, there appeared to me the trickling down which is the only trace to appear by operating in it still more than indicating the relief at this latitude in what one could call the Siberian plain. A plain that is really desolate, in the proper sense of (121) the word, of any vegetation, except the reflections, the

http://www.lacaninireland.com

reflections of this streaming which push into a shadow what does not reflect.

What is this trickling? It is a bouquet. It acts like a bouquet, in the fact that elsewhere I distinguished by its first feature and from the fact that it effaces. I said it one time, but people always forget a part of the thing, I said it in connection with the unary stroke, it is from the effacing of the stroke that the subject is designated. This is noticed then in two phases. It is necessary therefore that erasing should be distinguished from it.

Litura, Lituraterre. The erasing of any trace that was there before, this is what makes a land of the littoral. Litura pure, is the literal. Here, to produce this erasing, is to reproduce this half by which the subject subsists. Those who have been here for some time, but there must be fewer and fewer, ought to remember what one day I narrated about the adventures of half a chicken. To produce the only, definitive erasure, this is the exploit of calligraphy. You can always try, try to do simply what I am not going to do because I would fail, first of all because I have no brush. Try to make this horizontal bar, which is traced out from left to right, to represent by a stroke the unary one as a character, frankly. You will spend a long time finding out what erasure that is attacking and what is the suspense that arrests it, so that what you will do will be lamentable, it is hopeless for an Westerner. A different movement is necessary that can only be caught by being detached, from whatever you cross out.

Between centre and absence, between knowledge and enjoyment, there is littoral which only veers towards the literal from the fact that this bend is one you can take in the same way at every instant. It is only from that that you can hold yourself to be the agent who sustains it.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

What is revealed by my vision of streaming, by what dominates the erasure, is that by being produced between the clouds, it is conjugated at its source. It is indeed in Aristophanes' clouds that I am called to find what is involved in the signifier, I mean the semblance par excellence, since it is from its rupture that there rains down this effect from the fact that there is precipitated from it something that was a material in suspension.

It has to be said that the Japanese painting which I told you earlier mixed in calligraphy so very well, why? And that here there is no lack of clouds. It is from where I was at that moment that I really clearly understood the function of these golden clouds which literally block, hide a whole part of the scenes which in places, (122) places which are things which unfold in a different sense, the ones that are called makemono. They preside over the distribution of little scenes. Why? How can it be that these people who know how to draw, experience the need to mix them into this pile of clouds, if not precisely that this is what introduces the dimension of the signifier. And the letter which erases, is distinguished by being a rupture then, of the semblance, which dissolves whatever pretended to be a form, a phenomenon, a meteor. That's it, I already told you, that science operates at the start in the most tangible way on perceptible forms. But at the same time it must also be that in ridding them of what from this rupture constitutes enjoyment, namely, by dissipating from them what they sustain from this hypothesis, if I can express myself in this way, of enjoyment, which in fact constitutes the world, because the idea of the world, is that. To think that it is made up of such drives that moreover represent its void?

Well then, what is evoked in terms of enjoyment because of the fact that a semblance is broken, this is what in the real - this is the important point - presents itself in the real as furrowing (ravinement). This defines for you the way in which writing can be said to be in the real the furrowing of the signified, in other words the amount of semblance that has rained down in so far as it is what makes the signified. Writing does not trace out the signifier. It only goes back to it by taking a name, but exactly in the same way as this happens to all the things that have been named by the signifying battery after it has numbered them. Since, of course, I am not sure that my discourse is being understood, I am going, all the same, to have to pin it down by an opposition. Writing, the letter, is in the real, and the signifier, in the symbolic. Like that, this can act as a little jingle for you.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I come back to a later moment in the aeroplane. We are going to advance a little like that: I told you that it was on the return journey. So then there, what is striking is to see them appearing. There are other traces that one sees for their part being sustained in isobars; obviously, traces that are of the order of an embankment, anyway, in general, isobars. This makes them normal to those whose slope, one could say, stands out in the clearest relief, and is marked by curves.

Where I was, it was very clear, I had already seen at Osaka how the auto-routes seemed to come down from the sky, that is the only place that they were able to set them up like that, one above the other. There is a certain Japanese architecture, the most modern one, which is very well able to recapture the ancient. Japanese architecture consists essentially in the flapping of a bird's wing. This helped me to understand, to see right away that the shortest path between one point and another, would never have shown itself (123) to anyone, if there were not the cloud that quite frankly takes on the appearance of a road? Nobody in the world ever follows a straight line, neither man, nor the amoeba, nor the fly, nor the branch, nor anything at all. According to the latest news, we know that a beam of light does not follow it either, completely solidary as it is with the universal curvature.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The straight line in all of this all the same inscribes something. It inscribes distance, but distance, according to Newton's laws, is absolutely nothing but an effective factor of a dynamic that we will call a cascade, the one that ensures that everything that falls follows a parabola.

So then, there is no straight line except in writing, of surveying except from the sky.

But they are both one and the other, in so far as they are such to sustain the straight line, they are artefacts because they only dwell in language. This all the same should not be forgotten. Our science is only operational from a streaming down of combined little letters and drawings.

Sous le pont Mirabeau, like under that of a journal that was mine in which I had put up as an ensign a bridge-ear borrowed from Horus Apollo, sous le pont Mirabeau coule la Seine, a primal scene, it is a scene such, do not forget, in re-reading Freud that there may beat in it the Roman V of five o'clock. It is in the Wolfman. But moreover that one does not enjoy it, is the misfortune of the interpretation.

That the symptom sets up the order on which our politics proves to be established - this is the step that it took - implies on the other hand that everything that is articulated of this order is open to interpretation. That is why we are quite right to put psychoanalysis under the heading of politics. And this may not be a very peaceful situation, if psychoanalysis proved to be more aware of what figured in politics up to now.

It would perhaps be enough, to put our hope elsewhere, which is what my men of letters do, if I can make them my companions. It would be enough for us to make a different use of writing than that of a tribune or tribunal in order for there to operate in it other words that we have to make up ourselves, that we would have to make our tribute.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I said, and I never forget it: there is no meta-language. Any logic is falsified by starting from a language-object, as it does not fail to do up to today. There is then no meta-language, but the writing that is fabricated from language might perhaps be the material that would bring about a strain and make me change my remarks. I see no other hope for those who are writing today.

(124) Is it possible in short to constitute from the littoral a discourse such that it is characterised, as I am putting the question this year, by not being emitted by a semblance? This is obviously the question that is only proposed in what is called avant-garde literature, which itself is a littoral fact and, therefore, is not sustained by a semblance, but for all that proves nothing, except, by showing the break that a discourse alone can produce. I say produce, put forward with a production effect, this is the schema of my quadrupeds of last year.

What a literature seems to claim in its ambition, is what I pinpoint as lituraterrir, it is to organise itself by a movement that it calls scientific. It is a fact that in science, writing has done marvels, and that everything shows that this marvel is not ready to run dry. Nevertheless, physical science finds itself, is going to find itself led to the consideration of the symptom in events by pollution. There are already scientists who are sensitive to it by the pollution of the part of the terrestrial that is called without any further critique, environment. This is the idea of Uxküll: Umwelt, but behaviourised, namely, completely cretinised.

In order to litturaterrir myself, I point out that in furrowing I created here images certainly but no metaphor: writing is this

http://www.lacaninireland.com

furrowing. What I wrote is included in it. When I talk about enjoyment, I legitimately invoke the audience I accumulate, and no less naturally the one I deprive myself of; the crowd you are keeps me busy. I prepared the furrowing.

That there should be included in the Japanese tongue, this is where I take things up again, a writing-effect, this is the important thing, offers us some resources to give an example of lituratterrir. The important thing is that the effect of writing remains attached to writing. That what conveys the writing effect in it is a specialised writing by the fact that in Japanese, this specialised writing can be read in two different pronunciations. In oniomi – I am not trying to bluff you, I will say as little Japanese as possible – on-yomi that is how it is called, and its pronunciation in character, is pronounced as such distinctly in kun-yomi, the way in which one says in Japanese what the character means.

But naturally you are going to walk straight into it, namely, that under the pretext that the character is a letter, you are going to believe that I am in the process of saying that in Japanese, the wreckage of the signifier flows on the river of the signified. It is the (125) letter and not the sign that here acts as a support to the signifier. But like anything else, by following the law of metaphor which I reminded you in recent times constitutes the essence of language, it is always moreover through it that language, discourse, catches anything whatsoever in the net of the signifier, therefore writing itself.

Only there you are! It is promoted from this to the function of a referent, just as essential as any things and this is what changes the status of the subject. It is through this that it takes its support from a constellated heaven and not simply from the unary trait for its fundamental identification. Well then! Precisely, there are too many of them, too many supports, it is the same thing as not to have any. That is why it takes its support, elsewhere, on 'thou'. The fact is in Japanese, you see all the grammatical forms for the slightest statement; to say something like that, anything whatsoever, there are more or less polite ways of saying it, according to the way I implicate him in the thou. I implicate him if I am Japanese. Since I am not Japanese, I do not do it, it would wear me out.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

When you have seen - it is really within everyone's reach to learn Japanese - that the slightest thing is subject in it to variations in the statement, which are variations of politeness, you will have learned something. You will have learned that in Japanese, the truth reinforces the structure of fiction that I denote in it, precisely, by adding to it the laws of politeness.

Curiously, this seems to have as a result that there is nothing to defend against the repressed, because the repressed finds itself lodging in this reference to the letter.

In other words, the subject is divided by language, but one of its registers may be satisfied with the reference to writing and the other to the exercise of speech.

This no doubt is what gave my dear friend Roland Barthes this intoxicating feeling that with all his good manners, the Japanese subject envelops nothing, at least this is what he says in a way that I recommend to you, because it is a sensational work, L'empire des signes, he entitles it. In titles, people often make an incorrect use of terms. That is done for the editors. Which means obviously that it is the empire of semblances. It is enough to read the text to notice it.

The mythical Japanese, the little commonplace Japanese, I have been told, does not think much of it, at least that is what I heard over there. And in effect, however excellent this writing of Roland

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Barthes may be, I would oppose to it what I am saying today (126) namely, that nothing is more distinct from the void hollowed out by writing than the semblance. First of all by the fact that it is the first of my bowls that are always ready to give enjoyment a welcome, or at least to invoke it by its artifice. From our practices, nothing communicates less of itself than a particular subject who, when all is said and done, hides nothing. He only has to manipulate you, and I assure you that he does not fail to do so. For me it is a delight, because I adore that. You are an element among others of the ceremonial in which the subject is composed precisely by being able to decompose himself. The bunraku, perhaps some of you saw that sometime ago when they came to Paris. I went to see it again over there, I had already seen it the first time. Well then, the bunraku is the mainspring, it shows the very ordinary structure for those to whom it gives their very customs. You know that you see alongside the puppet clearly in view the people who are operating it, moreover as in the bunraku, everything that is said in a Japanese conversation may be read by a reciter. This is what must have relieved Barthes. Japan is the place where it is most natural to be supported by an interpreter, one is very happy, one can duplicate oneself with an interpreter, this does not require in any case an interpretation. You can imagine how relieved I was! Japanese, is the perpetual translation of the events of language.

What I love, is that the only communication that I had, outside the Europeans of course that I am able to understand with our usual misunderstanding, the only one that I had with a Japanese is also the only one which, there as elsewhere, might possibly be a communication, by not being a dialogue, it is the scientific paper (communication).

I went to see an eminent biologist whom I will not name, by reason of the Japanese rules of politeness, this encouraged him to show me his works, naturally, where they are done, on the blackboard. The fact that for lack of information I understood nothing about it, in no way rules out that what he wrote, his formulae, by being entirely valid, valid for the molecules of which my descendants will make themselves the subject without me ever having to know how I will transmit them to them which made it likely that for my part I classify them among living beings.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

An asceticism of writing takes nothing away from the advantages that we can find in literary criticism. This seems to me, to close the loop on something more coherent, because of what I already put forward, this it seems to me can only get across by joining up with this impossible "it is written" from which there will be established perhaps one day the sexual relationship.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 8: Wednesday 19 May 1971

If I begin with the abruptness, in short, of what I have to tell you, it could be explained as follows. The fact is that in what we are exploring, starting from a certain discourse, mine as it happens, mine in so far as it is that of the analyst, let us say that this determines functions, in other words, that the functions are only determined starting from a certain discourse. So then, at this level of functions determined by a certain discourse, I can establish the equivalence that writing is enjoyment (l'écrit, c'est la jouissance). Naturally, that can only be situated within this first articulation of functions determined by a discourse. Let us say that it holds exactly the same place within these functions.

This being stated quite abruptly, why? In order that you may put it to the test. You will see that it will always lead you somewhere. And even by preference to something exact. This of course does not dispense me from taking care to introduce you into it along suitable paths, namely, not those which justify it for me, given from where I speak to you, but those by which it can be explained. I suppose, I do not necessarily suppose, that I am addressing myself here always to analysts, besides, this is what accounts for the fact that my discourse is not easily followed. It is very precisely in so far as there is something that, in the discourse of the analyst, creates an obstacle to a certain type of inscription. This inscription, nevertheless, is what I leave, it is what I propose, it is what I hope will get across, will get across from a point, from which, as one might say, the analytic discourse takes on a new energy.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(128) So then, it is a matter then of making tangible how the transmission of a letter has a relationship with something essential, fundamental in the organisation of discourse whatever it may be, namely, enjoyment. For that of course, it is necessary that each time I get you into tune with the thing. How to do it, if not by recalling the basic example from which I started, namely, that it is very explicitly by studying the letter as such, in so far as what?, in so far as, as I said, it has a feminising effect, that I open my Ecrits. This letter in short, I underlined it again the last time functions very specifically in the fact that no one knows anything about its content, and that up to the end, when all is said and done, no one will know anything about it.

It is very exemplary. It is very exemplary in the fact that, naturally, it is only to the simpleton and even there, I think all the same it is only to the simpleton that the idea has not come, that this letter is something as summary, as crude, as something that might bear witness to what is commonly called a sexual relationship. Even though it may have been written by a man and it is said and it is underlined by a nobleman, by a nobleman and to a Queen, it is obvious that it is...that this is not what creates the drama, and that this letter, is in the style of the Court, as I might say, namely, something well grounded, is the best definition that can be given about the distribution of enjoyment. It is in the style of the Court that in this distribution, it puts what one can call properly speaking the sexual relationship in its place, namely, quite obviously, the lowest one. No one picks out as remarkable the services that a great lady may in this respect receive from a lackey.

With the Queen, of course, and precisely because it is the Queen, things ought to have a different emphasis. But first of all, then, it is

http://www.lacaninireland.com

posited, what we know from experience, is that a man born if I might say from a certain ancestry is one who cannot take umbrage at a liaison of his wife except in the measure of decency, namely, of respecting the proper forms. The only thing that could raise an objection to it is of course the introduction of bastards into the line of descent, but even that, after all, may serve to rejuvenate the bloodline. We see ourselves here obviously, in the framework that, even though it is not especially present in contemporary society, is nonetheless exemplary and fundamental in order to think out what is involved in social relationships. By this it can be see, I am saying in short that, there is nothing like an order founded on artifice to make there appear this element which here, in appearance, is precisely the (129) one which must appear irreducible in the real, namely, the function of need. If I have told you that, there is an order in which it is altogether put in its place, that a subject however highly placed, reserves for himself this irreducible share of enjoyment, the minimal share that cannot be sublimated, as Freud explicitly puts it, only an order founded on artifice, I specified the Court, the Court in so far as it duplicates the artefact of nobility with this second artefact of an organised distribution of enjoyment, and it is only there that need can decently find its place. The need explicitly specified as such is sexual need.

Only what appears on the one hand to specify the natural, as what, from a point of view that is a biological theorising of the sexual relationship, might make of need the starting point for what must result from it, namely, reproduction, we note that if the artefact is satisfying for a certain limited type of theorising on the one hand, on the other, it obviously yields to the fact that reproduction may moreover in this case not be, in quotes, a 'legitimate' reproduction. This need, this irreducibility in the sexual relationship, one can admit, of course, that it always exists, and Freud affirms it. But what is certain, is that it is not measurable - as long as it is not explicitly, and it can only be so in an artefact, in the artefact of the relation to the

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Other with a capital O – it is not measurable, and it is indeed in this element of indetermination that there is signed what is fundamental, which is very precisely that the sexual relationship is not inscribable, cannot be grounded as a relationship.

This indeed is why the letter, the letter from which I start to open my Ecrits, is designated by the fact that it is, and by the fact of how it indicates everything that Freud himself develops, which is that if, if it can be used for something that is of the order of sex, it is certainly not a sexual relationship, but a relationship, let us say, that is sexed (sexué). The difference between the two is the following. It is that, this is what Freud proved, the decisive thing he contributed, the fact is that by the mediation of the unconscious, we glimpse that everything that belongs to language has to deal with sex, is in a certain relationship with sex, but very specifically in that the sexual relationship cannot, at least up to the present moment, in any way be inscribed in it. The so called sexualisation by Freudian doctrine of what is involved in functions that are called subjective, provided one situates them clearly, situates them in the order of language, the so-called sexualisation consists essentially in the fact that what ought to result from language, namely, that the sexual relation in some way or (130) other should be able to be inscribed in it, shows precisely, and this in fact, shows its failure, it is not inscribable. You already see functioning here something that forms part of this effect of setting aside, this effect of division which is the one with which we still regularly have to deal, and it is indeed for that reason that you must in a way form yourself in it. The fact is that I state for example that for the sexual relationship, it is precisely in the measure that something fails (échoue), fails because it is – is it stated in language? - but precisely what I said is not 'stated', it is 'inscribable', inscribable in that what is required, that what is required for it to have a function, is that from language, something can be produced which is explicitly a writing as such of the function. Namely, this something that I already once symbolised for you in the simplest fashion, namely, f, in a certain relationship with x (f→x).

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then, at the moment of saying that language is this something that does not take into account the sexual relationship, how does it not take it into account? By the fact that the inscription that it is able to comment, there is no way that this inscription can be, because it is in this that it consists, can be what I define as an effective inscription of something which is supposed to be the sexual relationship in so far as it would put into relationship the two poles, the two terms which would be entitled man and woman, in so far as this man and this woman are sexes respectively specified as masculine and feminine, in whom, in what? – in a being who speaks. In other words, who dwelling in language, draws from it this usage which is that of the word.

That is why, that is why that here it is not unimportant to put forward the letter, properly speaking, as being in a certain relationship, a relationship of a woman with what in terms of written law, is inscribed in the context where the thing happens. Namely, because of the fact that she is, under the title of Queen, the image of the woman as conjoined to the King. It is in as far as something is incorrectly symbolised here, and typically around the relationship as sexual – and it is not indifferent that precisely it can only be incarnated in beings of fiction – it is in this measure that the fact that a letter, that a letter should be addressed to her, takes on its value, takes on the value that I designate to read myself, to state myself in my own remarks, this sign, this sign, I mean the letter, is indeed that of the woman "because she valorises her being in it, by establishing it outside the law, which still contains her through the effect of its origins, in a position of signifier, indeed of fetish". It is clear that without the introduction of psychoanalysis, such a statement, which (131) is nevertheless the one from which there proceeds, I would say, the revolt of the woman, such a statement saying that the law always contains her through the effect of her origins in a position of signifier, even of fetish, could not of course, I repeat, be stated outside the introduction of psychoanalysis.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then, it is precisely in this that the sexual relationship is, as I might say, made into an affair of state (étatisé), namely, by being incarnated in that of the King and the Queen, highlighting the fictional structure of the truth, it is starting from there that the letter takes on its function, its effect, which is surely posited by being in relationship with deficiency, the deficiency marked by a certain arbitrary and fictive promotion of the sexual relationship, and that it is here that, taking on its value, it poses its question. It is all the same an opportunity here – you should not consider that this is connected in some way in a direct fashion with what I have just recalled, but this sort of jump, of change of phase, is properly required by the point to which I want to lead you, it is an opportunity to mark that here there is confirmed, of course, there is confirmed the fact that the truth only progresses, only progresses from a structure of fiction. Namely, that precisely, in its essence, it is from the fact that there is promoted somewhere a structure of fiction, which is properly the very essence of language, that something can be produced which is what? But precisely, this sort of questioning, this sort of pressure, of circumscribing, which puts the truth, as I might say, up against the wall of verification.

That is nothing other than the dimension of science. This is what shows precisely that as regards the path by which there is motivated, the path by which we see science progressing, the fact is that logic plays no small part in it. Whatever may be the originally, fundamentally, basically fictitious character of what makes up the material by which language is articulated, it is clear that there is a path that is called verification. It is what is attached to grasping where the fiction, as I might say, comes up short, and what brings it to a halt. It is clear that here, whatever it may be that has allowed us to write, and you will later see what that means, the progress of logic, I mean the written path along which it has progressed, it is clear that this checking is quite efficacious because it is inscribed within the very system of a fiction. It is called contradiction.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

That if science apparently has progressed quite differently than along the path of tautology, this in no way changes the import of my remark, namely, that the summoning, brought to bear from a certain point, on truth to be verifiable, is precisely what has forced the (132) abandonment of all sorts of other supposedly intuitive premises, and that if – I am not going to go back on it today, I have sufficiently insisted on the characteristic of everything that preceded, opened up the path to the Newtonian discovery, for example – it is quite precisely from the fact that no fiction will prove to be satisfying other than one of them which precisely had to abandon any recourse to intuition and limit itself to something that can be inscribed. This therefore is why we have to attach ourselves to what is involved in the inscribable in the relationship to verification. In order to finish, of course, with what I said about the effect of the letter in The purloined letter, what did I explicitly say? That it feminises those who find themselves in the position of being in its shadow.

Of course, it is here that we touch on the importance of this notion, the function of the shadow, in as much as already the last time I stated to you what precisely a writing is, I mean something that presented itself in a literal, or literary, form. The shadow, in order to be produced, needs a source of light. Yes, and what I did was only tangible for you because of what is involved in the Aufklärung, from something that preserves the structure of fiction. I am speaking about the historical epoch, of course, which was not short, and it may be of use to us, it is so here, and this is what I am doing, to retrace its paths, or to take them up again. But in themselves, it is clear that what creates the light, is precisely what, starting from this field, defines itself as being that of the truth. And it is as such, as such a way, that the light that it spreads at every instant, even if it has this effect, effective by the fact that what is opaque in it projects a shadow, and that it is this shadow which carries the effect, that we always have to question this truth itself about its structure as fiction.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is in this way that when all is said and done it emerges that, as it is stated, stated explicitly in this écrit, the letter, of course, it is not the woman, the woman whose address it bears, that it satisfies in reaching its destination, but the subject, namely, very precisely, to redefine it, what is divided in the phantasy. Namely, reality in so far as it is generated by a structure of fiction. This indeed is how the tale ends, at least in the way that in a second text, my one, I redo it, and it is from that that we should start to further question again what is involved in the letter. It is very precisely in the measure that this has never been done that, in order to do it, I ought to prolong in the same way this discourse on the letter.

(133) There you are! What we have to start from is all the same the fact that it is not for nothing that I summon you, that I call on you, to neglect nothing that is produced in the domain of logic. It is certainly not that you should oblige yourselves, as one might say, to follow its constructions and its detours. It is in the fact that, nowhere like in these constructions that entitle themselves "symbolic logic", nowhere does there better appear a deficit of any possibility of reflection. I mean that nothing is more embarrassed, this is well known is it not, than the introduction of a treatise of logic, the impossibility of logic to posit itself in a justifiable way is something that is quite striking. This is why the experience of reading these treatises, and they are all the more striking, of course, in the measure that they are more modern, as they are more in the vanguard of what effectively and very effectively constitutes a progress of logic. This is a project of the inscription of what is called logical articulation, the articulation of logic itself being incapable of defining itself or its goals, or its source, nor anything whatsoever that even resembles a [scientific] subject. It is very strange. It is very strange and it is precisely this that makes it very suggestive, because this indeed is what makes it worthwhile to touch, to explore, to explore what is involved in it, what is involved in something which only situates itself undoubtedly with respect to language. And to grasp that if perhaps in this language, nothing that is only ever put forward in an awkward way as not being a correct usage of this language, can very precisely not be stated except by not being able to justify itself, or by only being able to justify itself in a most confused way, by all sorts of attempts like, for example, those which consist in dividing language into an object language and a metalanguage. This is completely contrary to what is immediately demonstrated, namely, that there is no way for a single instant of speaking about this so called object language without using of course, not a metalanguage, but well and truly a language which is an everyday language. But in this very failure there can be exposed what is involved in the articulation that specifically has the closest relationship with the functioning of language, namely, the following articulation, which is, namely, that the relationship, the sexual relationship, cannot be written.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then, in this respect, and with the goal only, as I might say, of making some movements that recall to us the dimension in which we move around, I will recall how first of all there is presented, there is presented what inaugurates the outline of logic, as formal logic, in (134) Aristotle. Naturally I am not going to take up again for you – even though it would be very instructive, it would be very instructive but after all, each one of you can simply take the trouble to open the Prior analytics, you can test yourself against this reprise. Open then the Prior analytics, and you will see what a syllogism is. And after all it is from the syllogism that we must start, at least it is from there that I am taking things up again, since at our second last meeting, it was on this that I ended.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I do not want to take it up by giving examples, because we are limited by time for that, by giving examples of all the forms of the syllogism. Let it be enough for us to highlight rapidly what is involved in the Universal and the Particular, and quite simply in their affirmative form. I am going to take the syllogism described as Darii, namely, made up of one Universal affirmative and two Particulars, and I am going to recall to you everything that is involved in a certain way of presenting things. Well then, it is simply that, here nothing in any case can function, can function except by substituting into the texture of discourse, to substitute for the signifier the hole made by replacing it by the letter. Because, if we state the following, just taking Darii, that, to use Aristotle's terms, "every man is good", the "every man" is the Universal and I have sufficiently underlined for you, sufficiently prepared you in any case to understand the fact that I can with nothing else recall, that the Universal does not have, in order to stand up, the need for the existence of any man. "Every man is good" may mean that there is no man who is not good, everything that is not good is not a man, right? Second articulation: "Some animals are men", and third articulation, which is called the conclusion, the second being the minor, "therefore some animals are good".

It is clear that this specifically only holds up from the usage of the letter for the reason that, it is clear that, unless they are supported by a letter, there is no equivalence between the "every man", the "every man" subject of the Universal, which here plays the role of what is called the middle term, and this same middle term at the place where it is employed as an attribute, namely, that "some animals are men". Because in truth, this distinction, which deserves to be made, nevertheless demands a lot of care. The man of "every man", when he is the subject, implies a function of a Universal which very precisely only its symbolic status gives it as a support. Namely, that something is stated as "man".

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(135) Under the species of the attribute and to sustain that some animals are men, it is necessary of course, it is the only thing that distinguishes them, to state that what we call "man" among the animals, is very precisely this type of animal which happens to inhabit language. Of course, it is justifiable in that case to posit that man is good. It is a limitation, it is a limitation very precisely by the fact that the thing on which there can be grounded that man is good depends on the fact, brought out a long time ago, and before Aristotle, that the idea of good can only be established from language. For Plato, it is at the foundation of it; there is no language, possible articulation, since for Plato, language is the world of ideas, there is no articulation possible without this primary idea of the good. It is quite possible to question differently what is involved in the good in language, and simply in this case, to have to deduce the consequences which will result from it for the universal position of the fact that "man is good". As you know, this is what Meng-Tzu does, and it was not for nothing that I put him forward in my previous lectures. Good, what does that mean? Good for what? Or is it simply to say, as has been said for some time "you are very kind, vous êtes bon". If things have got to a certain point that, in the putting in question of what is truth and, moreover, discourse, it is indeed perhaps in effect this change of emphasis that has come about as regards the use of the word "good". Good, good! No need to specify: good for the services, good for war, is saying too much about it. The "you are good" has its absolute value. In fact, this is the central link that there is good in discourse; once you dwell in a certain type of discourse, well then you are ready (bon) for it to command you.

This indeed is how we are led to the function of the master signifier, which I underlined is not inherent in language in itself, and that language only requires, anyway....I mean, only makes possible a certain determined number of discourses and that all of those at least

http://www.lacaninireland.com

up to the present, I articulated especially for you last year, that none of them eliminates the function of the master signifier.

To say that some animals are good, is obviously in these conditions not at all a simply formal conclusion. And this was why I underlined earlier that the use of logic, whatever it may state itself, cannot in any way be reduced to a tautology. That some animals are good precisely, is not limited to those who are men, as the existence of (136) those that are called domestic animals implies. And it is not for nothing that for some time I have underlined that you cannot say that they do not have some speech. If they lack language, and, of course, much more the resources of discourse, that does not render them any less subject of the word. It is even this that distinguishes them and that makes them means of production. This, as you see opens a door for us that might lead us a little bit further. I would point out to you that...I leave it to your meditation that in the commandments described as the Decalogue, the woman is assimilated to the aforesaid in the following form: "You shall not covet the wife of your neighbour nor his ox, nor his ass", and anyway there is an enumeration which is very precisely that of the means of production. This is not to give you an opportunity to snigger but to reflect by bringing together what I am pointing out to you here in passing, with what formerly, formerly I wanted to say about what was expressed in the commandments, namely, nothing other than the laws of the word, which limits their interest. But it is very important precisely to limit the interest of things in order to know why, really, they have an effect.

Good! Well then, this having been said, faith, as well as I could, namely, by a clearing of the way which is as usual, is that not so, the one I am forced to make of the inverted A, of the buffalo head, I pass on to the next stage, namely what allows us to inscribe the progress of logic. You know that something happened which moreover is very, very beautiful, like that, a little bit more than 2000 years ago,

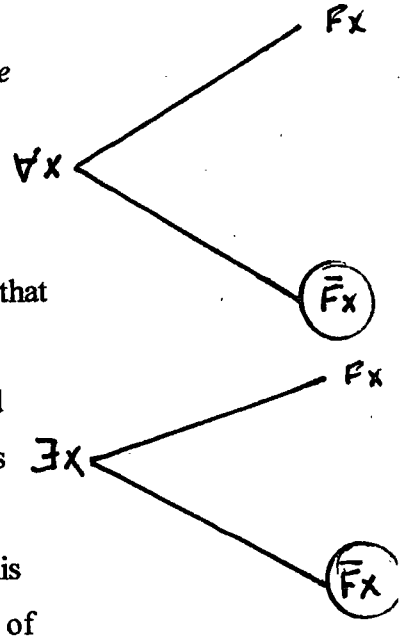
http://www.lacaninireland.com

something happened that is called a reinscription of this first attempt made by means of holes in the right place. Namely, by the replacing of terms by letters, terms described as major, minor and middle terms, the terms described as extreme and middle terms, major and minor being the proposition, I apologise for this lapse. You know that with the logic inaugurated by de Morgan and Boole, we have come, it was only inaugurated by them and not pushed to its final point, we arrived at the formulae described as quantifiers.

- Who cannot hear? Nobody? How long have you not been able to hear me?

- When you were at the board.

- So then up to then it was OK? I am grateful to you for telling me when it's not working out. So then listen, I am going to write it rapidly and I'll come back here.



(137) Good. So then I have made these little circles to show you that the bar is not a bar between two f(x), which would besides mean absolutely nothing, and that the bar that you find in the right hand column between each one, each one of the pairs of f(x), this bar is uniquely linked to the f(x) which is below, namely, signifies its negation. Time is passing quicker than I had imagined, so that this may force me to shorten things a little. The fruit of the operation of complete inscription, the one that was allowed, suggested, by the progress of mathematics, it is because mathematics managed through algebra to be entirely written, that the idea of making use of the letter for something other than for making holes came. Namely, of writing in a different way our four kinds of propositions, in so far as they are centred on the All, on some, namely, on words that it would really not be difficult to show what ambiguities they supported. So then, starting from that idea, people wrote what presented itself first of all as subject. On condition of affecting it with this inverted A, we could take it as the equivalent of "every x" and that henceforth, what was at stake, was to know in what measure a certain "every x" could satisfy a relationship of function.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I think that I do not need to underline here – nevertheless I have to, otherwise all of this will appear empty – that the thing has altogether its full sense in mathematics, namely, that precisely in so far as we remain on the letter where there lies the power of mathematics, this x on the right, in so far as it is unknown, can legitimately be posited, or not posited, as being able to find its place in what happens to be the function that corresponds to it; namely, where the same x is taken as a variable. To go quickly, because I told you that it was getting late, I am going to illustrate it. I underlined, I said, I stated, that the x at the left, in the ∀ of x specifically, is an unknown. Let us take, for example, the root of a second-degree equation. Can I write, for every root of a second-degree equation, that it can be inscribed in this (138) function that defines x as a variable, the one from which real numbers are established? For those who might be completely like that, for whom this is really a language they have never heard, I underlined that real numbers, are in any case, for them, all the numbers they know. Namely, including irrational numbers even if they do not know what they are. They should simply know that real numbers, anyway, are done with, they have been given a status; since they do not suspect what imaginary numbers are, I am only giving them an indication to give them an idea that it is worthwhile making a function of real numbers. Good! Well then, it is quite clear that it is not true that for any x, namely, any root of a second-degree equation, one can say that every root of a second-degree equation satisfies the function on which real numbers are founded. Quite simply because there are roots of second-degree equations that are imaginary numbers, which do not form part of the function of real numbers.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Good! What I want to underline for you is the following, it is that with that, people think they have said enough. Well then, no. Enough has not been said, because moreover for everything that is involved in the relationships of every x as well as the relationship that people think they can substitute for some – with which one can be satisfied on occasion – namely, that there exist roots of the second-degree equation which satisfy the function of the real number, and also, that there exist roots of the second-degree equation that do not satisfy it. But in one case as in the other, what results, far from us being able to see here the purely formal transposition, the complete homology of Universal and Particular affirmatives and negatives respectively, the fact is, that what this means, is not that the function is not true. What can be meant by the fact that a function is not true? From the moment that you write a function, this function is what it is. Even if it goes way beyond the function of real numbers. This means that as regards the unknown that constitutes the root of the second-degree equation, I cannot write to lodge in it the function of real numbers. This is something quite different to the Universal negative, whose properties moreover were well designed for us to put it in suspense, as I sufficiently underlined at one time. It is exactly the same at the level of there exists an x, there exists an x in connection with which, there exist certain x's, certain roots of the second-degree equations in connection with which I can write the function described as real numbers by saying that they satisfy it. There are others in (139) connection with which – it is not a matter of denying the function of real numbers – but in connection with which I cannot write the function of real numbers.

Well then, this is going to introduce us into the third stage which is the one, in short, that everything that I have said to you today is designed, of course, to introduce you to. The fact is, as you have clearly seen, I slipped quite naturally, by trusting the memory of what it is a matter of re-articulating, I slipped over to writing, namely, that the function, with its little bar above, symbolised something completely inept with respect to what I had effectively to say. You have perhaps noticed that, it never entered my head, at least up to the present, nor yours either, to think that the bar of negation perhaps had something to do, to say, not in the right-hand column but in the left. Let us try, what advantage can we draw from it? What can we have to say about the fact that the function did not vary, let us call it Φx, as it happens, and to put, which we have never had to do up to the present, the bar of negation. It can be said or indeed written. Let us begin by saying it: "It is not about every x that the function Φ of x can be written; it is not from an existing x that the function of Φ of x can be written".

http://www.lacaninireland.com

$$\forall x \,.\, \overline{\Phi} x$$

There you are! I still have not said whether it was inscribable or not. But in expressing myself in this way, I am stating something whose only reference is the existence of writing. In a word, there is a world between the two negations, the one which ensures that I do not write it, that I exclude it, and, as someone who was a rather subtle grammarian formerly expressed it, it is forclusive. The function will not be written. I want to know nothing about it. The other is discordant. It is not in so far as there is a whole x that I can write or not write Φ of x; it is not in so far as there exists an x that I can write or not write $\overline{\Phi}$ of x.

This is very properly what puts us at the heart of the impossibility of writing what is involved in the sexual relationship. Because after there has subsisted for some time as regards this relationship, the well known structures of fiction, those on which there repose all religions in particular, we have come, and this through analytic experience, to the foundation of the fact that this relationship cannot work without a third term, which is properly speaking the phallus. Naturally I mean, (140) as I might say, a certain little understanding being formulated that this third term, is self-evident; precisely there is a third term, and this is why there must be a relationship! It is very difficult, of course, to image that, to show that there is something unknown there, man. There is something unknown here, woman. And that the third term qua third term, is precisely characterised by the fact, which is precisely, that it is not a middle term (médium), that if one links it to one of the two terms, the term of man for example, one can be certain that it will not communicate with the other, and inversely. That it is specifically this which is the characteristic of the third term. That naturally, even if the function of attribute was one day invented, why would it not be in relationship, in the first ridiculous steps of the structure of the semblance, that every man is phallic, every woman is not so. Now what has to be established, is something quite different. It is that some man is, starting from something that the second formula expresses here, starting from the fact that it is not as a particular that he is so. Man is a phallic function in so far as he is every man. But as you know, there are the greatest doubts to be had about the fact that every man exists. That is what is at stake: it is that he can only be so under the heading of every man, namely, of a signifier, nothing more.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

$$\overline{\exists x} \cdot \overline{\Phi x}$$

And that on the contrary, what I stated, what I told you, is that for the woman, what is at stake is exactly the contrary. Namely, what is expressed by the discordant statement above, the one that I only wrote as I might say by not writing it. Because I am underlining that what is at stake is a discordant which is only sustained by the statement, it is that the woman, the woman can only fill her place in the sexual relationship, she can only be it under the heading of a-woman, d'une-femme. As I strongly emphasised, there is no every woman.

What I wanted to open up today, to illustrate for you, is that logic carries the mark of the sexual impasse, and that by following it in its

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(141) movement, in its progress, namely, in the field where it appears to have least to do with what is at stake in what is articulated as regards our experience, namely, analytic experience, you will discover in it the same impasses, the same obstacles, the same gaps, and in a word the same absence of the closure of a fundamental triangle.

I am astonished that things, I mean time, has gone so quickly, with what I had to open out for you today and that I now have to interrupt myself. I think that it will be easy for you perhaps before we meet again on the second Wednesday of the month of June, to notice for yourselves the appropriateness of this, from which it results, from which it results, for example, that nothing can be grounded about the status of man, I mean seen from analytic experience, except by constructing artificially, mythically, this every man with this presumed one, the mythical father of Totem and Taboo, namely, the one who is capable of satisfying the enjoyment of all the women.

But inversely, there are consequences in the position of the woman, in the fact, that it is only, starting from being a-woman that she can be established in what is inscribable by not being so. Namely, what is involved in the sexual relationship remaining gaping open, and that there arrives the following, so easy to read in what is involved in the so precious function of hysterics. The hysterics are the ones who, as regards what is involved in the sexual relationship, tell the truth. It is difficult to see how this path of psychoanalysis could have opened up if we had not had them. That neurosis – that one neurosis at the very least, I will demonstrate it also for the other – that one neurosis should not be strictly the point at which there is articulated the truth of a failure, which is no less true anywhere else than where the truth is told. This is where we should start from to give its meaning to the Freudian discovery. What the hysteric articulates is, of course, that as regards constructing the every man, she is just as capable as the every man himself, namely, by imagination. So then because of that, she does not need him. But if by chance the phallus interests her, namely, what she sees herself as castrated of, as Freud sufficiently underlined, only by the progress of the treatment, of analytic treatment, she only has to put up with it. Because we have to believe that she has this enjoyment, that she has it herself, and that if by chance sexual relationships interest her, she has to be interested in this third element, the phallus. And since she can only be interested in it through the relationship to the man, in so far as it is not sure that he even has one, her whole policy will be turned towards what I call having at least one of them.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(142) This notion of at least one, it is on this, good God, that I end, because the time shows me my limit. You will see that I will subsequently, of course, have to put it in function with what, of course, you already see there, already articulated, namely, that of the un en peluce, which does not come only from here, is that not so, as I wrote it last time: un en peluce. It is not for nothing that I wrote it like that. I think that this may all the same have some echoes for some people. We will write the au-moins-un as essential function of the relationship, in so far as it situates the woman with respect to the key third point of the phallic function, in this way because it is inaugural. It inaugurates a dimension which is very precisely the one on which I insisted for a discourse which might not be a semblance, the hommoinzin.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 9: Wednesday 9 June 1971

I am going to dwell today on something that I took the trouble to write out. There you are. I am not saying this, simply like that, in passing. It is not superfluous. I will allow myself, like that eventually, to hum something about some term or other of writing (l'écrit). But if you have sufficiently heard what I have been tackling this year about the function of writing, well then, I will have no need to justify any further that it is effectively an act. In effect it is not a matter of indifference that what I am going to say now is written. It has absolutely not the same import if I simply say or if I tell you that I wrote.....

- We can't hear you!

A man – can you hear me? – and a woman can understand one another, I am not saying no to that; they can as such hear one another crying out. That would be a jest if I had not written it. The written supposes that at least you have some hint, at least some of you, of what I said at another time about the cry. I cannot go back on it. It can happen that they cry out, in the case where they do not otherwise succeed in understanding one another, otherwise, namely, about an affair which is the test of their understanding. There is no lack of these affairs, including on occasion - this is the best of them - understanding in bed. There is no lack of these affairs, certainly, then, and this is why they lack something, namely, that to make oneself understood as man, as woman, which means sexually, would the man and the woman only understand one another by saying nothing? There is no question of that, because the man, the woman,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

have no need to speak to be caught up in a discourse. As such, as such, drawing on the same term as I used earlier, as such, they are facts of discourse. A smile here would be enough, it would seem, to (144) posit that they are not just that. No doubt, and who does not agree. But that they are also that, effects of discourse, fixates the smile and it is only in this way, fixated by this remark, that the smile on ancient statues finds its meaning. Infatuation, for its part, sniggers. It is in a discourse, then, that natural men and women, as one might say, have to valorise themselves as such.

There is no discourse except a semblance. If that was not self-evident, I exposed it, and I will recall how it is articulated. The semblance is only stated starting from the truth. This truth, no doubt, is never evoked in science. That is no reason for us to be any more concerned about it. It can do quite well without us. In order to make itself heard, it is enough to say, "I speak", and people believe it because it is true: whoever speaks, speaks. The only wager, I am recalling what I said about the wager, illustrating it with Pascal, the only wager is about what it says. As truth it can only say the semblance about enjoyment, and it wins over sexual enjoyment on every occasion.

I would like here, to put on the board for the eventual use of those who have not come these last times, the algebraic figures with which I thought I could punctuate what was at stake in the bind (coinçage) to which one is led, by writing what is involved in the sexual relationship.

$$\overline{\forall x}.\,\Phi x \qquad \overline{\exists x}.\,\overline{\Phi x}$$

The two bars put on the symbols on the left and with which there are respectively situated everything that is capable of answering to the semblance of sexual enjoyment, the two bars of negation, as they say, are such kind that precisely they are not to be written because what cannot be written, one quite simply does not write. One can say that they are not to be written, that the function of x cannot be written about every x, and that it is from this is not all that the woman establishes herself. There does not exist an x which satisfies the function from which there is defined the variable of being the function of x, that it does not exist, it is from this that there can be formulated what is involved in the man, in the male I mean. But precisely here the negation only has the function which is described as the Verneinung, namely, that it is only posited by having first of all put forward that there exists some man, and that it is with respect to every woman that a woman is situated. This is a reminder. That does not form part of what I have written which I am now taking up again.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(145) That I am taking up again. Which means that – I see that it is rather widespread, you are quite right in fact to be taking notes, the only important thing about writing is that afterwards you can situate yourself with respect to it. Good! Well then! You would do well to follow me in my discipline of the name, n.o.m. I will have to come back to it, especially the next time which will be the session with which we will conclude this year. What is proper to a name, is to be a proper name, even for a drop (tombé) among others for the use of a common noun, it is not a waste of time to find a proper use for it. And when a name has remained sufficiently proper, have no hesitation, take the example, and call the thing by its name, the Freudian thing for example, as I did, as I like to imagine you know. I will come back to it the next time. To name something is a summons, moreover in what I wrote, the Freudian thing in question, stands up and struts its stuff. I am not the one who dictates to it. It would even be perfect peace. Like the perfect peace of the semblance to which so many lives tie themselves. If I were not as a man, in the masculine, exposed here to the wind of castration. Re-read my text. The truth for its part, my unscrewable (imbaisable), partner is certainly exposed to the same wind. It even carries it: to be up to date (dans le vent) is that. But this wind does not make the slightest difference to it. For the reason that enjoyment is of little account to it. Because it leaves truth to the semblance. This semblance, for its part, also has a name, taken up from the mysterious times when the mysteries were being played out, nothing more, where it named the knowledge presupposed by fecundity and as such offered to adoration in the figure of the semblance of an organ. This semblance exposed by pure truth is, we have to recognise, rather phallic (assez phalle), rather involved in what for us is initiated by the virtue of coitus, namely, the selection of genotypes, with the reproduction of the phenotype and everything that results from it, sufficiently involved then to merit this ancient name of phallus. Even though it is clear that the inheritance that it covers nowadays is reduced to the acephalic nature of this selection, in other words the impossibility of subordinating the enjoyment described as sexual to that which sub rosa is supposed to specify the choice of the man and the woman taken as carriers each one of a precise batch of genotypes. Because in the best of cases, it is the phenotype that guides this choice. In truth, make no mistake, a proper name, because the phallus is still one, is only completely stable on the map where it designates a desert. These are the only things on a map that do not change their name. It is remarkable that even the deserts produced in the name of a religion, which is not rare, are never designated by the (146) name that was devastating for them. A desert is only re-baptised by being fecundated. This is not the case for sexual enjoyment, which the progress of science does not seem to be able to conquer for knowledge. It is on the contrary by means of the dam that it constitutes to the advent of the sexual relationship in discourse that its place was emptied out until, in psychoanalysis, it became obvious.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Such is, in the sense that this word has in Frege's logic die Bedeutung des Phallus. This indeed is why – I have my little tricks, huh? – it was in German, because it was in Germany, that I carried the message to which this title corresponds in my Ecrits, and it was to honour the centenary of the birth of Freud. It was a lovely thing in this country that was chosen out to be the place where this message had its resonance, the bewilderment that it produced. You cannot have the slightest idea, now that you are all strolling around with something like that under your arm. At that time, die Bedeutung des Phallus produced an effect. To say that I was expecting it would mean nothing, at least in my tongue. My strength is to know what it means to wait. As regards the bewilderment I am talking about, I am not taking blaming here the 25 years of racial cretinisation. This would only be to sanction that these 25 years have triumphed everywhere. I would insist rather that this die Bedeutung des Phallus is in reality a pleonasm. In language there is no Bedeutung other than the phallus. Language in its function as an existent, only connotes, in the final analysis, I said connote, huh, the impossibility of symbolising the sexual relationship among the beings that inhabit it, that inhabit language, by reason of the fact that it is from this habitat that they are able to speak. And let no one forget what I said, because speech, henceforth, is not the privilege of these beings that inhabit it that they evoke speech in everything that they dominate by the effect of discourse. It begins with my dog, for example, the one that I have been speaking about for a long time, and extends very far. The eternal silence, as someone or other has said, of infinite space, will not, like many others, other eternities, have lasted more than an instant. There is a hell of a lot of talk in the zone of the new astronomy, the one that was opened up immediately after this little remark by Pascal. It is because language is only constituted from a single Bedeutung that it borrows its structure, which consists in the fact that one can only, once one inhabits it, make use of it for metaphor, from which there result all these mythical insanities on which its inhabitants live, for metonymy, from which they take the little bit of reality that remains to them, under the form of surplus enjoying.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(147) Now this, what I have just said, only gets its stamp in history, once writing has appeared, and this is never simply an inscription,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

even if it takes on the appearance of what is put forward in the audio-visual. Writing from its origins, up to its last protean techniques, is only something that is articulated as bone (os) of which language is the flesh. And this indeed is how it proves that enjoyment, sexual enjoyment, has no bone, which we were already left in no doubt about by the habits of the organ which cuts such a comical figure in the speaking male. But writing, for its part, not language, writing provides a bone for all the enjoyments which, through discourse, open up for the speaking being; giving them bones, it underlines what was certainly accessible, but masked. Namely, that the sexual relationship is missing in the field of truth, in that the discourse that establishes it only proceeds from a semblance by only clearing the way for enjoyment that parody – this is the correct word – the one that is effective there but that remains foreign to it. Such is the Other of enjoyment, forever prohibited, the one that language will only allow a habitation for by providing it – why would I not use this image - with a diving suit.

Perhaps that means something to you, this image, huh? There are, all the same, some of you who are not so occupied by the function of trade unions that you cannot all the same be moved by our lunar exploits. Man has been dreaming about the moon for a long time. Now he has set foot on it. To really take account of what that means, you should do what I did before returning from Japan. That is a place where you can realise that dreaming about the moon was really a function. A person, whose name I will not mention, I do not want to indulge in erudition here, who is still there, locked up in fact, him, the very one. You realise what is meant by persona, it is the person himself, it is his mask that is locked in a little Japanese cupboard. It is shown to visitors.

We know that it is him, that the place to put him can be seen there, it is found in the place that is called the Silver Pavilion, at Kyoto. He dreamt about the moon. We like to believe that he contemplated it rather phallically. We like to believe it, but anyway, that leaves us somewhat embarrassed all the same. We no longer know what to make of it. The path that has been taken - is that not so? - to inscribe it, to get out of this embarrassment, you should understand that it is the achievement of the barred O of my graph, S(Ø).

http://www.lacaninireland.com

All of this is only banter. It is a banter that gives a signal, a signal to (148) me of course. It warns me that I am touching on structuralism. I am forced to touch on it, like that, naturally, it is not my fault. It is for you to judge, but I blame it on the situation that I am undergoing. Time is passing and naturally I am going to have to shorten things a little, so that it is going to become more difficult to follow what I have written. But this situation that I am undergoing, I am going to pinpoint, pinpoint it by something that is not going to appear to you right away but that I have to say between now and the time that we leave one another, in a week's time. It is what I would pinpoint as a refusal of performance. It is a sickness, a sickness of our epoch, through whose 'Fork' one has to pass, because this refusal constitutes the cult of competence. Namely, of a certain idealness (idéalité) to which I am reduced, like, moreover, many fields of science, to authorise myself before you. The result - these are anecdotes you know - my Ecrits are for example.....one of them is translated into English, Fonction et champ de la parole et du langage has been translated as The language of the self. I have just learned that in Spanish, there is also something of this type, the translation of a certain number of them is entitled: Structuralist aspects of Freud, something like that. Good, anyway, let's leave it! Competence overlooks the fact that it is based on incompetence, by proposing that its idealness should be worshipped, that is how it leads to concessions, and I am going to give you an example of this. The sentence with which I began: a man and a woman can understand one another, I am not saying no. Well there you are, it was to sugar the pill for you, but the pill does not fix anything. The notion forged in the term structuralism tends to extend the delegating that occurred

http://www.lacaninireland.com

for some time to certain specialists, the specialists of truth, the delegating of a certain void that is noticed in the rarefying of enjoyment. This is what existentialism had flawlessly picked up, after phenomenology, much more hypocritical, had thrown down the gauntlet of its breathing exercises. It occupied the places left deserted by philosophy because they were not appropriate places. At the present time, they are just about suitable as a memorial for its contribution - which is no little thing - to philosophy, to the discourse of the master which it definitively stabilised with the support of science. Marx or not, whether he put philosophy on its feet or on its head, philosophy, it is certain that philosophy in any case, for its part, was not sufficiently phallic (pas assez phalle). Let no one count on me to structuralise this business of the impossible life, as if it were not from there that life had a chance to give proof of its real. My jocund prosopopea, "I speak", in the article quoted earlier, the (149) Freudian thing, even though it was attributed in a rhetorical way to the truth in person, did not make me fall into what I drew it from. Nothing is said there except what speaking means, the irremediable division between enjoyment and the semblance. The truth is to enjoy being a semblance, and in no way to admit that the reality of each of these two halves only predominate by affirming itself as being from the other, or by lying (mentir) in alternate jets. Such is the half-saying of the truth. Its astronomy is equatorial, in other words already completely out of date when it was born from the couple night-day. An astronomy is made reasonable by submitting itself to the seasons, by being seasoned. This is an allusion to Chinese astronomy, which, for its part, was equatorial and produced nothing.

It was not his competence as a linguist, and for good reason, that allowed Freud to trace out the paths of the thing we are dealing with. What I, for my part, remind you of is that he was only able to follow these paths by demonstrating a performance in language that was nothing short of acrobatic. And that here, only linguistics allows them to be situated in a structure, in so far as it is concerned for its part with a competence that is called linguistic consciousness, which is all the same quite remarkable, precisely by never shying away from its enquiry. Hence my formula that the unconscious is structured like a language implies that at the very least, the condition of the unconscious is language. But this takes nothing away from the impact of the enigma which consists in the fact that the unconscious knows more about it than it appears to, since it is because of this surprise that I started to name it as I did. It knows about things. Naturally, right away, the aforesaid unconscious was brought up short by attributing to it all the instincts, which moreover are still there like a wet blanket. Read anything at all that is published outside my school. The whole business was sewn up, there was nothing more to be done than to put on the label addressed to the truth, precisely, which skips over it sufficiently in our time, as I might say, not to disdain the black market. I put sticks in the hinge of clandestinity by hammering out that the knowledge in question could only be analysed by being formulated as a language, indeed in a particular tongue, even if this suffers from cross-breeding, which means moreover that it does no more than these aforesaid tongues permit themselves frequently, by their own authority.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

No one challenged me about what language knows, namely die Bedeutung des Phallus, I said it but no one noticed it because it was the truth. So then, who is interested in the truth? Well, people. (150) People for whom I drew the structure of this crude image that is found in family-friendly topology. That's how it is drawn, huh? In this family-friendly topology, this is how the Klein bottle is drawn. There is no – I am coming back to it - point of its surface, that is not a topological part of the retrogression which is figured here by the circle, drawn here, of the circle which alone can properly give to this bottle the bottom that the other bottles are too proud of, because they have a bottom, God knows why!

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then it is not where people think it is, but in its structure as subject that the hysteric – I am coming to some of the people that I designated just now – conjugates the truth of her enjoyment with the implacable knowledge that she has that the Other proper to cause it, is the phallus, in other words a semblance. Who could fail to understand Freud's disappointment in grasping that the no-cure at which he arrived with the hysteric resulted in nothing more than making him claim the aforesaid semblance suddenly provided with real virtues, by having hung it at this point of retrogression which since it is not unfindable on the body, is a quite incorrect topological figuration of enjoyment in the woman. But did Freud know that? We may well ask. In the impossible solution of her problem, it is by measuring the cause in the most accurate way, in other words by making of it a just cause that the hysteric comes to agree about what she feigns to be the holder of this semblance, at least one, (au moins un) that I write - do I need to write it again? - as l'hommoinzin, in conformity with the problem (l'os) that her enjoyment requires for her to gnaw on it. Her approaches to the hommoinzin - there are three ways of writing it. There is the usual way of spelling it, huh, because (151) after all I really have to explain it to you, (1). And then there is this, there is this expressive value that I am always able to give to a scriptural operation, (2). Then on occasion you can all the same bring it together and write it a (u moins un) like that, (3), so as not to forget that occasionally it can function as the o-object (objet a)

au moins un

hommoinzin

a (u moinzin)

Since his approaches to the au moins un, can only be made by admitting to the aforesaid cynosure which captures him, depending on his tendencies, the deliberate castration that she reserves for him, his chances are limited. You must not believe that his success passes

http://www.lacaninireland.com

by way of one of these men, men in the masculine, that the semblance rather embarrasses, or who prefer it to be more frank. Those that I am designating in this way are the wise men, the masochists. That situates the wise men. They have to be brought back to their correct place. To judge the result in this way is to fail to recognise what can be expected from the hysteric if only she is willing to inscribe herself in a discourse, because her destiny is to bring the master to heel (mater le maître), so that thanks to her, he falls back on knowledge.

There you are! I am not contributing here anything more am I? What is interesting in this écrit, is that it generates a whole lot of things, but you really have to know where the points are that have to be remembered. Nothing other than to mark that the danger is the same at this crossroads as in the one that I have just pinpointed by having been warned by it that it is from there that I started earlier, I have come back to the same point, huh? I am going around in circles.

To love the truth, even that which the hysteric incarnates as one might say, in other words to give her what one does not have on the pretext that she designates it, is very specifically to commit oneself to a theatre which it is very clear can no longer be anything than a parish fête (fête de charité). I am not just talking about the hysteric. I am talking about this something which is expressed in, I will tell you like Freud, the malaise of the theatre. For it still to be able to hold up, you have to have.....you have to have Brecht, do you not, who understood that that could not hold up without a certain distance, a certain cooling down. This it is clear, as I have just said, which can no longer be, etc, is properly speaking precisely, an effect of the Aufklärung, which is scarcely believable, is it not, linked to the coming onto the scene, however awkwardly it was done, of the discourse of the analyst. It was enough that the hysteric, the qualified (152) hysteric, I am in the process, as you can clearly see, of approaching the function for you, it was enough for the hysteric to renounce the extravagant clinic with which she furnished the gap in the sexual relationship. It is to be taken, it is to be taken as the sign, it is perhaps to be taken as the sign made to someone, I am talking about the hysteric, huh, that she is going to do better than this clinic. The only important thing here is what goes unnoticed, namely, that I am talking about the hysteric as something that supports quantification. In listening to me something might be written as an upside down A of x, and that is why I wrote it on the board, since it is always apt, while unknown, to function in of x, as a variable. This indeed is what I write and it would be easy in re-reading Aristotle to disclose what relationship to the woman, precisely identified by him to the hysteric – which rather gives the women of his epoch a very good ranking, at least they were stimulating for the men – to disclose what relationship to the woman identified to the hysteric allowed him - this is a jump - allowed him to establish his logic in the form, in the form of pan, the choice of pas, pasa, pan, the choice of this vocable rather than ekastos, to designate the proposition of the universal affirmative, and also the negative. Anyway the whole pantaloonery of the first great formal logic, is absolutely essentially linked to the idea that Aristotle had of the woman. This does not prevent, precisely, that the only universal formula that he did not allow himself to pronounce was all women (toutes les femmes). There is no trace of it. Open the Prior Analytics. No more than he, even though his successors rushed into it headfirst, would have allowed himself to write this incredible enormity, on which formal logic has lived ever since, all men are mortal. Which is something that completely prejudges the future fate of humanity. All men are mortal, that means that all men, because what is at stake is something that is stated in extension, all men qua all, are destined to death, that is that the human race is going to be extinguished, which to say the least is rather daring. That x requires the passage to a being, to an every woman (toute femme) that an individual as sensitive as Aristotle never in fact wrote this every woman, is precisely what allows it to be advanced that every woman is the statement by which there is decided the hysteric as subject, and that it is for this reason that a woman is solidary with a papludun which properly lodges her in this logic of the successor that Peano gave us as a model. The hysteric is not a woman (une femme).

http://www.lacaninireland.com

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is a matter of knowing whether psychoanalysis as I define it gives access to a woman or whether, for a woman to come to pass, is the business of doxa. Namely, if it is like virtue, to listen to the people who were dialoguing in Meno – you remember Meno, but no (mais non) – like this virtue, and this is what gives its value, its meaning, to this dialogue, this virtue is what cannot be taught. This can be expressed, that what can be about her, about a woman, as I have defined the step, be known in the unconscious, i.e., in an articulated fashion. Because after all – I will stop there – someone who precisely puts it up on the stage again, as if this were a question worthy of absorbing great deal of activity – it is a book that is very well done - a great amount of activity on the part of the analyst, as if it were really what an analyst should specialise in, someone accords me the merit, in a note, of having introduced the distinction between truth and knowledge. Outrageous! Outrageous! I have just been talking to you about Meno, have I not? Naturally, he never read it, he only reads theatre. Anyway it was with Meno that I began to open up the first phases of a crisis that a certain analytic system has confronted me with. The distinction between truth and knowledge, the opposition between episteme and the true doxa, the one that can ground virtue, you will find written, quite crudely, in Meno. What I highlighted, is precisely the contrary, it is their junction. Namely, that there, there where they are knotted together in appearance, in a particular circle, the knowledge that is at stake in the unconscious is the one that slides, that is prolonged, which at every instant proves to be a knowledge of the truth.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

And this is where just now I am putting the question. Does this knowledge effectively allow us to make progress with respect to Meno? Namely, is this truth, in so far as it is incarnated in the hysteric effectively capable of a subtle enough sliding to be the introduction to a woman. I know well, the question has risen by a notch since I proved that there is something that can be articulated in language which cannot for all that be articulated in words, and that it is on that simply that desire is based. It is nevertheless easy to settle, it is precisely because what is at stake is desire, in so far as it puts the emphasis on the invariance of the unknown, of the unknown which is on the left (à gauche), the one that is only produced under the heading of a Verneinung. It is precisely because it puts the emphasis on the invariance of the unknown, that obviously what belongs to desire cannot be inscribed by analysis in any function of a variable. This is the stumbling block by which there is separated as such the desire of the hysteric, from what nevertheless is produced, and allows innumerable women to function as such, namely, by playing the function of the papludun of their being for all their situational variations.

(154) The hysteric here plays the role of functional schema, if you know what that means. This is the import of my formula of desire described as unsatisfied. It can be deduced from this that the hysteric is situated by introducing the papludun by which each one of the women is established along the path of it is not of every woman that it can be said that she is a function of the phallus (ce n'est pas de toute femme que se peut dire qu'elle soit fonction du phallus). That this is the case with every woman is what constructs her desire and that is

http://www.lacaninireland.com

why this desire is sustained by being unsatisfied. The fact is that a woman results from it, but one who cannot be the hysteric in person. This indeed is how she incarnates my earlier truth, the one that after having made it speak I restored to its structural function.

The psychoanalytic discourse is established by this restoration of her truth to the hysteric. It was enough to dissipate the theatre in hysteria. This is why I say that it is not without a relationship to something that changes the appearance of things in our epoch. I had insisted on the fact that when I began to state things that carried all of that in potency, I immediately had as an echo the splash of an article on Le théâtre chez l'hystérique. Present day psychoanalysis is only dealing with a hysteric who is not up to date. When the hysteric proves that even when the page that has been turned, she continues to write on the back and even on the next one, people do not understand. She is a logician. This poses the question of the reference to the theatre made by Freudian theory, the Oedipus complex no less. It is time to attack that aspect of theatre that it has appeared necessary to maintain in order to sustain the Other scene, the one that I speak about, that I was the first to speak about. After all, sleep is enough perhaps, and that it shelters on occasion, this sleep, the gésine (?) of Fuchsian functions, as you know, perhaps, has happened, may justify a desire being constructed for it to be continued. It may happen that the signifying representatives of the subject always get across more easily when borrowed from imaginary representation. We have the signs of it in our epoch. It is certain that the enjoyment that one has by being castrated only has systemic relationships (rapports d'appareil) with representation. This indeed is why the Sophoclean Oedipus, which only has its privilege for us because the other Oedipus' are incomplete, and more often than not lost, is still much too rich and too diffuse for the articulation that we need. The genealogy of desire, in so far as what is in question is how it is caused, relates to a more complex combinatorial than that of myth.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

That is why we have no need to dream about what myth was used for in olden times, as they say. To engage oneself along that path is metalanguage, and in this respect, the Mythologiques of Lévi-Strauss make a decisive contribution. They show that the combination of the (155) nameable forms of mythem, many of which have disappeared, operate according to laws of transformation that are precise but very short on logic. Or at the very least what we must say about them, this is the least that can be said, is that our mathematics enriches this combinatorial. Perhaps we would do well to question whether the psychoanalytic discourse does not have better things to do than to devote itself to interpreting these myths in a style which does not go beyond ordinary commentary, which besides is completely superfluous. Because what interests the ethnologist is the collection of the myths, pinpointing its collation and its re-collation with other functions, of ritual, of production, registered just as in a writing whose articulated isomorphisms are enough for him. No trace of any supposition, I was going to say, about the enjoyment that is circumscribed there. This quite true, even taking into account the efforts made to suggest to us the eventual operation of obscure knowledge which is supposed to be lodged in them. The note given by Lévi-Strauss in the Structures about the display-action exercised by these structures with respect to love luckily settles things here. This did not prevent it passing well over the heads of the analysts who were in favour at the time.

In short the Oedipus complex has the advantage of showing how man can respond to the requirement of the papludun that is in the being of a woman. He himself is supposed not to love papludune of them.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Unfortunately it is not the same one; it is always the same rendezvous, when the masks are removed, it was neither he nor she. Nevertheless this fable is only supported by the fact that the man is never anything but a little boy. And that the hysteric is unable to let go of this is something that casts doubt on the function of her truth as being the last word.

A step towards seriousness could, it seems to me, be taken here by engaging with the man, and you will have noted that up to this point of my presentation I have given him the more modest part. Even though it is one of them, your servant, who forms part here of this beautiful world. It seems to me impossible - it is not for nothing that I come up against this word from the start - not to grasp the split that separates the Oedipus myth from Totem and taboo. I am showing my hand right away. The first is dictated to Freud by the dissatisfaction of the hysteric, the second by his own impasses. There is no trace in the second myth of the little boy, or of the mother, or of the tragic passage from the father to the son – passage of what, if not the phallus – of what is the very stuff of the first myth. Here, Totem and taboo, the father enjoys, a term that is veiled in the first myth by power. The father enjoys all the women until his sons slay him, which they only set about after a prior agreement, according to which (156) no one would succeed to him in his gluttony for enjoyment. The term is required by what comes in return, because the sons devour him, each one necessarily only having a part of him and by this very fact the whole making a communion. It is starting from that that there is produced the social contract. No one will touch, not the mother here, it is clearly specified, in Moses and monotheism, in Freud's own writing, that among the sons only the younger ones are still listed in the harem. So then it is no longer the mothers but the wives of the father, as such, who are concerned in the prohibition. The mother only comes into play precisely for her babies which are the grain of heroes. But if this is how there is constructed, according to Freud, the origin of law, it is not the law described as that of maternal incest, which is nevertheless given as inaugural in psychoanalysis. While in fact, this is a remark, apart from a certain law of Manou which punished it by a real castration, you will go to the west with your balls in your hand, etc., this law of maternal incest is everywhere more or less elided. I am not at all disputing here the prophylactic grounds for the analytic prohibition. I am underlining that at the level at which Freud articulates something about it, Totem and taboo, and God knows he stuck by it, he does not justify this prohibition mythically. The strangeness begins with the fact that neither Freud, nor moreover any other person either, seems to have noticed this.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I stride on. Enjoyment is promoted by Freud to the rank of an absolute which brings back to the care of the man, I am talking about Totem and taboo, of the original man - and this is all admitted - of the Father of the primitive horde, it is simple to recognise here the phallus, the totality of what 'femininely' can be subject to enjoyment. This enjoyment, I have just noted, remains veiled in the royal couple of the Oedipus complex, but it is not only from the first myth that it is absent. The royal couple is not even put in question until something which is stated in the drama, that they are the guarantors of the enjoyment of the people, which moreover agrees with what we know about all royalties, whether ancient or modern. And the castration of Oedipus has no other end than to end the Theban plague. Namely, to render to the people the enjoyment of which others are going to be the guarantors, which of course, given where it has started from, will not happen without some bitter adventures being experienced by all.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Must I underline that the key function of myth is strictly opposed in the two? The law first of all in the first, so primordial that it exercises its retortions even when the guilty have only contravened it innocently, and it is from the law that the profusion of enjoyment has (157) emerged. In the second, enjoyment at the origin, then law, whose correlates with perversion you will spare me having to underline. Since it is, when all is said and done, with the promotion, sufficiently insisted on, of sacred cannibalism, that all the women are prohibited, in principle, for the community of males, which has been transcended as such in this communion. This indeed is the sense of the other primordial law, otherwise, what grounds it? Eteocles and Polynices are there, I think, to show that there are other resources. It is true that they proceed from the genealogy of desire. It must be that the murder of the father has constituted – for whom, for Freud, for his readers? – such a supreme fascination, that no one has ever even dreamt of underlining that in the first myth this murder happens without the knowledge of the murderer, who not only does not recognise that he is attacking the father, but who cannot recognise him because he has another, who, from all antiquity is his father, since he adopted him. It was even explicitly in order not to run the risk of attacking the aforesaid father that he exiled himself. What the myth is suggestive of, is to show the place that the generating father has at an epoch in which Freud underlines that, just like our own, this father is problematic.

Because, moreover, Oedipus would be absolved, if he were not of royal blood, namely, if Oedipus did not have to function as the phallus, the phallus of his people, and not of his mother. And that for a time, what is most surprising is that it worked, namely, that the Thebans were so implicated that it is from Jocasta that the turn-about had to come. Is it because of what she knew or of what she was unaware of? What is there in common in any case with the murder of the second myth which we are led to believe is one of revolt, of need, that in truth is unthinkable, indeed unthought, except as proceeding from a conspiracy.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is obvious that all I have done there is to approach the terrain on which, in any case, let us say, a conspiracy also prevented me from ridding myself of my problem, namely, in Moses and monotheism, namely, from the point at which everything that Freud articulated becomes truly significant. I cannot even indicate to you what is necessary to bring you back to Freud. But I can say that in revealing to us here his contribution to the analytic discourse, he proceeds no less from neurosis than from what he picked up from the hysteric in the form of the Oedipus complex. It is curious that I have had to wait until now in order that such an assertion, namely that Totem and taboo is a neurotic product, for me to be able to put it forward, which is absolutely indisputable, without for all that my questioning in any (158) way the truth of the construction. That is even how it bears witness to the truth. One does not psychoanalyse an oeuvre, and that of Freud less than any other, is that not so? One criticises it, and far from a neurosis making its solidity suspect, it is the very thing that solders it in this case. It is to the testimony that the obessional contributes about his structure, to the aspect of the sexual relationship that proves to be impossible to formulate in discourse, that we owe the myth of Freud.

I will stop there for today. The next time I will give to this its exact import, because I would not like there to be any misunderstanding. The fact of articulating in a certain way what the contribution of Freud is to the fundamental myth of psychoanalysis, I underline, is not at all rendered suspect because its origin is underlined in this way. Quite the contrary, it is simply a matter of knowing where it can lead us.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 10: Wednesday 16 June 1971

I am going to try today to fix the meaning of this road along which I have led you this year under the title of Of a discourse which might not be a semblance. This hypothesis – because this title is presented to you in the conditional – this hypothesis is the one by which every discourse is justified. Do not forget that last year I tried to articulate in four typical discourses, these discourses which are the ones that you have to deal with, in a certain established order, which of course is itself only justified from history. If I broke them into four, this is something I believe I justified from the development that I gave them and from the form that in a writing paradoxically described as Radiophonie, not all that paradoxical if you heard what I was saying the last time, a certain order then whose terms this writing recalls to you and the slippage, the always syncopated slippage, of the slippage of the four terms among which there are always two which create a gap. This discourse that I designated specifically as the discourse of the Master, of the University discourse, of the discourse that I privileged with the term of Hysteric and the discourse of the Analyst, if I used them, these discourses have the property of always having their organising point, which is also moreover the one with which I pinpoint them, of starting with a semblance. What is privileged about analytic discourse because it is the one that allows us, in short, in articulating them in this way, to also divide them up into four fundamental arrangements. It is paradoxical, it is curious, that such a statement is presented as being at the end of what the one who found himself to be at the origin of analytic discourse, namely Freud, permitted. He did not permit it starting from nothing. He permitted it starting from what is presented; I articulated it clearly (160) on several occasions as being the principle of this discourse of the Master, namely, of what is privileged by a certain knowledge that illuminates the articulation of the truth with knowledge. It is properly speaking prodigious that those very people who, caught up in certain perspectives, those that we might define as putting themselves forward, as it were, with respect to society, those therefore who, in this perspective, present themselves as infirm, let us be kinder, as limping, and we know that beauty limps, namely, the neurotics, and specifically the hysterics and the obsessionals, that it was from them that there started, this overwhelming flash of light that travels the length and breadth of the demansion that conditions language. The function that is the truth, indeed, on this occasion indeed, everyone knows the place it holds in Freud's statements, indeed this crystallisation which is the one we know in its modern form, what we know about religion, and specifically the Judeo-Christian tradition on which everything that Freud stated about religions is brought to bear.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

This is consistent, I remind you, with this subversive operation of what up to then had been sustained throughout a whole tradition under the title of knowledge (connaissance), and this operation originates from the notion of symptom. It is historically important to note that it is not in this that there resides the novelty of the introduction of psychoanalysis brought about by Freud. The notion of symptom, as I indicated on several occasions, and it is very easy to locate by reading the one who is responsible for it, namely, Marx. The fundamental dupery that is contained in the theory of knowledge, this dimension of semblance that introduces the dupery exposed as such by Marxist subversion, the fact that what is exposed in it is precisely still in a certain tradition that reached its

http://www.lacaninireland.com

acme with the Hegelian discourse that some semblance is established in function of weight and measure, as I might say, as being the genuine article (argent comptant), and it is not for nothing that I use these metaphors, because it is around money, around capital as such that there operates the pivot of this exposure that makes the fetish reside in this something, a turning back of thinking, to put it back in its place, and very precisely qua semblance.

The curious thing about this remark is all the same also designed to make us notice that it is not enough for something to be stated in this exposure which puts itself forward as truth, in the name of which there emerges, there is promoted, surplus value as being the mainspring of what reduced to its semblance, what up to then was sustained by a certain number of deliberate oversights. It is not (161) enough, I remarked, and history proves it, for this irruption of truth to be produced for what is sustained by this discourse to be laid low. This discourse that we could call on this occasion that of the Capitalist, in so far as it is a determination of the discourse of the Master, finds itself at ease there, in fact, and is rather indeed its complement. It appears that, far from this discourse suffering from this recognition as such of the function of surplus value, it subsists no less, since moreover a capitalism caught up in the discourse of the Master is indeed what seems to distinguish the political consequences that resulted, under the form of a political revolution, that resulted from the Marxist exposure of what is involved in a certain discourse about semblance.

This indeed is why I am not going to dwell here on what is involved in the historic mission devoted in Marxism, or at least in its manifestos, devoted to the proletariat. There is, I would say, a left-over of humanist entification which, in a way, proliferates on what guarantees what in capitalism finds itself more and more stripped down to essentials, shows no less that something subsists, that makes it subsist effectively in this state of deprivation. And the fact that it is the support, the support of what is produced under the species of surplus value, is not for all that something that will in any way free us from the articulation of this discourse.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

This indeed is why this exposure reverts back to a questioning about this something which may be more original and which might find itself at the very origin of every discourse in so far as it is a discourse of semblance. This is also why that what I articulated under the term of surplus enjoying, refers you to what is questioned in the Freudian discourse as putting in question the relationship of something which is articulated properly speaking and anew as a truth, in opposition to a semblance. And this truth is this opposition, and this dialectic of the truth and of the semblance is found, if what Freud has said has a meaning, is situated at the level of what I designated by the term of sexual relationship.

In short, I dared to articulate, to encourage people to notice, that if this revelation that is bestowed on us by the knowledge of the neurotic about something, is nothing other than something which is articulated as there is no sexual relationship, what does that mean? Certainly not that language, since already, already I am saying, there is no sexual relationship, is something that can be said since now, it is said, but of course it is not enough to say it, it still has to (162) be justified. And we take the justifications from our experience obtained from the unbroken thread of what is hooked onto this fundamental gap and this unbroken thread is knotted, this is its central starting place, entwined around this void, in what I call the discourse of the neurotic.

The last time, I sufficiently made you sense, sufficiently underlined, attempted to begin from a writing, how there can be situated what is involved as the starting point of this thread. My intention today - not at all of course, the thing is beyond, at the limit of anything that can be said in this limited space of a seminar - not at all about what the neurotic indicates about his relationship to this distance, but about what the myths, the myths from which there are formed, as I might say, not always under the dictation, but as an echo of the discourse of the neurotic, the myth that Freud forged. In order to do it in such a brief period, we have to start from the central point, which is also the enigmatic point of the psychoanalytic discourse, of the psychoanalytic discourse in so far as it is here only listening to this final discourse, the one which might not be the discourse of semblance. It is listening to a discourse which might not be and which moreover is not. I mean that what is indicated is only the limit imposed on discourse, when the sexual relationship is at stake. I tried, for my part, at the point that I have got to, where I am going ahead of everything that may be formulated later, to tell you that it is its failure at the level of a logic, of a logic which is sustained from what every logic is sustained by, namely, writing. The letter of Freud's work is a written work. But moreover also that what it outlines from these writings, is something that surrounds a veiled, obscure truth, one that is stated by the fact that, a sexual relationship, as it happens in some accomplishment or other, can only be sustained, can only be established, from this composition between enjoyment and the semblance called castration. That we see it re-emerging at every instant in the discourse of the neurotic, but in the form of a fear, of an avoidance, is precisely the reason why castration remains enigmatic. That none of its realisations, in fact, is as changeable, as shimmering. Or moreover the exploration of the psychopathology of analysable phenomena, at least of this psychopathology, that excursions into ethnology allow, it nevertheless remains that something from which there is, distinguished everything that is evoked as castration, we see it, in what form, always in the form of an avoidance. If the neurotic, as I might say, bears witness to the necessary intrusion of what I called just now this composition of enjoyment and the semblance that is presented as castration, it is precisely because of the fact that he

http://www.lacaninireland.com

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(163) shows himself to be inapt for it in some way. And if everything that is involved in rituals of initiation which, as you know, or if you do not know, consult the technical works, and to take two of them which were produced within the analytic field itself, I designate for you respectively the Problems of bisexuality as reflected in circumcision, namely, Problèmes de la bisexualité en tant que réfléchis dans la circoncision, by Herman Nunberg, published by Englewoods, namely, when all is said and done, by the Imago publications of London, and on the other hand, the work entitled Symbolic wounds, Blessures symboliques by Bruno Bettelheim. You will see in them deployed in its whole ambiguity, in it fundamental vacillation, hesitation, in a way, of analytic thinking between explicatory ordering which leaves the fear of castration completely opaque and in a way to good or bad fortune as you wish, the accidents through which there is presented something which in this register is only supposed to be the effect of some misunderstanding or other. On this tangle of prejudices, of blunders, of something that can be rectified, or on the contrary of a thinking which notices that there is indeed here something of the constancy, at the very least, an immense number of productions that we can record on every register, even though the catalogues have been more or less done, whether those of ethnology or of psychopathology, that I evoked earlier, there are others confronting us with the fact that it is from – and Freud expresses it on occasion, it is very well said in Civilisation and its discontents – it is in connection with something which after all does not make all that new what I formulated in terms of there is no sexual relationship. He says that, he indicates of course as I did, in quite clear terms, that no doubt, on this point, very precisely in connection with sexual relationships, some fatality is inscribed that makes necessary in it what then appear as being the means, the bridges, the passerels, the buildings, the constructions, in a word, which at the deficiency, at the deficiency of this sexual relationship inasmuch as after all, in a sort of respective inversion, any possible discourse will only

http://www.lacaninireland.com

appear as a symptom, within this sexual relationship, arranges in conditions that as usual we refer to pre-history, to extra-historical domains, that in these conditions, gives a kind of success to what can be established as artificial, as a supplement, as supplying for what is lacking, is inscribed in short in the speaking being without one being able to know whether it is because he is speaking that it is like this, or on the contrary because the origin is that the relationship is not speakable. It is necessary for all of those who (164) inhabit language, it is necessary that for them there should be developed this something which makes possible in the form of castration, the gap left in this something that is nevertheless essential, biologically essential, biologically essential for the reproduction of these beings as living beings, for their race to remain fruitful. Such indeed, in effect, is the problem that is confronted by everything that is involved in the rituals of initiation. That these rituals of initiation comprise... let us call them manipulations, operations, incisions, circumcisions, that are aimed at and put their mark very precisely on the organ that we see functioning as a symbol in that which through psychoanalytic experience is presented to us as going well beyond the privilege of the organ, since it is the phallus, and that the phallus, in so far as it is to this third that there is ordered everything which, in short, creates an impasse in enjoyment, which makes of the man and of the woman, in so far as we might define them by a simple biological pinpointing, these beings who very precisely are with a sexual enjoyment and in an elective way among all other enjoyments, in difficulty with it, this indeed is what is at stake and it is from this that we have to start again if we want there to be maintained a correct meaning to what is inaugurated from analytic discourse.

And that if it is, as is supposed, something defined, this is what we call castration, which is supposed to have the privilege of warding off this something whose undecideability forms the basis of the sexual relationship, in so far as it presents enjoyment as organised,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

with regard to something that seems to me to be not avoidable. I am talking about the statements, the theatricals, about constraint which are a daily experience in analytic discourse is quite the opposite – this, it is a remark which gives its value to the second book, that of Bruno Bettelheim, that I highlighted for you – which is obviously altogether contrary to something which is the only important thing. It is not a matter of pushing back into prehistory what is involved in rituals of initiation, rituals of initiation, like everything that we would like to reject into prehistory, are there, they still exist, they are alive throughout the world, there are still Australians who have themselves circumscribed or subincised, there are entire zones of civilisation that submit to it, and to fail to recognise in a century described as illuminated that these practices not only subsist but flourish, are very healthy, and it is obviously from that that we must start in order to notice that it is not from any conceivable theatricality of constraint whatsoever, there is no example that it is simply constraint, it is still a matter of knowing (165) what a constraint means. A constraint is never just the production of something that the so-called prevalence of a so-called physical superiority or other, it is supported precisely by signifiers. And if it is the law, the rule, that is such here, that a particular subject wants to submit to it, it is indeed for reasons, and these reasons are what are important for us. And what is important for us, and it is here that we ought to question what is the compliance, to use a word which, by leading us straight to the hysteric, and which no less has an extremely general range, this compliance which ensures that there subsists well and truly and in times that are quite historical what is involved and what is presented as something whose image all by itself would be intolerable, it is perhaps intolerable as such, this is what is at stake, it is to know why.

This is where I take up my thread again, it is in following this thread that we give a meaning to what is articulated in language in what I will call this unpublished (inédite) word, because it was

http://www.lacaninireland.com

unpublished up to a certain epoch, a well and truly historical one within our reach, this unpublished word, and which is presented, in short, as having always partly to remain so. There is no other definition to be given to the unconscious. Let us come now to the hysteric because I like to start from the hysteric, to see where the thread leads us. The hysteric, we have asked ourselves, have we not, what it is, but precisely, this is the meaning, it is to such a question: "What is it?", what is it, what does it mean, the hysteric in person? It seems to me that I have worked for a long enough time starting from the imaginary, to indicate "that in person", to recall simply, what is already...inscribed in the terms "in person"...in a mask (en masque), no reply can be given at the start to this meaning. To the question "what is the hysteric?", the answer of the discourse of the analyst is: "You'll see". You will indeed see, precisely, by following where she leads us. Without the hysteric, of course, there would never have come to light what is involved in what I am writing, of what I am writing, anyway, I am trying to give you the first logical step of what is now at stake, of what I write as phi of x (ϕ x), which is, namely, that enjoyment, this variable in the function written in x, is not situated from this relationship with the capital Φ that here designates the phallus, the central discovery, or rather rediscovery or as you wish re-baptism, since I indicated to you why it is from the phallus as an unveiled semblance in the mysteries that the term is taken up again, not by (166) chance. That it is very precisely, in effect, that it is to the semblance of the phallus that there is referred the pivotal point, the centre of everything that can be organised, be contained in terms of sexual enjoyment, that from the first approaches to hysterics, from the Studien über Hysterie Freud leads us. The last time I articulated the following, that in short, in taking things from the point that could in effect be questioned, about what is involved in the most common discourse, that if we wish, not to push to its term what linguistics indicates to us, but simply to extrapolate it. Namely, to notice that nothing of what language allows us to do is ever

http://www.lacaninireland.com

anything but metaphor, or indeed metonymy. That the something that every word, whatever it may be, claims to name for an instant can only ever refer back to a connotation. And that if there is something that may in the final term be indicated as that which is denoted by any function apparelled in language, I already said it the last time, there is only one Bedeutung, die Bedeutung des Phallus. It is there alone what is involved in language, denoted, of course, but without ever anything corresponding to it, since, if there is something that characterises the phallus, it is not, not to be the signifier of lack, as some people thought they understood some of my words, but to be assuredly in any case that from which no word emerges. Sinn and Bedeutung, it is from there, I recalled the last time, it is from this opposition articulated by the really inaugurating logician who is Frege, Sinn and Bedeutung, define the models that go further than those of connotation and denotation. Many things in this article in which Frege establishes the two aspects of Sinn and of Bedeutung, many things are to be retained and especially for an analyst.

Because undoubtedly, without a reference to logic which of course cannot just be to classical logic, to Aristotelian logic, without a reference to logic, it is impossible to find the correct point in the subjects that I am putting forward. Frege's remark turns entirely around the fact that when we are brought to a certain point of scientific discourse what we note, is, for example, facts like the following. Is it the same thing to say Venus or to call it in the two ways that it was for a long time designated the Morning Star and the Evening Star? Is it the same thing to say Sir Walter Scott and to say the author of the Waverley novels? I inform those who might be unaware of it that he is effectively the author of this work that is called Waverley. It is in examining this distinction that Frege notices that it is not possible in any case to replace Sir Walter Scott by the author of the Waverley novels. This is how he distinguishes the fact that the author of the Waverley novels conveys a sense, a

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(167) Sinn, and that Sir Walter Scott designates a Bedeutung. It is clear that if one posits with Leibnitz that, salva veritate, to save the truth, it must be posited that everything that is designated as having an equivalent Bedeutung and which can be replaced indifferently, and if one puts the thing to the test as I am doing right away put it to the test along the paths traced out by Frege himself, that, it does not matter whether it was George III or George IV, on this occasion that has little importance, was asking, was informing himself, as to whether Sir Walter was the author of the Waverley novels. If we replace "the author of the Waverley novels" by "Sir Walter Scott" we obtain the following sentence: "George III was enquiring whether Sir Walter Scott was Sir Walter Scott", which quite obviously has absolutely not the same sense. It is starting from this simple remark, a logical operation, that Frege establishes, inaugurates his fundamental distinction between Sinn and Bedeutung. It is quite clear that this Bedeutung refers of course to an always more distant Bedeutung, which refers of course to the distinction between what he calls oblique discourse and direct discourse. It is inasmuch as it is in a subordinate clause that it is King George III who asks, that we ought to maintain here the rights of Sinn and in no way replace the author of the Waverley novels by Sir Walter Scott.

But this of course is an artifice which, for us, leads us onto the path of the following, namely, that Sir Walter Scott, on this occasion, is a name. And moreover when Mr. Carnap takes up again the question of Bedeutung, it is by the term nominatum that he translates it. And thus, precisely, he slips here into what he should not have slipped.

Because the thing that I am giving a commentary on, may allow us to go further, but certainly not in the same direction as Mr. Carnap. It is the matter of what is meant by a name, I repeat, like the last time. It is very easy for us to make the connection here with what I pointed out earlier. I pointed out to you that the phallus is something that puts us on the path of this point that I am designating here in an accentuated way, the fact is that the nom, the name and the noun, but one only sees things clearly at the level of the proper name, as someone or other has said. The name, is what summons, no doubt, but to what? It is what summons you to speak. And this indeed is what constitutes the privilege of the phallus, it is that you can summon it as much as you like, it will always say nothing.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Only this then gives its sense, gives its sense to what I called at one time the paternal metaphor and this is what the hysteric leads to. (168) The paternal metaphor, of course, when I introduced it, namely, in my article on A question preliminary to any possible treatment of psychosis, I inserted it into the general schema extracted from the rapprochement between what linguistics tells us about metaphor and what the experience of the unconscious tells us about condensation. I wrote S over S_1, multiplied by S_1 over a small s, I relied heavily, as I also wrote in The agency of the letter, on this aspect of the metaphor, which is to generate a sense. If the author of the Waverley novels, is a Sinn, it is very precisely because the author of the Waverley novels, replaces something else, which is a special Bedeutung, the one that Frege thinks he should pinpoint with the name of Sir Walter Scott. But still it is not only from this angle that I envisaged the paternal metaphor. If I wrote somewhere that the Name of the Father is the phallus – God knows what tremor of horror this evoked among some pious souls – it is precisely because at that date I could not articulate it better. What is sure is that it is the phallus, of course, but that it is all the same the Name of the Father. What is named Father, the Name of the Father, if it is a name which, for its part, is efficacious, it is because someone stands up to answer. From the angle of what happened in the psychotic determination of Schreber, it is qua signifier, signifier capable of giving a sense to the desire of the mother, that I could in a correct manner situate the Name of the Father. But at the level of what is at stake when it is, let us say, the hysteric who summons him, what matters is that someone should speak. I would like here to point out to you that if Freud sometimes tried to approach a little bit more closely this function of the Father which is so essential to analytic discourse, that one can say in a certain way that it is the product of it, if I write the analytic discourse for you as o/S_2, namely, the analyst over the knowledge he has from the neurotic, who questions the subject to produce something, one can say that the master signifier, up to the present, of the analytic discourse, is indeed the Name of the Father. It is extremely curious that the analytic discourse was necessary for questions to be posed about this. What is a Father? Freud does not hesitate to articulate that it is the name in essence which implies faith (or the law; foi/loi). That is how he expresses himself. We might perhaps all the same have desired a little bit more from him. After all, taking things at the fundamental biological level, one might perfectly well conceive that the reproduction of the human species – this has already been done, it has already emerged from the imagination of a novelist - might (169) happen without any kind of intervention designating itself under the Name of the Father, artificial insemination is not there for nothing. What in short constitutes presence – and this did not come from today or yesterday – is it not this essence of the Father, and after all, do not we analysts ourselves really know what it is? I would like all the same to point out to you that in analytic experience, the Father is only ever a referent (référential) (?). We interpret one or other relation with the Father. Do we ever analyse anyone qua Father? Let someone bring me a case-study. The Father is a term of analytic interpretation. To him something is referred.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is in the light of these remarks – I have to cut things short – that I would all the same like to situate for you what is involved in the myth of the Oedipus complex. The myth of the Oedipus complex causes trouble in some way, is that not so, because supposedly it establishes the primacy of the Father, which is supposed to be a kind of reflection of patriarchy. I would like to make you sense something which, through which, for me at least, it appears to me to be not at all a patriarchal reflection. Far from it. It shows us simply this: a point first of all through which castration might be circumscribed, through a logical approach and, in the way that I will designate as being numeral.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The Father is not alone castrated, but is precisely castrated to the point of being nothing but a number. This is indicated quite clearly in dynasties. Earlier I was talking about a king, I no longer knew what to call him, George III or George IV....you should be under no illusion that this is precisely what seems most typical to me, in this presentation of paternity, namely, that in reality, this is how it happens, George I, George II, George III, George IV. But still, it is quite obvious that this does not exhaust the question, because...there is not simply the numeral (numéro), there is a number (nombre). In a word, I see in it the apperception point of the series of natural numbers (nombres), as it is put. And as it is not put too badly, because after all it is very close to nature, I would like to point out to you that because people always evoke at the horizon of history something that, of course, is an extremely suspicious reason, I would simply point out the following to you. That matriarchy, as it is put, has no need to be pushed back to the limit of history.

Matriarchy consists essentially in the following, the fact is for what is involved in the mother as production, there is no doubt. One can on occasion lose one's mother in the Metro, of course, but still there is no doubt about who is the mother. There is also no doubt about (170) who is the mother of the mother. And so on. The mother, in her line of descent, I would say, is innumerable. She is innumerable in all the proper senses of the term, she is not to be numbered, because there is no starting point. The maternal line of descent may well necessarily be in order, one cannot make it start from any point. I could point out to you on the other hand the following which appears to be the thing that one most usually puts one's finger on, because it is after all not rare, it is not at all rare that one may have as father one's grandfather. I mean as a true father. Or even one's great-grandfather. Yes! Because...people lived as we are told in the first line of descent of patriarchs, for around 900 years. I looked over that again recently, it is very pithy, it is absolutely sensational fakery. Everything is designed so that the two most direct ancestors of Noah died there just at the moment that the flood happened. That is what you see, it is titillating, anyway let us put that to one side, it is simply to put you in the perspective of what is involved in the Father.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

From this, you see, what results – I am forced to go a little quickly, because time is passing – is that if we define the hysteric by the following, a definition that is not particular to him, the neurotic, namely, the avoidance of castration, there are several ways to avoid it. The hysteric has this simple procedure, the fact is that she unilateralises it on the other side, the side of the partner. Let us say that for the hysteric, a castrated partner is necessary. That he should be castrated, it is clear that this is at the source of the possibility of the enjoyment of the hysteric. But it is still too much. If he were castrated, there would perhaps be a little chance, since castration is precisely what I put forward earlier as being what allows the sexual relationship, it is necessary that he should be simply what answers in the place of the phallus.

So then, since Freud himself indicates to us, I will not tell you, all the same at what page, indicates himself that everything he elaborates as a myth – this is in connection with Moses: "I will not here criticise", he says about what he had written himself, at the date when he published it in 1938, about his historical hypothesis, namely, the one from Sellin that he had renovated, "because all the results that have been required", says the translator, "constitute psychological deductions which flow from it and ceaselessly refer to it". As you see that means nothing. In German that does mean something, it is "denn sie bilden die Voraussetzung", because they form the supposition, "der psychologischen Erörterungen" ,of psychological manifestations which, from these data, "von ihnen ausgehren", there flow and always anew "auf sie zurück-kommen", (171) and come back to them. It is indeed in effect under the dictation of the hysteric that, there is not developed, because the Oedipus complex was never really developed by Freud, it is indicated in a way, at the horizon, in the smoke, as one might say, of what raises itself up as a sacrifice of the hysteric. But let us clearly observe what is now meant by this nomination, this response to the summoning of the father in the Oedipus complex.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

If I told you earlier that this introduces the series of natural numbers, it is because there, we have, what is the most recent logical development of this series, namely, that of Peano, proved necessary, namely, not simply the fact of succession, when one tries to axiomatise the possibility of such a series, one encounters the necessity of zero in order to posit the successor. The minimal axioms of Peano – I am not insisting on what may have been produced as a commentary, in the margin, in order to perfect it – but the final formula, is the one that posits zero as necessary for this series, without which it would then be innumerable, as I said earlier. The logical equivalence of the function is very precisely that this function that I have made use of is too often linked, I can only do it in the margin and very rapidly, I would point out to you that we will enter into the second millennium in the year 2000, as far as I know. If you simply admit that – on the other hand, you could moreover not admit it – but if simply you admit it, I would point out to you that this makes it necessary for there to have been a year zero, after the birth of Christ. This is what the authors of the Republican Calendar forgot. They called the first year, year 1 of the Republic. This zero is absolutely essential for any natural chronological mapping out. And then we understand what is meant by the murder of the Father. It is curious, singular, is it not, that this murder of the Father never appears even in dramas, as has been very relevantly been pointed out by someone who has written on this a chapter that is not bad at all, that even in dramas, no playwright has dared, the author says, to present, to manifest, the deliberate murder of a father by a son. Pay careful attention to that, even in Greek theatre this does not exist, a Father qua Father. On the contrary, it is all the same the term "murder of the Father" which appears at the centre of what Freud develops starting from the data constituted by, because of the hysteric, and those around him, the refusal of castration. Is it (172) not precisely in so far as the murder of the Father, here, is the substitute for this rejected castration, that the Oedipus complex was able to impose itself on Freud's thinking as he worked his way through these approaches to the hysteric? It is clear that in the hysterical perspective it is the phallus that fecundates, and that what it engenders, is itself, as one might say. Fecundity is phallic forgery, and it is indeed in this way that every child is a reproduction of the phallus, in so far as he is pregnant (gros), if I can express myself in this way, from his engendering.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

But then, we also glimpse, since it is from the papludun that I have inscribed the logicised possibility of the choice in this unsatisfied relation of sexual relationship, that it is from the no more than one that I designated it for you. It is through this that the unbelievable complicity of Freud in a monotheism whose model he is going to seek, a very curious thing, quite elsewhere than in his tradition, it is necessary for him that it should be Akhenaton. There is nothing more ambiguous, I would say, on the sexual plane, than this solar monotheism, when you see it radiating with all its rays provided with little hands which are going to tickle the nostrils of innumerable little humans, children, of one sex and the other. And it is quite striking, in this imagery of the Oedipus structure, that, make no mistake, they resemble one another like brothers, and even more like sisters. If the word sublime can have an ambiguous meaning, it is indeed here. Since moreover it is not for nothing that the last monumental images, those that I was able to see the last time that I left Egyptian soil, of Akhenaton, are images that are not simply castrated but quite bluntly feminine.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is altogether clear that if castration has a relationship to the phallus, this is not the place where we are going to be able to designate it. I mean that if I made the little schema which is supposed to correspond to the pas tous or the pas toutes, as designating a certain type of the relation to the Φ of x, it is indeed in this sense it is to the Φ of x that all the same the elect refer themselves to. The passage to "mediation", is indeed nothing other than this au moins un that I underlined and that we rediscover in Peano through this n+1 always repeated, the one that in a way presupposes that the n which precedes it is reduced to zero. In what way? Precisely, by the murder of the Father. By this ...this mapping out of, as one might, the detour, to use the term of Frege himself, make no mistake, oblique, ungerade way, whose sense of the murder of the Father is referred to a different Bedeutung, this indeed is what I have to limit myself to today, while apologising for not having been able to push things further. So that will be for next (173) year. I regret that things were this year, were necessarily truncated, but you will be able to see that Totem and Taboo on the contrary, namely, what I put on the side of the Father in terms of original enjoyment, is something to which there corresponds a no less strictly equivalent avoidance of what is involved in castration, strictly equivalent. And this is what clearly marks that fact that the obsessional, the obsessional who corresponds to the formula: there is no x that exists that can be inscribed in the variable Φ of x, the obsessional, how the obsessional slips away. He slips away simply by not existing. It is this something to which, why not, we will link up what follows in our discourse, the obsessional in so far as, he is in the debt of not existing with respect to this no less mythical

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Father who is the one of Totem and Taboo, how? It is to this that there is attached, that there is really attached everything that is involved in a certain religious construction, and the reason why it is not, alas, reducible, and not even by what Freud hooks on to his second myth, that of Totem and Taboo, namely, neither more nor less than his second topography. This is what we will subsequently develop. Because you should note, the second topography, his great innovation, is the superego.

What is the essence of the superego? It is on this that I can finish by putting something into the hollow of your hand, that you can try to manipulate for yourselves, what is the general order of the superego? Precisely, it originates from this more than mythical original father, from this summons as such to pure enjoyment, namely, also to non-castration. And what does this father say in effect, at the dissolution of the Oedipus complex? He says what the superego says. What the superego says – it is not for nothing that I have never really tackled it yet – what the superego says is: "Enjoy!"

Such is the order, the impossible to satisfy order, and as such it is at the origin of everything that is elaborated there, however paradoxical that may appear to you, in terms of moral conscience. To really sense the operation of the definition, you will have to read in Ecclesiastes, under the title: 'Enjoy as long as you can, enjoy', says the enigmatic author of this astonishing text, 'Enjoy with the wife you love'. This indeed is the height of paradox, because it is precisely loving her that creates the obstacle.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Jacques Lacan

... or Worse

The Seminar of Jacques Lacan
Book XIX

Edited by Jacques-Alain Miller

Translated by A. R. Price

polity

First published in French as Le Séminaire, Livre XIX. . . . ou pire (1971–1972), © Éditions du Seuil, 2011

This English edition © Polity Press, 2018

Polity Press
65 Bridge Street
Cambridge CB2 1UR, UK

Polity Press
101 Station Landing
Suite 300
Medford, MA 02155, USA

All rights reserved. Except for the quotation of short passages for the purpose of criticism and review, no part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without the prior permission of the publisher.

ISBN-13: 978-0-7456-8244-0

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

Typeset in 10.5 on 12 pt Times NR MT by Servis Filmsetting Ltd, Stockport, Cheshire Printed and bound in Great Britain by Clays Ltd, Elcograf S.p.A.

The publisher has used its best endeavours to ensure that the URLs for external websites referred to in this book are correct and active at the time of going to press. However, the publisher has no responsibility for the websites and can make no guarantee that a site will remain live or that the content is or will remain appropriate.

Every effort has been made to trace all copyright holders, but if any have been inadvertently overlooked the publisher will be pleased to include any necessary credits in any subsequent reprint or edition.

For further information on Polity, visit our website: politybooks.com

Contents

OF ONE SEX AND THE OTHER

I.	The Small Difference	3
II.	The Function Φx	15
III.	From Anecdote to Logic	27
IV.	From Necessity to Inexistence	37

THE OTHER: FROM SPEECH TO SEXUALITY

V.	Topology of Speech (A Talk at Sainte-Anne)	51
VI.	I Ask You to Refuse Me My Offering	65
VII.	The Vanished Partner (A Talk at Sainte-Anne)	78
VIII.	What is Involved in the Other	95

THE ONE: NEVER THE TWAIN SHALL REACH

IX.	In the Field of the Unian	107
X.	Yad'lun	118
XI.	An Issue of Ones (A Talk at Sainte-Anne)	128
XII.	Knowledge about Truth	146
XIII.	The Founding of Sexual Difference	158
XIV.	Theory of the Four Formulae (A Talk at Sainte-Anne)	169

CODA

XV.	The Desire to Sleep	189
XVI.	Bodies Captured by Discourse	197

APPENDICES

Report on Seminar XIX, by Jacques Lacan 215
Library to Seminar XIX, by Jacques-Alain Miller 221

Translator's Notes 233
Index 247

Book XIX

. . . or Worse

1971–1972

OF ONE SEX AND THE OTHER

I

THE SMALL DIFFERENCE

The empty place
Prosdiorismoi Nature and discourse
Let them muddle through!
Modality and negation

I could pass over my title, the meaning of which you're going to be able to see in a short while. Nevertheless, out of kindness, since it was devised to catch your attention, I shall introduce it with a commentary. Perhaps some of you have understood it, though. All in all, . . . or worse is what I'm always quite capable of doing. I just have to show you as much to take us to the heart of the matter, and this I do constantly.

However, to avoid remaining at the level of meaning, which like all meaning amounts to opacity, I'm going to give a textual commentary on the title. It so happened that some people read it wrongly. They thought it said . . . ou le pire, . . . or the worst, which really isn't the same thing. Pire is an adverb, like well or better.[1] You say, I do it well, or I do it worse.

It's an adverb, but it's disjoined. It's disjoined from something that is summoned to a place – precisely, the place of the verb – which here has been replaced by three dots. These three dots refer to the customary use in printed texts – and this is a curious thing – for denoting or creating an ellipsis.

My title underscores the importance of this empty place and also demonstrates that this is the only way to say something with the aid of language.

1

The remark that this empty place is the only way to catch hold of something by means of language allows us precisely to penetrate the nature of language.

You know that as soon as logic first succeeded in facing up to something that sustains a reference to truth, it produced the notion of the variable. I'm speaking of the apparent variable.[2] The apparent variable x is formed whenever an x marks an empty place in whatever is at issue. The precondition for this to work is that we put exactly the same signifier in each of the places set aside as empty. Only in this way can language get to something, and this is why I employed the formula – There is no such thing as metalanguage.

What does this mean? It would seem that in saying this all I would be doing is formulating a paradox, for where would I be saying it from? Since I am saying it in language, this would already be sufficient affirmation that there is one language from which I can say so. And yet this is clearly not the case. Whenever logic is at issue, it is necessary to create the fiction of metalanguage. That is, within a discourse, one forges what is known as an object-language, in view of which it is language that becomes meta. By discourse I mean common discourse, without which there are simply no means of establishing this division. There is no such thing as metalanguage denies that this division can be upheld. That there could be any discordance in language is foreclosed by this formula.

So, what occupies the ellipsis that I have produced to catch your attention? I said that it had to be a verb, because there is an adverb. However, eliding the verb by means of three dots is the one thing that may not be done in language once it is being examined in logic.

In this instance the verb is not hard to find. You just have to swivel the first letter of the word pire and you get dire. In logic, however, the verb is precisely the only term from which you cannot make an empty place. Indeed, when you try to turn a proposition into a function, the verb becomes a function, and you form an argument from what lies around it. So, by emptying out the verb, I'm turning it into an argument, that is to say, I'm turning it into substance. It's not saying per se, it's one fact of saying.

This fact of saying, which I'm taking up from last year's Seminar, is expressed, as is any fact of saying, in a complete proposition – There is no such thing as sexual relation. What this year's title proposes is that there's no ambiguity about this – move outside it and what you will say will only be worse.

There is no such thing as sexual relation is proposed, therefore, as a truth. I've already said, however, that truth can only come midsay. So, what I'm saying is that, all in all, what the other half says is worse. How much simpler things would be if there were no worse!

The question is whether this doesn't already simplify matters. Since I've started with what I can do, and this is exactly what I'm not doing, doesn't this suffice to simplify matters? Yet there you go, it is not possible for me not to do this worse, just like everyone else.

When I say that there is no such thing as sexual relation, I'm asserting precisely the truth that sex does not define any relation in speaking beings.

I'm not denying the difference that there is, from the earliest age, between what are known as a young girl and a young boy. This is even my starting point. You should twig right away that when I take this as my starting point, you don't know what I'm talking about.

I'm not talking about the notorious small difference for which, with respect to one of the two, when he becomes sexually mature, letting out a hurrah will appear altogether equivalent to a bon mot, a quip. Hurrah for the small difference! The mere fact that this is funny is enough to indicate to us, by denotation, by reference, the complexual relationship with this organ. This relationship is fully inscribed in the analytic experience and we were led to it by the experience of the unconscious, without which there wouldn't be any quips.

Even then at this early stage, the small difference is separated off as an organ, which already says it all – ὄργανον, instrument. Does an animal have any idea that it has organs? Has anyone ever seen such a thing? And whatever for? Will it be enough to state that all animals – I said this somewhere else, it's another way of taking up what I stated recently about supposing so-called sexual jouissance to be instrumental in animals, but here I shall put it differently – all animals that have pincers do not masturbate? That's the small difference between homme and homard, between man and lobster. There you go. That always has its little effect.

In view of which, the historical aspect of this sentence escapes your notice. On no account is it because of what it asserts – I'm saying no more than that, the sentence asserts – but on account of what it introduces at the level of logic. This is concealed within it, but the only thing you haven't noticed is that it contains the pas-tout, the not-all, which is very precisely and very curiously what Aristotelian logic eludes in so far as it produced and isolated the function of the προσδιορισμοί, the prosdiorismoi, which are exactly what you are familiar with, namely the use of all, πᾶν, of not, μή, of some, τί, around which Aristotle took the first steps in formal logic.[3]

These steps have far-reaching consequences. They allowed for the development of what is known as the function of quantifiers. It was with the all that the empty place I was speaking about earlier was established. When Frege comments on the function of the assertion in relation to a function $f(x)$ that is either true or false, in order for the x to have the existence of an argument – here placed in this little hollow, which is an image of the empty place – he makes sure to put something in front of it that is called all x, which is appropriate to the function.[4]

A Höhlung in the Begriffsschrift

Introducing the not-all is essential here. The not-all is not a denied universal. The not-all is not none. Namely, it is not no animal that has pincers masturbates. It is not all animals that have pincers are thereby necessitated to what follows. There are organs and then there are organs, just as we have il y a fagots et fagots,[5] the one who deals the blows and the one who receives them. And this brings us to the heart of our problem.

Indeed, you can see that simply by taking this first faint step we have thereby slid, without even the time to backtrack, into the midst of something where there is a machine that sweeps us along. It is this machine that I'm dismantling. However – this remark is intended for the use of certain people here – this is not to demonstrate that it is a machine, nor, even less, so that a discourse should be taken for a machine, as some have done in seeking to gear into my discourse. In so doing, what they have demonstrated is how they fail to gear into the very thing that forms a discourse, namely the real that passes through it. Dismantling the machine is on no account the same thing as what we have just done, namely to proceed without any further ado to the hole in the system, that is, to the site at which the real passes through you. And how it passes! Because it lays you flat!

Naturally, I would like, I really would like, I would very much like, I would like to preserve your natural knavery, which really is the nicest thing there is, but which, alas, alas forever starting over, as a certain someone says, is eventually reduced to foolishness by the very effect of this discourse that I'm demonstrating. Whereby you must surely have the immediate sense that there are at least two ways of demonstrating this discourse – it remaining open that my way of demonstrating it might be yet a third way.

You mustn't make me insist on this energetics of knavery and foolishness, to which I only ever make distant allusions.[6] Of course, from the standpoint of energetics it doesn't hold water. It's purely metaphorical. But it belongs to that brand of metaphor by which the speaking being subsists. I mean that for him it is his bread and leaven.

So, I have asked you to let me off insisting, in the hope that the theory should make up for it. You can hear the subjunctive accentuation. I've picked it out because it might have been covered up by the interrogative accentuation. Spare a thought for all this, as and when it happens, especially so that you can avoid overlooking what appears there, namely the relationship between the unconscious and truth.

The right theory is the one that clears the very path along which the unconscious had been reduced to insisting. There would be no further need to insist had the path actually been cleared, though this doesn't mean that everything would be resolved, quite the contrary. Since it would offer this facility, the right theory ought to be light to the point that it seems not to touch it. It ought to possess the naturalness that, until now, has only been possessed by errors. Once again, not all of them, of course. But does this make it any more certain that there might be some that can sustain this naturalness which so many others affect a semblance of?

For these others to be able to affect this semblance, it is my assertion that among these errors that sustain naturalness, there has to be at least one, hommoinzune. You ought to recognize what I wrote last year, albeit with a different ending, with regard to the hysteric and the hommoinzun she requires.[7] The role of this hommoinzune can be no better sustained than by naturalness itself.

This is why, at the start, I didn't deny the difference that exists, that is perfectly noticeable, and from a very early age, between a young girl and a young boy. This difference, which asserts itself as something innate, is indeed altogether natural. It corresponds to the real by the fact that, within the species that has itself given itself the name Homo sapiens – a self-made species, in this and in many other respects – the sexes appear to be shared out into two sets of individuals that are pretty much equal in number. Fairly early on, earlier than one might expect, these individuals are distinct. It is quite certain that they are distinguished.

However, I would point out to you in passing that this does not partake of logic. They recognize themselves as speaking beings only by rejecting this distinction by means of all sorts of identifications, and it is the common practice of psychoanalysis to notice how this forms the mainspring behind the phases of every childhood. This is just a parenthesis, however.

Logically speaking, the important thing, and this is what I didn't deny, is that they se distinguent. There is a slide here. What I did not deny is precisely not that. One distinguishes them. It is not they who distinguish themselves.

So it is that people say – Oh, what a proper young lad he is. You can already see how different he is from a little girl. He's already restless, investigating, already in want of kudos. The little girl, meanwhile, is far from resembling him. She's already thinking only of playing at hiding behind a fan, as it were, which consists in tucking her face into a niche and refusing to say hello. But there you go, people only marvel at this because this is exactly how it will be later on, in conformity with the types of man and woman such as they will be constituted from something quite different, namely from the consequence of the value that the small difference will have acquired in what comes next.

Needless to say, hurrah for the small difference had already been there for the parents for a long while. It had already had its effects on the way that the little lad and the little lass would be treated. It's not entirely sure. It's not always like that. But you don't need this for the judgement of recognition from adults in the child's ambit to be based on an error, the error that consists in recognizing them from what distinguishes them, no doubt, but recognizing them solely in accordance with criteria that have been shaped under language dependence. This assumes that it is the case, as I say it is, that the castration complex exists because these beings are speaking beings. I'm adding this in order to insist, so that you will understand properly what I mean.

It is in this respect that the hommoinzune, of error, lends consistency to the naturalness – which moreover is incontestable – of this premature calling, if I may put it like that, which each and every one of us experiences for our sex. Furthermore, it should be added that in cases where this calling is not apparent, it doesn't undermine the error, because it can be rounded out with ease by being attributed to nature as such, and no less naturally so. When things don't match, they say that she's a garçon manqué, a tomboy, don't they? In such cases, manque, lack, has great facility for being considered a success, to the extent that nothing stops one from imputing a little extra femininity to this lack. Woman, true woman, the proper young lass, hides behind this very lack. Moreover, this is a refinement that fully conforms to what the unconscious teaches us, never better succeeding than in failing.

In these conditions, to get to the other sex one really has to pay the price, the price of the small difference, which deceptively passes over to the real through the intermediary of the organ. This happens precisely when it stops being taken for an organ. By the same stroke, it reveals what it means to be an organ. An organ is an instrument only through the intervention of the fact that it is a signifier, which is what founds any instrument.

It is qua signifier that the transsexual wants rid of it, and not qua organ. Thus, he suffers because of an error, the common error. The transsexual's passion is the madness of wanting to free himself from this error, the common error that doesn't see that the signifier is jouissance, and that the phallus is only its signified. The transsexual wants to be no longer signified phallus by sexual discourse, which, I say, is impossible. He is wrong in just one respect, in wanting to force, by means of surgery, sexual discourse which, qua impossible, is the point of passage to the real.

This is the same thing I once stated in a programme for a congress on female sexuality. I said, for those who know how to read of course, that only the homosexual, to be written in the feminine, homosexuelle, sustains sexual discourse in total safety.

This was why I called upon the testimony of Les Précieuses who, as you know, remain a model for me, Les Précieuses who, if I may say so, define so admirably the excès au mot, the excess in the word – allow me if you will to stop the word right there – the Ecce homo of love, because there's no way they will take the phallus for a signifier. O fie, fie, fie! O fie, phi, signi-Φ! It is only by breaking up the signifier at the level of its letter that one gets to the bottom of it with its final term.

It is unfortunate, though, that for her, the female homosexual, this amputates the psychoanalytic discourse, because it's a fact that this discourse completely blinds these very dear women to what is involved in feminine jouissance.

Contrary to what can be read in a famous play by Apollinaire, the same play that introduced the word surréaliste, Theresa becomes Tiresias – don't forget that I've just been speaking about blindness – not by letting go, but by retrieving the two birds of her weakness – I'm quoting Apollinaire, for those who haven't read it – namely, the large and small balloons that represent them on the theatre stage, and which are perhaps – I'm saying perhaps because I don't want to divert your attention, so I'll make do with a perhaps – the very thing owing to which a woman can find jouissance only in an absence.

The female homosexual is on no account absent in the jouissance that remains to her. I repeat, this puts her at ease with the discourse of love, but it's quite clear that it excludes her from the psychoanalytic discourse, which she can barely stammer through.

2

Let's try to move forward.

Given how late it is, I can only provide a quick indication of the following – that concerning what is involved in everything that is posited as sexual relation, instituting it through a sort of fiction that is called marriage, it would be a good rule for the psychoanalyst to tell himself on this score, let them muddle through as best they can.

This is the rule that the psychoanalyst follows in practice. He doesn't say so, nor does he even tell himself as much, through some kind of false shame because he believes himself duty-bound to overcome every tragedy. This is a legacy of sheer superstition. He plays the doctor, but never have doctors got caught up in ensuring conjugal happiness. Since psychoanalysts haven't yet noticed that there is no such thing as sexual relation, they are haunted by playing the role of Providence in couples.

All of the above – the false shame, the superstition, the inability to formulate a precise rule on this point, the same rule that I've just set out by saying let them muddle through – stems from a failure to recognize what their experience repeats to them, namely that there is no such thing as sexual relation.

I could even use the verb seriner.[8] It has to be said that the etymology of seriner leads us straight to siren. It's textual. It's in the Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue française. I'm not the one who's giving myself over to some such song here all of a sudden.

This is doubtless why the psychoanalyst, like Ulysses in similar conditions, stays lashed to a mast. Naturally, for as long it lasts – the Sirens' song that enchants him, that is to say, that makes him hear everything the wrong way round – he has to stay lashed to the mast, in which you cannot fail to recognize the phallus, that is to say, the major, all-embracing signified. This is only convenient for everyone in so far as it has no untoward consequences, because it's made for that, for the good ship psychoanalysis herself, that is, for all those who are in the same boat.

It is still the case that he hears the Sirens' song of experience the wrong way round, and this is why it has thus far remained a private domain – I mean, for those who are in the same boat. What happens on this boat, where there are also beings of both sexes, is none the less remarkable. It so happens that I hear from the lips of people who sometimes come to visit me from these boats – I who am, my goodness, on another one – that the same rules don't apply there. This would be rather exemplary, were the way I got wind of it not so peculiar.

In studying what emerges from a certain pattern to the misrecognition of what forms the psychoanalytic discourse, namely the consequences it has on what I shall call the style of what is related to liaison – because in the end the absence of sexual relation clearly doesn't prevent liaisons, far from it, but rather provides them with their conditions – this would perhaps afford a glimpse of what might result from the fact that the psychoanalytic discourse is still being accommodated on these boats, where currently it does its wandering. Something of this gives us to fear this might remain its privilege.

It could ensue that something of this style should come to dominate the realm of liaisons in what is improperly called the vast field of the world and, truth be told, this is not reassuring. It would surely be yet more untoward than the present state, which is such that it is from the misrecognition I have just pointed out that there arises what can often be seen at the start of a psychoanalysis, and which after all is not unwarranted, namely the fears that are sometimes expressed by subjects as to everything that might constrict or affect the engaging relationships, the enthralling acts, and even the creative upheavals, that are necessitated by the absence of relation.

They do not know that, all told, these fears are stirred up by giving credence to the institutionalized silence of psychoanalysis on this matter of there being no such thing as sexual relation.

3

Before taking leave of you I should like to make some headway into something, to explore what I called a new logic.

This new logic is to be constructed from what occurs on account of the following having been posited at the outset. Nothing of what occurs due to the instance of language can in any case whatsoever give rise to any formulation of relation that would be satisfactory.

This logical exploration is not only the questioning of what imposes a limit on language in its apprehension of the real. In the very structure of this effort at broaching it, in its specific handling, it demonstrates the aspect of the real that lies in the fact of having determined language. Can't we take something from this?

If it is at the site of a certain rift in the real – which is strictly speaking inexpressible because this rift is what would determine all discourse – that the lines of these fields lie, lines that we find in the psychoanalytic experience, is it not appropriate, probable, and fit to infer that what logic has traced out by referring language to what is posited as real can enable us to ascertain, along certain lines that stand to be invented, an orientation? Here lies the theoretical effort I am designating as the facility that would find an insistence.

Before leaving you today, I shall do no more than point out that there are three registers that, strictly speaking, have already emerged from the expansion of logic, three registers that my efforts shall revolve around this year, in order to develop what is involved by way of consequence in the following, which was posited at the outset – there is no such thing as sexual relation.

First, we have what you've already seen cropping up in my disquisition, the prosdiorismoi.

Today, in the course of this first approach, I have only touched on the statement of the pas-tous, the not-all. Already, last year, I thought I should isolate this statement for you by writing $\overline{\forall(x)}$ beside the function Φx, which I'm leaving in its entirely cryptic state. This is not the function of sexual relation, but rather the function that makes access to it impossible. It stands to be defined this year. Think of it as a function of jouissance. Why would it not be possible to set down a function of jouissance in writing? It is in putting it to the test that we shall see its tenability, as it were, or otherwise.

I was already led to put forward the function of the not-all last year, and certainly from a point that is far closer with respect to what is at issue. Today I am doing no more than landing on our terrain. Last year, I put forward this function using a negative bar placed above the term $\forall(x)$ that in the theory of quantifiers denotes the equivalent of all. It is only its equivalent. I shall go still further and say that it's a paring down in relation to Aristotle's naïve use of the prosdiorismos all.

The important thing for today is to have put before you the function of the pas-tout, the not-all.

Everyone knows that what arises, as it were naïvely, from the proposition that Aristotle calls the particular proposition is that there exists something that is reckoned to correspond to it. Whenever you use the word some, this does indeed seem to go without saying. Yet it does not go without saying, because it is not enough to negate the not-all for existence to be affirmed for each of the two bits, if I can put it like that. Of course, should existence be affirmed, the not-all is produced. Our way forward has to take in this There exists.

On this score, ambiguities have been sustained for such a long time that people have come to mix up essence and existence, and even more astonishingly, to believe that it means more to exist than to be. The whole problem is perhaps precisely that There exist, certainly, men and women, who do nothing more than exist, all told. Because after all, in the correct use that stands to be made of it once logic has allowed itself to peel apart a little from the real, which in truth is the only way for it to be identified in relation to the real, that is to say, once it has been guaranteed only by the portion of the real in which a truth is possible, that is to say, a mathematics, one can clearly see that any There exists whatsoever is but a number that fulfils the terms of an equation, for example.

I'm not settling the question as to whether number is to be considered real or not. So as not to leave you in any ambiguity, I can tell you that I do settle the question – number is part of the real. It is, however, a privileged real, in regard to which the handling of truth allows logic to progress. Be that as it may, the mode of existence of a number is not, strictly speaking, something that can guarantee for us what is involved in existence each time the prosdiorismos some is asserted.

There is a second plane that I shall do no more than pick out here as a reference point of the field we are going to have to move into, a logic that will be advantageous for us – the field of modality.

As everyone knows, by looking into Aristotle, modality is what is involved in the possible. It is what may occur. I shall do no more here than indicate the frontispiece to it.

Aristotle plays four categories against one other. There is the possible, which he pits against the impossible, and the necessary, which he pits against the contingent. We shall see that nothing in these oppositions holds water. For today, I'm simply pointing out to you what is involved in the formulation of the necessary, which is strictly speaking not to be able not to. This is what specifically defines necessity for us. Where does that lead? From the impossible, not to be able, to an able not to. Is the latter possible or contingent? Either way, what is quite certain is that should you care to take the opposite route, what you find is able not to be able, that is, it joins up with the unlikeliness, the obsolescence, of what may occur, namely, not the impossible to which one would return by looping the loop, but quite simply powerlessness. This is just to indicate the second field of questions to be opened, as a frontispiece.

The third term is negation.

Considering what I have written, and what completes it in the formulae from last year written up on the blackboard, $\exists x.\overline{\Phi x}$, does it not strike you that there are two utterly distinct possible forms of negation?

The grammarians have already tackled these forms, but, in truth, they did so in a grammar that claimed to go from words to thought, which says it all. You embark in semantics and shipwreck is guaranteed! The distinction they draw between foreclosure and discordance is worth recalling, however, as we enter what we shall be dealing with this year. I still need to specify – and the purpose of the following sessions will be to afford each of these chapters suitable development – that foreclosure cannot in itself be bound, contrary to what Damourette and Pichon have said, to pas, to point, to goutte, to mie, or even to some of the other accessory terms that seem to support it in French.[9] Nevertheless, it should be noted that what runs counter to this is precisely our not-all. Our not-all is discordance.

But what is foreclosure? It is certainly to be placed in a register that is very different from that of discordance. It is to be placed at the point where we have written the term known as function. It is here that the importance of the fact of saying is formulated. There is no foreclosure but from the fact of saying so, but from this something that exists, since existence is already reserved for what we must surely furnish with its status – that something may or may not be said. This is what is at issue in foreclosure. Moreover, from the fact that something may not be said thereof, the only conclusion is a question that bears on the real.

For the time being, the function Φx, in the way I have written it, means solely that for everything that concerns the speaking being, sexual relation constitutes a question. All our experience lies here, I mean, the minimum that we may derive from it. As with any question, there would be no question were there not a response. The patterns this question follows when posed, that is, the responses, are precisely what it is a matter of setting down in writing in this function.

Without any doubt, this is going to enable us to form a juncture between what has been developed by way of logic and what can be grounded on the principle, considered as an effect of the real, that it is not possible to set sexual relation down in writing, namely the function that regulates everything that is involved in our experience.

By constituting a question, sexual relation, which is no such thing, in the sense that one cannot write it, determines everything that is developed in terms of a discourse the nature of which is to be a ruptured discourse.

8 December 1971

II

THE FUNCTION Φx

The written: the return of the repressed
A matheme verging on doltishness Aristotle, Being, and the One Castration and existence
The not-all

This morning I was given a little pen as a present. If you knew just how hard it is for me to find a pen that I like, you would be able to sense how much pleasure this has given me. I thank the person who brought it to me, who is perhaps here. This person admires me, as they say. I don't give a damn about being admired. What I like is to be treated well. Yet even from those who admire me, this seldom happens.

Be that as it may, I made use of this pen straightaway to do some writing, and this is where my reflections began. It's when I am writing that I find something. This is a fact. At least, it is for me. It doesn't mean that if I were not to write, I wouldn't find anything. But then, perhaps I wouldn't even notice.

1

With respect to this function of the écrit, of the written, which is on the agenda thanks to a few smart Alecs, perhaps I didn't really care to take sides, but my hand is being forced, so why not?

I'm going to spell out my idea of it – and this is perhaps what has led to some confusion in certain cases – emphatically, with no frills. Indeed, I said to myself, today in fact, that something written could be very helpful for me to find something, but writing something down just for the sake of sparing myself strain or risk, shall we say, or a good many other things besides, does not in the end make for particularly good results. Better to have nothing to read for you. Furthermore, the written work in which now and then I do produce a few findings is not the same as that whereby I might prepare what I have to say here.

Then, there is also what is written for print, which is something more different still. More accurately, it would be untoward to believe that whatever I might once have written down in order to speak to you should constitute written work that would be fully admissible, or which I would anthologize.

I will venture, therefore, to say something that takes the plunge. My idea of the written – to situate it, to start from there, which may be debated afterwards – well, let's say it, colon, is the return of the repressed.

It's in this form that it might have led to confusion in some of my Écrits. If I have sometimes appeared to lend credence to the belief that I identify signifiers with letters, this is precisely because the signifier touches me most, as an analyst, in the form of the letter. It's as a letter that I most frequently see the signifier coming back, the repressed signifier. So, in L'instance de la lettre, it's all the more legitimate for me to have imaged this signifier with a letter given that everyone else does as much.

The first time that logic, strictly speaking, was opened up with Aristotle and the Analytics, there too, letters were used. This is not altogether in the same way as the letter comes back to the place of the signifier that makes a return. The letter comes there to mark out a place, the place of the signifier, which is a signifier that is lying around, that may at the very least be lying around all over the place. In the end, however, we can see that the letter is in some sense designed just for this, and all the more so given that this is how the letter first manifests itself.

I don't know whether you are fully aware of this, but in the end I do hope you will think about it, because even so, it does presuppose something that has not been said in what I have been putting forward. There has to be a kind of transmutation that occurs, from signifier to letter, when the signifier isn't there, when it's gone off course, when it's scarpered. One would have to ask oneself how this transmutation might come about. But this is not what I mean to go into today. I might turn to it some other day.

Even so, on the subject of this letter, one cannot feign that one is not dealing, in a field that is called mathematics, with a site at which one cannot write just any old thing. I'm not about to go into this either. I will simply point out that it's in this respect that this domain sets itself apart, and that probably this is even what constitutes what I have not yet alluded to here, at this Seminar I mean, but which I reported in a few remarks at Sainte-Anne, which doubtless some of you here attended, namely what may be called a matheme. I posited that this matheme is the pivotal point of all teaching. In other words, mathematical teaching is the only teaching. The rest is banter.

Of course, this hinges on a different status of the written from the one I gave at the outset. I shall be trying to form a juncture between them during the course of the year.

In the meantime, my difficulty, the one that I hold to in spite of it all – I don't know whether this comes from me or whether it's not rather through your participation – is that, in view of the field of discourse that I have to establish, my own matheme invariably verges on doltishness.

This is self-evident, given what I've told you, since all in all what is at issue is that when it comes to sexual relation, y en a pas. There's no such thing. It ought to be written hi-han and appât, with a double p, a circumflex accent on the second a, and a t at the end.[1] Naturally, sexual relation shouldn't be confused with sexual intercourse, which is all there is.

However, these sexual encounters are always bungled, even, and above all, when they are acts. Well, let's move on.

2

While there is still time, I should like you to read a very fine introduction, something essential – Aristotle's Metaphysics.

By the time I come back to it, perhaps at the beginning of March, you will need to have read it attentively, so that you can see its relationship with this business of ours. Naturally, I won't be speaking to you about the Metaphysics. Not that I don't admire doltishness. I daresay I bow low before it.

You lot, you don't bow low. You're an organized and mindful electorate. You don't vote for dolts. That's your undoing. A favourable political system should allow doltishness to have its place. Moreover, things go well only when doltishness dominates. That said, this is no reason to bow low.

Therefore, the text I'm going to take up is an exploit, and one of many such exploits that are, as it were, unexploited. This text is Plato's Parmenides, which is going to be of service to us. However, properly to comprehend the depth this text possesses, a text that is not doltish, one needs to have read Aristotle's Metaphysics.

When I recommend reading the Critique of Practical Reason as a novel – it's brimming with humour – I don't know whether anyone has ever followed this advice and managed to read it as I do. At least, no one has confided as much. This invitation is somewhere in Kant avec Sade, which I never know if anyone has read. So, I'll do the same again. I'm going to tell you to read Aristotle's Metaphysics. And I hope that, like me, you will sense that it's truly doltish. I don't want to dwell too long on this. These are brief sidelong remarks that have occurred to me. You cannot help but be struck by this character of doltishness, when you read the text, of course.

This is not about Aristotle's Metaphysics in its essence, in the signified, in everything that has been explained to you on the basis of this magnificent text, that is, everything that has gone to make up metaphysics in this part of the world in which we find ourselves. Because everything came out of this. It's quite fabulous. People speak about the end of metaphysics, but in the name of what? So long as this book exists, one can still do metaphysics.

This book, because it is a book, is very different from metaphysics. It's a written book, which I was speaking about earlier. It has been given a meaning that is called metaphysics, but even so, meaning has to be differentiated from the book. Naturally, once it has been given all this meaning, it's not easy to get back to the book. If truly you do get back to it, you will nevertheless see what has been read into it by people who have a discipline, which is a method that is called historical, critical, exegetical, what you will. Evidently they are capable of reading the text with a certain way of barring themselves off from the meaning, and when you look at the text, well, you are beset by doubts.

This obstacle, arising from everything that has been understood therein, can exist only at the academic level, and universities haven't always been in existence. Well, in Antiquity, three or four centuries after Aristotle, they started to air the most serious doubts about this text, because they still knew how to read. They voiced doubts, saying that it was a series of notes, or else that a pupil had put it together, amassing stuff. I must say I am not convinced in the slightest. It might be because I've just read a book by a certain Michelet, not our Michelet, not our poet – when I say our poet, by that I mean that I place him very highly – but instead a fellow who was a professor at the University of Berlin, also named Michelet, Karl Ludwig. He wrote a book on Aristotle's Metaphysics, published in 1836, because the historical method that was then flourishing had mildly annoyed him with the doubts it was airing, which were not unfounded since they reach back to Late Antiquity. I must say that Michelet is not of this opinion, and nor am I.

Indeed, truly – how shall I put it? – doltishness is a mark of proof when it comes to authenticity. The dominant factor is the authenticity, as it were, of doltishness. Perhaps the term authentic is still a little bit complicated for us, with its etymological resonances of Greek. There are languages in which it is better represented. It is echt. I don't know how you turn it into a noun. It must be Echtheit, or something of the like. No matter. There is nevertheless nothing more authentic than doltishness. So, this authenticity is perhaps not Aristotle's authenticity, but the Metaphysics – I'm speaking about the text – is authentic. It cannot be composed of pieces or fragments. It is constant in its doltishness.

What is the justification for calling it doltishness? One slides into doltishness when one pitches the questions at a particular level that is determined precisely by the fact of language, namely when one nears its essential function, which is to fill in everything that has been left gaping wide by the fact that there can be no such thing as sexual relation, meaning that nothing written, as a product of language, can account for it in a satisfactory way.

Of course, since the moment we first caught a view of gametes we have been able to write on the blackboard man = bearer of spermatozoa. This would be a rather odd definition because he's not the only one who bears spermatozoa, there's a host of other animals. Let's start talking about biology, then. Why are the spermatozoa of man the same that men carry? Because, since it's the spermatozoa of man that makes man, we are in a circle that turns around. So what? It can be written down.

Yet this bears no relation whatsoever to anything that may be, so to speak, sensibly written, that is, which would bear a relation to the real. Just because it's biological, this doesn't make it more real. It is the product of science that is called biological. The real is something else.

The real is what commands the entire function of signifiance. The real is what you encounter precisely on account of not being able, in mathematics, to write just any old thing. The real is what is entailed in the fact that, in the most commonplace function, you are immersed in signifiance, yet you cannot grasp all the signifiers at the same time. This is forbidden by their very structure. When you have some, a mass of them, you no longer have the others. They are repressed. This does not mean that you don't utter them none the less. Precisely, they are said inter. There is an inter-diction. It doesn't stop you from uttering them. But they are said censured. Either everything that psychoanalysis is possesses no meaning and can be slung in the bin, or else what I'm telling you here has to be your home truth.

This is what will be at issue this year. When one poises oneself at a certain level, Aristotle or not – either way the text is there and it's authentic – there's no plain sailing. It's engaging to see someone so sharp, so learnèd, so alert, and so lucid, starting to flounder in this way. Why does he flounder? Because he wonders about the principle. Naturally, he hasn't the faintest idea that the principle is that there is no such thing as sexual relation. And yet one can see that it is solely at this level that he poses himself all the questions.

So, what is it that comes out of him like a bird on the wing, from the top hat into which he had simply placed a question the nature of which he was unacquainted with? It's like the conjurer who thinks he has put a rabbit in the top hat to emerge from it later, and out pops a rhinoceros instead. That's exactly how it is for Aristotle. Where is the principle? If it's the genus, he gets angry – because is it the broad genus or the more specified genus? It's clear that the broader is the most essential, but that even so, the more specified is what readily supplies what is most unique to each entity.

So, he doesn't even realize, but thank goodness he doesn't, for owing to this he doesn't mix them up. Because this business of essentiality and this business of oneness are the same thing, or more accurately, it is homonymous with what he examines. Thank goodness, he doesn't mix them up. He doesn't make them emerge from there. He asks himself – is the One the principle, or is Being the principle? This is when things start to become a damned awful muddle. The One must, at any cost, be. And Being must be One. This is where we lose our pedalling because, precisely, the way not to mess up is strictly to separate them. This is what we shall be trying to do later.

That's enough of Aristotle.

3

Last year, I took the step of announcing to you that this non-relation, if I can put it like that, needs to be written. It needs to be written at any cost. I mean that the other relation needs to be written, the one that blocks the possibility of writing the first one.

I put some items on the blackboard last year which I think it would not be a bad idea to posit here at the outset.

Naturally, there is some arbitrariness here. I'm not about to excuse myself by using the mathematicians as a shield to hide behind. They do as they please, and so do I. Even so, just for those who feel the need to make excuses for me, I can say that in Bourbaki's Elements they start by chucking letters around without saying a single word about what they might be used for. Let's call them written symbols, because they don't even look like letters. These symbols represent something that one can call operations. Not a word is said about which operations are at issue. Only twenty pages in is one able to deduce this retroactively, based on the way they have been used.

I won't be going that far. I shall attempt to examine right now what is meant by the letters I wrote. However, since I reckon that for you it would be far more complicated were I to set them out one by one, as they become animated and assume a functional value, I would rather posit these letters as the items around which I will have to navigate afterwards.

Since you can't hear me when I turn to the blackboard, there are two ways of going about this – either I write and keep my mouth shut, then speak afterwards, or I carry on speaking a bit if you manage to keep within earshot. So, can you hear me?

Already, last year, and for reasons that are tentative, I thought I would write Φx as they do in mathematics, as a function. This is the function constituted by the fact that the jouissance called sexual jouissance exists, which is specifically what forms a barrier to sexual relation.

For the speaking being, sexual jouissance opens the door to jouissance. Train your ears and you will perceive that jouissance, when we refer to it like that tout court, might be what jouissance is for some – I don't exclude this – but it's really not sexual jouissance.

This is the merit that can be bestowed on Sade's text, for calling a spade a spade. Jouissance is the jouissance of a body. Jouissance is the embracing, the clutching, the fragmenting of the body. In legal parlance, avoir la jouissance of something is precisely that, to be able to treat some thing as a body, that is, to wreck it. This is the most regular mode of jouissance, and this is why these statements invariably have a Sadean resonance. Sadean is not to be confused with sadistic. So much rubbish has been spoken about sadism that the term has been devalued. I won't go any further on that point.

What is produced by the relationship between signifier and jouissance is what I am expressing with this notation Φx. This means that x merely designates a signifier. Each of you here can be a signifier, precisely at the slender level at which you exist as sexuated. It is, if I may say so, very slender in width, but it has a far larger surface than it does in animals. When they are not on heat, you can't differentiate in animals between what in the last lesson I was calling the young boy and the young girl. Lion cubs, for example, look utterly alike in their behaviour. But not you, precisely for as much as you sexuate yourselves comme signifiant, as signifying.

It is not about underscoring the signifier man as distinct from the signifier woman, calling one x and the other y, because this is precisely the question – how are they distinguished? It is for this reason that I'm putting the x in the place of the hole that I'm making in the signifier, that is to say, I'm setting down this x as an apparent variable. This means that each time I have to deal with this sexual signifier, with this something that has to do with jouissance, I will be dealing with Φx. Among these $x$es, there are some that are specified in such a way that one can write for all x – whatever or whoever it may be – Φx. This means that what functions here is what is known in mathematics as a Φ function, that is, it can be written $\forall x.\Phi x$.

I'm going to enlighten you straightaway. Well, enlighten ... You're the only ones who will be enlightened. You will be enlightened for a short while. As the Stoics used to say, if it is day, it is light. As for me, as I wrote on the back cover of my Écrits, I take the side of the Enlightenment thinkers. I shine a light, in the hope that the day will come, of course. However, it's precisely this day that is in question. The day won't come tomorrow. The first step to be taken in Enlightenment philosophy is to know that the day hasn't dawned, that the daylight at issue is one of a faint shaft of light in a perfectly dark field. In view of which, you're going to think that it's clear when I tell you that Φx means the function that is called castration.

Since you think you know what castration is, well, I presume you're glad, at least for the time being. Yet can you imagine that if I'm writing all this on the board, which I'm going to continue to do, it's because I have no idea what castration is. It's because I'm hoping, with the help of what is played out in these letters, finally to see day dawning, namely to know that one really does have to pass through this, through castration. So long as one is unaware of this, no discourse can be sound, sound in the sense that it leaves half of its status and conditioning in the shadows. And one can become aware of this only by enabling a particular changing of the letters to be played out across different levels of topological relationship, and by seeing how this is shared out.

Until then, you are reduced to little stories – namely, Dad said we're going to snip it off – as though this were not the epitome of doltishness. So, somewhere there is a site at which it may be said that everything that is articulated by way of signifiers falls under the sway of Φx, under the sway of this function of castration.

There is one small advantage to formulating it in this way. You might get the idea that, if earlier I made the remark, not unintentionally – I'm more cunning than I might seem – about the subject of inter-diction, namely that never can all the signifiers be there, all together, it's because this perhaps bears a relation to castration. I'm not saying – the unconscious = castration. I'm saying that it bears a strong relation. Obviously, writing this as Φx amounts to writing a function that carries, as Aristotle would say, an incredibly broad scope.

I haven't said anything yet about the relation between this function and a certain signifier, but let's say it. This signifier is, for instance, a man. All this is exhausting because there is a lot to wade through, and then, since no one has ever done this before me, it runs the risk of toppling down on our heads at any moment.

Un homme, a man. I didn't say l'homme. It's rather funny, though, how the signifier gets used. People say to the lad, Be a man. They don't say, Be man. Why is that? What is curious is that you don't hear Be a woman very often. On the other hand, people speak of la femme, with a definite article, the woman. There has been much speculation about this definite article. Well, we'll be coming across this when the moment is right. What I simply want to say is that what is written in terms of Φx produces the effect that one no longer has the entirety of signifiers at one's disposal. I'm not even saying these two signifiers here, precisely, but these and a certain number of others that link up with them. Perhaps, right here, this is a first inroad to what is involved in castration from the point of view of this mathematical function, which is imitated in what I have written.

In a first phase, I ask no more of you than to acknowledge that my way of writing it is an imitation. This doesn't mean that for me, having already reflected on it, it doesn't go a great deal further. Anyway, there is a means of writing it such that, given any x, this functions.

This is specific to a way of writing that stems from the first skeleton of logic, for which Aristotle is responsible, which earned him prestige due to the fact that logic harbours a formidable jouissance, because it touches on the field of castration.

How otherwise could you explain how so broad a period, of such searing intelligence and such abundant output as our Middle Ages, was able to get excited to this extent about these affairs of logic, of Aristotelian logic? For it moved hordes of people, given that through the intermediary of logicians it had consequences in theology, where the logic dominated the theo a great deal. This is not the case in our time, where only the theo remains, still as solid as can be in its doltishness, and from which the logic has fairly evaporated. For it to have put people in that state in the Middle Ages, the matter must procure jouissance.

It was from here that was derived all the prestige that, in Aristotle's construction, reflected onto the famous Metaphysics, in which he writes such copious drivel.

I'm not going to give you a lesson today on the history of logic. I will tell you simply to hunt out the First Analytics, which is called more accurately the Prior Analytics. Even for those, who of course are the majority, who will never muster the courage to read it, fascinating though it is, I recommend nevertheless that you read in what is known as Book I, chapter 46, what Aristotle produced on negation. He writes about whether saying the man is not white is indeed the contrary of the man is white, or whether, as many believed, and already believed in his time – which didn't hold him back, however – the contrary is to say the man is non-white.

It's absolutely not the same thing. I think that just in stating it like this, the difference is palpable. It is most important to read this chapter, however, because you have been told so many things about the logic of predicates, at least those who have already tried to tackle some of the places where people speak about this stuff, that you could imagine that syllogisms fall squarely within the logic of predicates. This is a brief indication that I'm giving on the side. Since I didn't want to dwell on it, I might have the time to take it up some other day.

I simply want to say that, for me to be able to write Φx, there was an essential mutation at the start of the nineteenth century, namely the attempt to apply this logic to the mathematical signifier, the special status of which I indicated earlier. This furnished the mode of writing, the depth and originality of which I think I will have the time to make tangible for you in what comes next. In short, it no longer says in any respect whatsoever the same thing as the propositions – because that's what's at issue – that function in syllogisms. As I wrote last year, $\overline{\forall x}.\Phi x$, the sign of negation placed at the level of the $\forall$, is a possibility that was opened for us precisely by the introduction of quantifiers. They are generally termed [in French] quantificateurs, but I prefer to call them quanteurs – I'm not alone in this, nor am I the first – because the important thing is that you should know that this has absolutely nothing to do with quantity, which is obvious. They have been so termed because no better has been found, which in itself is a sign.

This articulation of the quantifiers allows us to posit the function of the pas-tous, the not-all, which has never been done in this logic of quantifiers, and which I'm doing because I consider that it may be very profitable for us. There is a set of these signifiers that supplements the function of what is sexuated, which supplements it with respect to jouissance, at a site where this not-all is functioning within the castration function.

I make further use of the quantifiers. There is a way of articulating them, which is to write $\exists x$, meaning There exists. What exists? There exists a signifier.

When you are dealing with mathematical signifiers, which have a different status from our little sexuated signifiers, and which bite into the real in a different way, you ought perhaps to try to bring to the forefront of your minds how there is at least one thing that is real, the only thing we can be sure about, and this is number. What people manage to do with number! They've done rather a lot. To manage to build the real numbers – that is, precisely the ones that are not real – number has to be something real. I'm addressing this in passing to the mathematicians, who might lob a few rotten tomatoes at me. But what matter. They will do so in private because they find me intimidating here.

Let's come back to what we have to say. There exists. The reference I've just made is not merely a digression. It tells you that this is where There exists carries a meaning. It's a precarious meaning.

It is indeed qua signifiers that you exist, all of you. You surely do exist, but this doesn't go far. You exist qua signifiers. Try imagining yourselves cleansed of this business, and let me know how you get on. After the war we were being incited to exist in a strongly contemporary fashion. Well, look what's left of that. I daresay people nevertheless had a few more ideas in their heads when they were proving the existence of God. It's clear that God exists, but no more so than you. This doesn't get us very far. Well, that is for the sake of developing what is involved in existence.

What is it that might interest us about this There exists in respect of the signifier? It would be that there exists at-least-one for whom this business of castration does not function. This is precisely why the at least one was invented. This is what is called the Father, and this is why the Father exists at least as much as God does, that is to say, not much.

So, naturally, there are a few smart Alecs – I'm surrounded by smart Alecs, who transform what I put forward into intellectual pollution, as a patient of mine put it, and I thank her for supplying me with that, she found it all on her own because she's a sensitive woman, and moreover, by and large only women understand what I'm saying – there are a few smart Alecs who discovered that I was saying that the Father was a myth because it's blindingly obvious that, indeed, Φx doesn't work at the level of Totem and Taboo.[2] The Father is not castrated. Otherwise, how could he possess all the women? Do you realize? It is even here alone that they exist as toutes, as all, because the not-all is suited to women. I'll be commenting on this at greater length in the near future.

So, it's on the basis of this There exists one, in reference to this exception, that all the rest can function. Yet there you go, having fully understood that the rejection of the function Φx can be written down, it is not true that this one gets castrated. This is the myth. But what the smart Alecs didn't notice is that this is correlative to existence, and that this posits the There exists of the it is not true of castration.

It's two o'clock. So, I will simply mark out for you the fourth way of making use of what is involved in the negation grounded on the quantifiers, which is to write $\overline{\exists x}$, There exists not.

Who, or what, doesn't exist? Why shouldn't it be true that it is the function Φx that dominates what is involved in the usage of the signifier? Is that what this means? Just now, I differentiated existence from exception. If the negation here were to mean $\overline{\exists x}.\overline{\Phi x}$, that is, without the exception of this signifier position, it could be inscribed into the negation of castration, into the rejection, into the it is not true that castration dominates everything.

It is on this little enigma that I shall take leave of you today, because, in truth, this is very enlightening for the subject. One can make use of negation in a way that is not so straightforwardly univocal as the use that is made of it in the logic of propositions, where everything that is not true is false, and where – this is confoundedly big – all that is not false becomes true.

I'll leave things now as the hour hand is cutting me off, which is only right. I'll pick them up next time at the precise point at which I've left them today.

15 December 1971

III

FROM ANECDOTE TO LOGIC

Favouring the real of logic
A disturbed relation to the body Function and argument
The not-all and the at least one
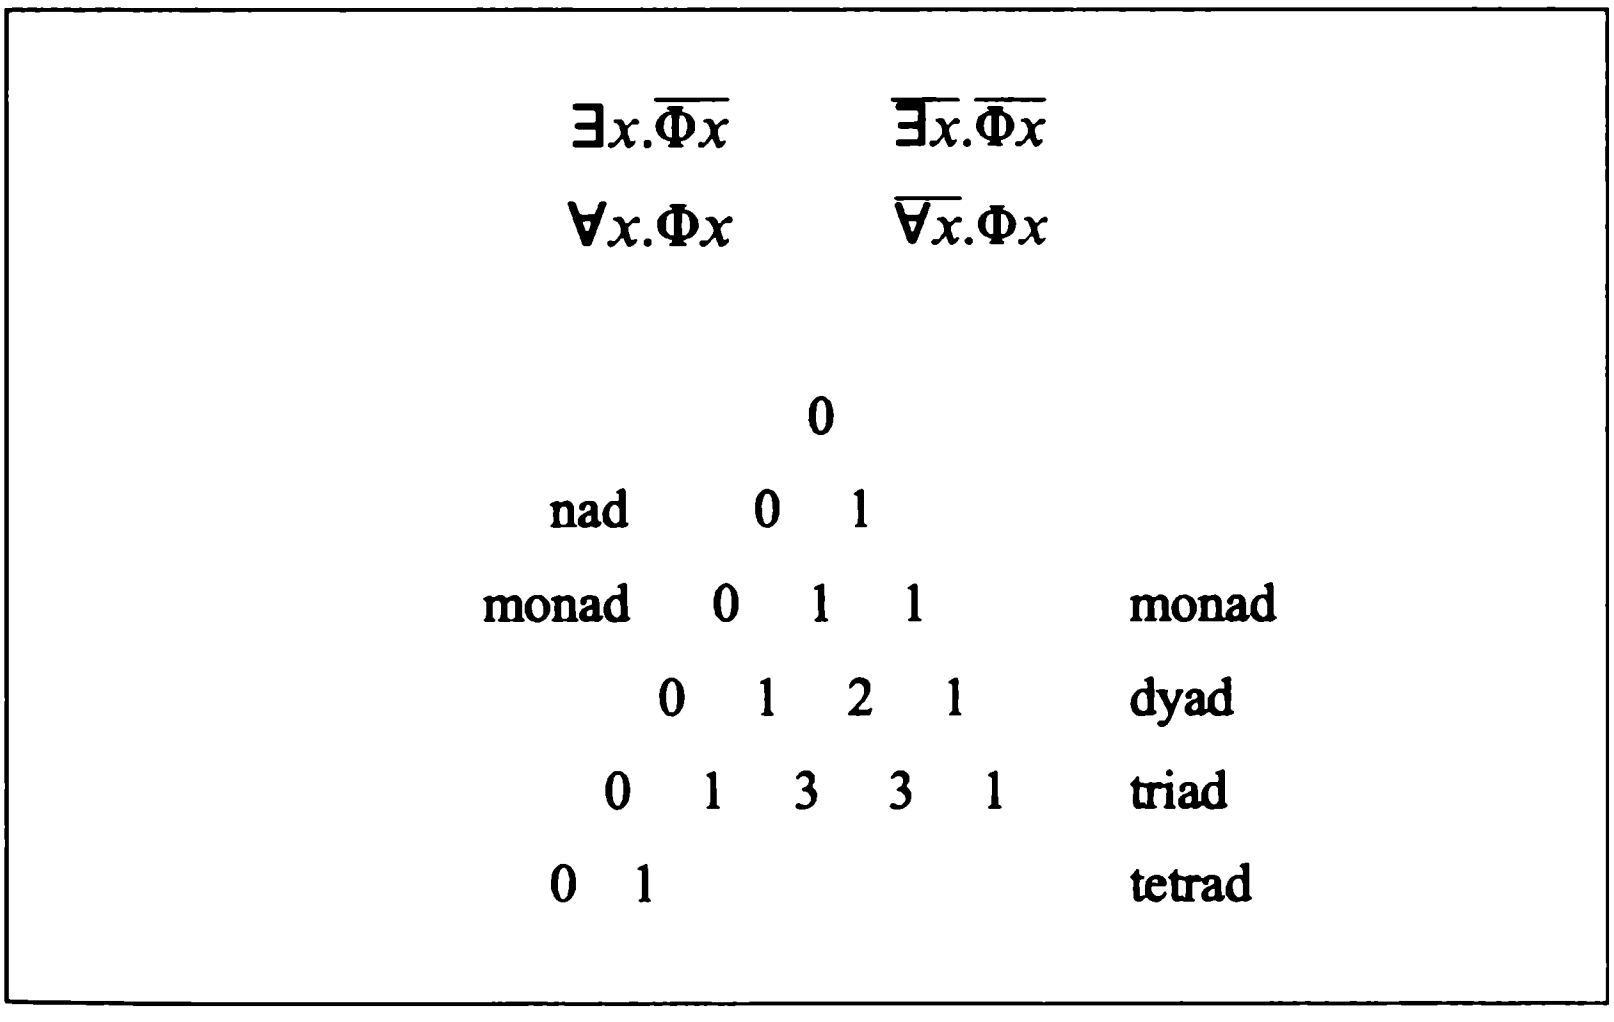
The possible and the contingent



On the blackboard

Were we to find in logic a means of articulating what the unconscious demonstrates by way of sexual values, this would come as no surprise to us.

I mean this would come as no surprise, right here, at my Seminar, that is, right down at the level of this experience, analysis, which was put in place by Freud and whereby a structure of discourse that I have defined was established.

1

Let's take up what I have just said in the density of my opening sentence.

I have spoken of sexual values. I will note that these values are accepted values – accepted in each and every language. Man, woman, these are what are called sexual values. That man and woman should be there at the outset is first and foremost a matter of language. This is the thesis I will start from today.

Language is such that any speaking subject is either he or else she. This exists in all the languages of the world. It is the principle behind the functioning of gender, feminine or masculine. Whenever there is a hermaphrodite, this is just an occasion to play, with more or less mindfulness, at bringing the him and the her into the same sentence. On no account does one call a hermaphrodite it, unless thereby to evince a horror of the sacred type. One does not refer to a hermaphrodite in the neutral.

That said, we don't know what man and woman are. For a while, this bipolarity of values was taken to be sufficient to support, to suture, what is involved in sex. It was from this very fact that resulted the muted metaphor that for centuries underpinned the theory of cognizance. As I have noted elsewhere, the world used to be what was perceived, even apperceived, as though it stood at the place of the other sexual value. The involvement of νοῦς, of the power of cognizance, was placed on the positive side, the active side, of what I will be examining today by asking what relation it bears to the One.

On any tight inroad to the sexual approach, the step that analysis has led us to take shows us, reveals to us, the detour, the barrier, the course, the chicane, the narrow pass, of castration. This step can be properly taken only on the basis of the articulation that I have provided of the analytic discourse. This is what leads us to think that on no account can castration be reduced to anecdote, to mishap, to the clumsy intervention of a word of threat or even of censure. The structure is logical.

What is the object of logic?

You know from experience, just by opening a book with the title Traité de logique,[1] how fragile, uncertain, and eluded, the first stage can be in any tract that goes under the heading of something along the lines of the art of good conduct in one's thinking – but where is this thinking to be conducted, and from which end is it to be taken? – or otherwise, some such recourse to a normality whereby what is rational would be defined independently of the real. It's clear that after this kind of attempt to define the object of logic, what presents itself belongs to a different order and is consistent in a different way. I could simply leave a blank here, but I won't do that. I propose to define the object of logic as what is produced by the necessity of a discourse.

No doubt this is ambiguous, but it's not idiotic because it entails the implication that logic can change meaning completely, depending on where any given discourse draws its meaning from. Any given discourse can take its meaning from another discourse.

For a long time now I've been asserting fairly clearly, for it to be enough just to recall it here, that the real – a category from the triad with which my teaching got under way, the symbolic, the imaginary, and the real – is affirmed in the impasses of logic.

Let me explain. At the start, in its conquering ambition, what logic proposed was nothing less than the network of discourse qua articulated. In being articulated, this network was supposed to close into a universe that was reckoned to surround what is offered to cognizance, and to cover it like a net. The experience of logicians showed that things were different.

I needn't go into details here, because this audience is sufficiently well informed of where in our time the effort of logic has been able to start afresh to know the following. It's a matter of broaching something that in principle has been fined down to a real, namely arithmetic. It has been demonstrated that, in arithmetic, something can always be stated – whether or not it is put to logical deduction – which is articulated as though it stood in advance of the very thing which premises, axioms, and grounding terms, whereby the said arithmetic can find a base, enable us to presume to be provable or refutable. Here, in a domain that in appearance is the surest, we put our finger on what stands in opposition to the entire grasp of discourse, of logical exhaustion, which introduces a wide, irreducible gap here. This is where we designate the real.

Before arriving at the proving ground that might be looming on the horizon, which is indeed uncertain for those who have not formed a firm grasp of its latest proofs, it will be enough to call to mind what naïve discourse is.

Naïve discourse proposes itself at the outset, inscribes itself as such, as truth. Apparently it has never been hard to demonstrate to this naïve discourse that it doesn't know what it is saying. I'm not speaking of the subject. I'm speaking of discourse. This was the dawning – why not say so? – of the Sophist's critique. When somebody states what is invariably posited as truth, the Sophist demonstrates to him that he doesn't know what he is saying. This is even the origin of dialectic as a whole. And then, it's always ready to get a new lease of life. Whenever someone is put in the witness box, the ABC of the barrister is to show him that he doesn't know what he's saying. But here we fall to the level of the subject, of the witness, whom it's a matter of throwing into a muddle. At the level of Sophistic action, it is always the discourse itself that the Sophist lays into. Since I announced that I would have to give an account of the Parmenides, we might this year have to show what is involved in Sophistic action.

In the development of what logicians have enunciated, to which I made reference just now, some of you perhaps noticed that what was at issue was nothing less than Gödel's theorem concerning arithmetic. Gödel proceeds to his demonstration that, in the field of arithmetic, there will always be something that can be stated in the specific terms it comprehends which does not lie within the scope of what it posits to itself as a mode to be taken as accepted in the proof. The remarkable thing is that Gödel does not proceed on the basis of truth values. He doesn't proceed to his demonstration on the basis of truth, but rather on the basis of the notion of derivation. It's by leaving the value of true or false as such in abeyance that the theorem is provable.

What I'm saying about the logical gap with regard to this point – a vital point in that it illustrates what I intend to push forward – is accentuated by the following. If the real, which is certainly of easy access, may be defined as the impossible – the impossible inasmuch as it is borne out by the very holding power of discourse, of the logician's discourse – this impossible, this real, is the one that ought to be favoured by us. When I say by us, I mean by analysts. Because it obtains in an exemplary way that this is the paradigm of what calls into question what can arise from language. From language, certain types of discourse arise which I defined as establishing a very definite type of social bond. But language questions itself about what it grounds as a discourse. It is striking that it can only do so by fostering the shadow of a language that would surpass itself, which would be metalanguage. I have often remarked that it can do so only by scaling back in its function, that is, by begetting, for a start, a particularized discourse. In turning our attention to this real inasmuch as it is affirmed by the logicians' interrogation of language, I propose that here lies the model of what is important for us, namely the model of what is offered up by the exploration of the unconscious.

What is offered up by the exploration of the unconscious is far from being a universal sexual symbolism, which is what the likes of Jung thought they would be able to revive by sliding back into the most ancient rut. Far from it being a universal sexual symbolism, it is very precisely what I called to mind earlier by way of castration, underscoring, however, the requirement that it should not be reduced to the anecdote of a heard remark. Without this, why would one isolate it and accord it the privilege of goodness knows what trauma, or even the efficacy of a gap? It is only too obvious that it has nothing anecdotic about it. It is rigorously fundamental, not in what establishes, but in what renders impossible the statement of sexual bipolarity as such.

The curious thing is that we go on imagining sexual bipolarity at the animal level, as though every illustration of what constitutes in each species the tropism of one sex for the other were not just as variable for that species as their corporeal constitution is. Moreover, haven't we known already for some time now that, regarding sex, not at the level of what I have just defined as the real but at the level of what is articulated within each science, where its object is defined once and for all, there are at least two or three stages in what constitutes the sex, from the genotype to the phenotype? Following the most recent steps in biology – need I mention which? – it's quite sure that sex merely takes up its place as a particular modality of what allows for the reproduction of what is known as a living body. Far from sex being its typical instrument, it is merely one of its forms. Even though Freud indicated this, albeit approximately, people still far too often confuse the function of sex with the function of reproduction.

Things are far from being such that there is the lineage of the gonad on one side, what Weismann called the germen, and on the other the branch of the body, the soma.[2] It's clear that the genotype of the body does pass on something that determines the sex, but that this is not sufficient. From its bodily production, from its corporeal stasis, hormones are released that can interfere in this determination.

So, it's not that, on one side, there is sex inextricably associated with life because it is in the body, sex imagined as the image of what, in the reproduction of life, would supposedly amount to love, and then, on the other side, the body as having to fend off death. The reproduction of life, such as we have managed to examine it at the level of the appearance of its initial forms, emerges from something that is neither life nor death. Quite independently of sex, and even on occasion of something that is already living, something intervenes which we will call the sequence, or even the codon, as is said regarding one or another unit that has been ascertained in chromosomes.

The life-and-death dialogue occurs at the level of what is reproduced. From what we know, it only assumes a dramatic character from the moment that jouissance intervenes in the balance between life and death. The vital point, the point of emergence of something that all of us here more or less believe we form part of, namely speaking being, is this disturbed relation to our bodies that is called jouissance.

The analytic discourse demonstrates that the centre of this, its point of departure, is a privileged relation to sexual jouissance. The value of the other partner, which I began by designating respectively as man and as woman, is unapproachable through language very precisely because language functions, from the start, by standing in for sexual jouissance. It thereby gives order, in bodily repetition, to this intrusion of jouissance.

Today I am going to start to show you how, by making use of logical functions, it is possible to provide what is involved in castration with an articulation that is different from the anecdotal one.

2

In the lineage of the logical exploration of the real, the logicians started with propositions. Logic only got under way when it was known how to isolate in language the function of what are called prosdiorismoi, which are one, some, all, and the negation of these propositions.

Aristotle defined, in order to set them in opposition, the universals and the particulars, and, in each of them, the affirmative and the negative. I want to stress the difference there is between this use of prosdiorismoi and something else that came about which – for requirements of logic, namely for an approach that was none other than the real that is called number – was completely different.

The logical analysis of what is called the propositional function is articulated by isolating something in the proposition, or more exactly through the lack, the void, the hole, the hollow that is made, in what has to function as an argument. To wit, it will be said that any argument in a domain that we can label as you wish, with an x or a gothic $\mathfrak{a}$, placed in the empty place in the proposition,[3] shall suffice, that is, shall supply its truth value. This is an inscription of what is here on the bottom left, the $\forall x.\Phi x$. It matters little what is here in the proposition. The function takes on a true value for any x in the domain.

What is this x? I have said that it is defined as though by a domain. Even so, does this mean we know what this is? Do we know what a man is when we say all men are mortal? We learn something about him from the fact of saying that he is mortal, and precisely from the knowledge that this is true for all men. However, before introducing this all men, we only know the most approximate features, which can be defined in the most variable fashion. This is the story, which I suppose you've known for a long time, of the plucked chicken that Plato recounts. This means that we need to examine the phases of the logical articulation.

Indeed, whatever the prosdiorismos holds does not carry any meaning until it functions as an argument. It only takes on a meaning through entering the function. It takes on the meaning of true or false. It seems to me that this is just what it takes to make us touch on the wide gap that lies between the signifier and its denotation, because meaning, if it lies somewhere, lies in the function, yet denotation only begins when the argument comes to be inscribed within it.

By the same token, this calls into question the following, which is different, namely the use of the letter E, likewise inverted, ∃, meaning There exists. There exists something that can serve in the function as an argument and thereby assume, or not, a truth value. I would like to give you a sense of the difference that lies in this introduction of There exists as a problematic. It calls into question the very function of existence in relation to what was implied by the use of particulars in Aristotle, namely that the use of some would seem to bring existence along with it, such that, since the all was supposed to comprehend this some, the all assumed the value of what it is not. It assumed the value of an affirmation of existence.

The status of the all, namely the universal, lies only at the level of the possible. Given how late it is, we will only be able to see this next time. It is possible to say, among other things, that all humans are mortal. However, the curious thing is that, far from settling the question of the existence of the human being, one has first of all to be sure that the human being exists.

3

I want now to indicate the path that we will start on next time.

The domain from which each x assumes a value can be defined solely by the articulations of the four argument-function conjunctions, under the sign of quantifiers. It is possible to propose the following truth function, namely that all men are defined by the phallic function, the phallic function being specifically what obturates sexual relation.

The universal quantifier will be defined in a different way when the upside-down A is furnished, which is what I have been doing, with a bar that negates it, $\overline{\forall}$. I have put forward the essential trait of the pas-tous, the not-all, $\overline{\forall x}.\Phi x$, as that by which a fundamental statement can be articulated regarding the possibility of denotation that a variable assumes in functioning as an argument.

Woman is situated through it being pas toutes, not all of them, who may be truthfully said to be functioning as an argument within what is stated of the phallic function. What is this pas toutes? It is very precisely what deserves to be examined as a structure. Indeed, contrary to the function of the particular negative, namely that there are some that are not, it is impossible to extract such an affirmation from the pas toutes. To this pas toutes is restricted the indication that somewhere, and nothing more, woman has a relation to the phallic function.

It is from here that the values to be given to my other symbols find their point of departure. Nothing can adapt this all to this not all. Between what symbolically grounds the argumental function of the terms man and woman, there remains the wide gap of an indeterminacy in their common relation to jouissance. They are not defined in relation to this jouissance by the same order.

The denotation of man hinges on the all of the phallic function. However, in spite of this all, There exists . . . – and here, There exists means that it exists exactly as it does in the solution of a mathematical equation – . . . at-least-one for whom the truth of its denotation does not hold in the phallic function.

Is there any need to spell it right out for you? Totem and Taboo is what was fashioned to give some idea of this logical condition that is the condition of indirect approach that woman can make to man.[4] Already, it is in itself extraordinary that it doesn't seem farcical to state the myth in terms of an originary man who is purported to enjoy precisely what does not exist, namely all the women. This is not possible, not simply because clearly one has one's limits, but because there is no such thing as all the women.

So, what is at issue is of course something else, namely that at the level of at-least-one it is possible for the prevalence of the phallic function to be subverted. It is possible for it no longer to be true.

Just because I said that sexual jouissance is the pivotal point of all jouissance, this doesn't mean that I have sufficiently defined what is involved in the phallic function. For the time being, let's say that they are the same thing.

Something is introduced at the level of the at least one of the Father. This at least one means that it is one that can work by itself. As the myth demonstrates – for it is designed especially for this – this means that sexual jouissance will be possible but it will be limited. It presupposes, for each man, at the very least some mastery of this jouissance in his relation with woman. For the woman, at least this much is required – that castration should be possible. This is her approach to man. When it comes to enacting the said castration, she takes care of it.

I would not like to leave you before articulating what is involved in the fourth term. I will have to come back to this, because we've been set back a little today.[5] I had intended, as I intend each time, to cover a much wider field, but since you are patient, you will come back the next time.

We have said that the There exists is problematic. This year will be the occasion to examine what is involved in existence. After all, what exists? Has anyone ever even realized that alongside the fragility, the futility, and the inessentiality constituted by the There exists, the There does not exist does actually mean something? What does it mean to assert that There does not exist an x that would be such that it could fulfil the function Φx endowed with the bar that establishes it as being untrue? That is, $\overline{\exists x}.\overline{\Phi x}$.

This is precisely what I called into question earlier. If not all women have dealings with the phallic function, does this mean that there are women who do have dealings with castration? Well, this is very precisely the point at which man has access to woman.

I'm saying this for the analysts as a whole, those who dawdle, those who spin around, mired in Oedipal relations on the side of the Father. When they can't get out of this, when they can't move beyond what happens on the side of the Father, it has a very precise cause. It's that the subject would have to admit that the essence of woman is not castration.

To spell it right out, on the basis of the real, aside from a mere insignificant nothing – I'm not saying this by chance – women cannot be castrated because they don't have the phallus. I stress that I have still on no account said what this phallus is. From the moment it is impossible as a cause, woman is not linked to castration essentially and access to woman is possible in its indeterminacy.

Doesn't this suggest to you – I'm sowing this seed so that it might resonate here next time – that what is up here on the top left, $\exists x.\overline{\Phi x}$, the at-least-one in question, results from a necessity, and it's in this precise respect that it's a matter of discourse? There is only any necessity qua spoken, and this necessity is what makes the existence of man possible as a sexual value. Contrary to what Aristotle put forward, the possible is the opposite of the necessary. The mainspring of the possible lies in $\exists x$ being opposed to $\forall x$.

I told you that the There does not exist is asserted in a fact of saying, by the fact of being said by man. The impossible is that it is from the real that woman assumes her relation to castration. This is what delivers us the meaning of the $\overline{\forall x}$, that is, of the pas-toute. Just like what was involved in the left-hand column a moment ago, the pas-toute means not impossible. It is not impossible that woman should know the phallic function.

What is this not impossible? It bears a name that is suggested by the Aristotelian tetrad, but which here is arranged differently. In the same way that the possible stood in opposition to the necessary, the contingent stands in opposition to the impossible. It is in so far as woman presents herself to the phallic function by way of an argument in contingency that what is involved in the sexual value woman can be articulated.

It is sixteen minutes past two. I'm not going to push any further today. The cut-off point is falling at a place that is really not especially desirable. I think I have advanced enough with this introduction to the functioning of these terms to have given you a sense of how the use of logic is not unrelated to the content of the unconscious.

Just because Freud said that the unconscious knows no contradiction, this doesn't mean that it is not a land of promise for logical conquest. Have we got to this century without knowing that logic can readily bypass the principle of contradiction?

To say that in everything Freud wrote on the unconscious, logic does not exist, or that the unconscious cannot be explored by the paths of logic, would imply never having read the use he makes of certain terms, for instance, I love her, I don't love him, and all the ways there are of negating I love him by taking grammatical paths.

12 January 1972

IV

FROM NECESSITY TO INEXISTENCE

The symptom, between truth and jouissance
Phallic jouissance
The emergence of the number 1
Leibniz, Frege, Pascal
The two Ones

The art of producing a necessity of discourse

$\exists x.\overline{\Phi x}$ $\quad$ $\overline{\exists x}.\overline{\Phi x}$ $\quad$ the signification of the phallus

$\forall x.\Phi x$ $\quad$ $\overline{\forall x}.\Phi x$ $\quad$ die Bedeutung des Phallus

Objective genitive: a desire → of a child

Subjective genitive: a desire ← of a child

The Law of Talion

0	1	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
	0	1	1	1	1	1	1	1	1
		0	1	2	3	4	5	6	7
			0	1	3	6	10	15	21
				0	1	4	10	20	35
					0	1	5	15	35
						0	1	6	21
							0	1	7

On the blackboard

The art of producing a necessity of discourse is the formula that last time I slipped in, rather than proposed, for what logic is.

Amid the hubbub made by everyone getting to their feet, I left you with the remark that the fact that Freud noted, as a characteristic of the unconscious, that it neglects the principle of contradiction, isn't enough to mean that logic has nothing to do with the elucidation of the unconscious, as some psychoanalysts imagine.

If there is a discourse that deserves to be pinpointed by the recent establishing of analysis, it is more than probable that its logic can be extracted, as for any other discourse.

The least one can say about discourse is that its meaning remains veiled. In truth, what constitutes discourse is very precisely formed through the absence of this meaning. There is no discourse that must not receive its meaning from another discourse. Moreover, concerning the appearance of a new structure of discourse – which is what the analytic discourse is, as I situated it for you last year – if it does take on meaning it is not just by receiving it in this way, but also because it becomes palpable that something original has been produced in the circle that closes through this final shift in what is articulated in the name of signifiance. Indeed, this discourse represents the final shift in a tetradic structure, a quadripode, as I have reminded you in a published text.

1

The art of producing a necessity of discourse is something other than this necessity itself.

Reflect on this. Logical necessity – there can be no other – is the upshot of this production. Necessity, ἀνάγκη, only begins with the speaking being, and by like token, everything that might appear to have been produced by it is invariably the doing of a discourse. If this really is what is at issue in tragedy, it's precisely in so far as tragedy is made concrete as the upshot of a necessity that is logical. This is obvious, for here it's a matter only of speaking beings.

It seems to me that nothing of what is properly speaking ἀνάγκη appears anywhere else but among speaking beings. This is also why Descartes saw animals as mere automatons. That was certainly an illusion, the impact of which we shall show in passing, in connection with what I am about to attempt to open up regarding this art of producing a necessity of discourse.

Produce has a double meaning here. First, it means to demonstrate what was there beforehand. Already, it is by no means sure that something is not reflected in, or does not contain the beginnings of, the necessity that is at issue in the precondition of animal existence. However, for want of any demonstration, what is to be produced must indeed be held to have been inexistent beforehand.

Second, the other sense of produce is the one that a whole research project issuing from the elaboration of a discourse that has already been constituted, known as the discourse of the master, has already put forth under the heading achieving through labour.

It is precisely inasmuch as I myself am the logician in question, the product of the emergence of this new discourse, that production in the sense of demonstration can be declared here in front of you. It has to be supposed that it was already there, through the necessity of the demonstration, as a product of the supposition of the necessity of always, but also vouching precisely for the necessity – which is not a lesser necessity – of the labour of actualizing it. At this point of emergence, however, this necessity by the same token furnishes the proof that initially it can be supposed only as inexistent.

So, what is it then, necessity? No, I shouldn't say it then, which already entails too much Being, but rather, directly, what is necessity? such that from the very fact of producing it, it can only, before being produced, be presupposed as inexistent, which means posed as such in discourse. There is a response to this question, as there is to any question, due to the reason that it is posed, as is any question, only when one already has the response. You have the response, therefore, even if you don't know it. In response to the question what is necessity? you logically cobble together your bricolage. Even if you don't know it, you respond in your day-to-day bricolage. A certain number of you here – not all of you, of course – by virtue of being in analysis with me, come along to confide in me, without moreover being able to assume the sense that in coming to see me, prior to taking a particular step, you presume that I am myself this bricolage. Indeed, by cobbling together this bricolage, all of you, even those who do not confide in me, are already responding to the question. How so? Quite simply by repeating it, by tirelessly repeating this bricolage. This is what is called, at a certain level, the symptom. At another level, it is automatism, which is a somewhat improper term but which can be accounted for by its history.

From one instant to the next, inasmuch as the unconscious exists, you are carrying out the demonstration by which inexistence is grounded as what is preliminary to what is necessary. This is the inexistence of what lies behind the principle of the symptom. It has been so ever since the term assumed its value in emerging with Marx. It is the very consistence of the said symptom. What lies behind the principle of the symptom is the inexistence of the truth that it presupposes, even though it marks out its place. There you have it for the symptom inasmuch as it attaches itself to truth that no longer has currency. In this respect, it can be said that like anyone who scrapes by in the modern age, not a single one of you is unacquainted with this modality of response.

In the second case, it is the inexistence of jouissance that the so-called automatism of repetition brings to the light of insistence, of this stamping at the door that is designated as the exit towards existence. Beyond the door, however, what lies in wait for you is not altogether what is called existence. It is rather jouissance, such as it is operative as the necessity of discourse.[1] And, you see, it operates only as inexistent.

Of course, I'm reminding you of these old refrains, these old chestnuts, with the intention of reassuring you, of giving you the sense that I'm merely delivering you speeches that answer for the fact that there is a particular substance, jouissance, truth in this case, the truth that is lauded in Freud. It still remains, however, that you cannot get down to the bone of structure when you stay at this level.

I asked, what is the necessity that is established on the basis of a supposition of inexistence? In this question, what counts is not that which is inexistent, but rather the supposition of inexistence, which is merely a consequence of producing necessity.

Inexistence only becomes a question on account of already having a response – the twofold response, certainly, of jouissance and of truth – but it already inexists. It is neither through jouissance nor through truth that inexistence assumes a status, that it may inexist, in other words that it may come to the symbol that designates it as inexistence, not in the sense of not having existence, but rather of only being in existence through the symbol that would make it inexistent and which, for its part, does indeed exist. As you know, this is a number that is generally designated as nought. This shows very well that inexistence is not what you might think it is, namely nothingness, for what could come out of nothingness?

The answer to that is nothing, of course, except belief. Belief in itself. There are not umpteen beliefs. God made the world from nothingness. It's no surprise that this should be a dogma. It is belief in itself, it is the rejection of logic, which is here expressed in accordance with the formula – it was one of my pupils who came up with this, all on his own, and I thank him for it – Surely not, but all the same. On no account will this be sufficient for us.

Inexistence is not nothingness. It is, as I've just told you, a number that is part of the series of integers. There can be no theory of integers if you don't take into account what is involved in nought. It is not by chance that this was noticed in an endeavour that was coeval – slightly earlier, actually – with Freud's research. This is the path that was opened by a certain Frege – who was born eight years before Freud and died fourteen years before him – through examining logically what is involved in the status of number.

This has a weighty destiny in our examination of what is involved in the logical necessity of the discourse of analysis. It's what I was pointing out as what could escape your notice in the reference that I was illustrating it with just now as an application, in other words as a functional use, of inexistence. Inexistence is only produced in the retroaction from which there first arises necessity, namely from a discourse in which it manifests itself prior to the logician reaching it himself as a second consequence, that is, at the same time as inexistence itself. Its end is to be reduced right where this necessity manifests itself, prior to him.

I repeat – demonstrating it this time at the same time as I state it – this necessity is repetition itself, in itself, by itself, for itself, that is to say, the very thing through which life demonstrates that it is merely a necessity of discourse, because it finds nothing by which to hold out against death, that is, against its lot of jouissance, apart from recourse to this same thing, which is produced by an opaque sequencing. I stressed that this sequencing is very different from vital power, from love, or from some other poppycock. It's a radical sequencing, which has only started to emerge from the shadows a little with what the biologists have been doing at the level of bacteria, and the consequence of which is precisely the reproduction of life.

What discourse does – in demonstrating this level at which nothing of a logical necessity manifests itself except through repetition – here appears to join up, as a semblance, with what comes about at the level of a message. But this is a message that is in no way easily reduced to what we know of this term. It belongs to the realm of what is located at the level of short combinations, the modulations of which are those that pass from deoxyribonucleic acid to what of this is transmitted at the level of proteins, by the good will of a few intermediaries that are qualified as enzymatic or catalytic.

That here lies what allows us to refer to what is involved in repetition can only come about precisely by elaborating what is involved in the fiction whereby all of a sudden something appears to us to reverberate from the very foundation of what, one fine day, made a living being capable of speaking.

Indeed, among them all there is one living being who does not elude a particularly senseless jouissance, and which I would describe as local, in the sense of accidental. This is the organic form that sexual jouissance assumed for this living being. He colours all his basic needs with jouissance, needs which in other living beings are merely ways of sealing off jouissance. If animals feed on a steady basis, it's quite clear that this is so as to avoid knowing the jouissance of hunger. With jouissance, he who speaks – and this is Freud's discovery – colours all his needs, that is to say, that by which he fends off death.

Just because of this, it shouldn't be thought, however, that sexual jouissance is life. As I told you earlier, it is a local, accidental, and organic production, which is very exactly centred on what is involved in the male organ. Clearly, this is particularly grotesque.[2] Detumescence in the male has generated the special type of appeal that articulated language is, by virtue of which the necessity of speaking is introduced into its dimensions. From this arises logical necessity as a grammar of discourse.

You can see that this is meagre. To notice it, it required nothing less than the emergence of the analytic discourse.

I was careful to put in my Écrits the pronouncement I made a while ago, in 1958, The signification of the phallus. Beneath it, I wrote Die Bedeutung des Phallus. I didn't do that just to take pleasure in making you think that I know some German, though it was indeed in German because it was in Munich that I thought I ought to give voice to what I provided in a retranslated text. It struck me as a timely opportunity to introduce under the term Bedeutung what in French, in view of the degree of culture we had reached back then, I could only decently translate as signification.

The Germans themselves, given that they were analysts – I indicate the shortcoming in a brief note added at the head of the text – didn't cotton on in the slightest to Die Bedeutung des Phallus. It wasn't long after the war, and it can't be said that analysis had made a great deal of progress during that time. As I underscore in the final term of the note, all of that struck them as, strictly speaking, unheard of. Moreover, it's curious that things have moved on to the extent that what I am saying today might already have become common currency for some of you, and rightly so.

Die Bedeutung was, nevertheless, in precise reference to the use that Frege makes of the word, to contrast it with the term Sinn, which corresponds most exactly to what I thought I should remind you of in what I have stated today, namely the meaning of a proposition. What is involved in the necessity that leads to this art of producing it as the necessity of discourse could be expressed differently, and you'll see that this is not incompatible. It could be expressed as, what does it take for a word to denote something? This is the sense that Frege gives to Bedeutung – pay attention, there will be some small changes now – to wit, denotation.

If you would care to open the book called The Foundations of Arithmetic – it has been translated [into French], which makes it wholly accessible for you, within arm's reach, by a certain Claude Imbert, who if I remember rightly used to come to my Seminar – it will strike you as clear, as might have been anticipated, that for there to be reliable denotation it would not be a bad idea to turn first of all, gingerly, to the field of arithmetic as defined by the integers.

There was someone by the name of Kronecker who couldn't help himself, so great is the need for belief, from saying the integers were created by God. In view of which, he adds, everything else is the work of man. Since he was a mathematician, for him this everything else was everything else that has to do with number.

Nothing in this realm is certain. But a logical endeavour can at least attempt to account for the integers, and this is why I'm bringing Frege's work into the field of consideration.

2

Nevertheless, I would like to pause for a moment, if only to encourage you to reread it, on the pronouncement that I produced from the angle of the signification of the phallus, from which you will see that, at the point I've reached – I pride myself on this minor merit – none of it needs revising, even though at the time truly no one understood any of it. I was able to observe as much, then and there.

What does the signification of the phallus mean? In a determinative construction, you always have to ask whether it's an objective or subjective genitive. I'm illustrating this difference through the comparison of two thrusts, indicated here by the two little arrows. A desire of a child with an objective genitive is a child that one desires. A desire of a child with a subjective genitive is a child who desires.[3]

You can try it out. It's always very useful. The thrust of The Law of Talion, which I've written underneath without adding any commentary, can be either that the law is talion – I establish it as law – or what the talion articulates as law, that is, eye for an eye, tooth for a tooth. It's not the same thing. What I would like to get you to notice is that the signification of the phallus – and what I am going to develop will be designed to make you discover this – with the meaning that I have just specified for the word thrust, that is, the little arrow, is neutral. What is ingenious in the signification of the phallus is that what the phallus denotes is the power of signification.

This Φx is not, therefore, a function of the ordinary type. Provided you articulate it with a prosdiorismos, which is something that initially needn't carry any meaning whatsoever and which is itself a product of the research of logical necessity, and nothing else, the argument of the function thus pinpointed will take on the signification of man or of woman depending on the prosdiorismos that is chosen, that is to say, either There exists, or There does not exist – either all or not all.

It is clear none the less that we cannot avoid taking into account what has been produced by a logical necessity, by confronting it with the integers, for the reason that this retroactive necessity implies the supposition of what inexists as such. Now, it is remarkable that it was in examining the integer, in having broached its logical generation, that Frege was led to found the number 1 upon the concept of inexistence.

For him to have been led to this, it has to be thought that what had hitherto been circulating on the foundation of the 1 did not give him satisfaction, a logician's satisfaction. For a long while, people had been content with very little. They thought that it wasn't very difficult. There are several of them, there are many of them, so, they count them. Of course, this poses unsolvable problems for the advent of the integer because it's merely a matter of doing what has been settled on, of coming up with a sign with which to count them.

Such signs exist. I've just been handed a little book with an Arabic poem at the start that indicates in verse what you have to do with your little finger, and then your index finger, and with your ring finger and some of the others, to convey the sign of the number. But precisely because it's a matter of making a sign, number must have another kind of existence besides simply designating, for example, each of the people present here, even letting out a bark for each one. For them to have the value of 1, they have to be divested of all qualities, without exception. People have always been aware of this. So, what remains? Of course, there were a few philosophers, called empiricists, to articulate this by making use of little objects, like small beads. A rosary, of course, is the best thing for it. But this doesn't resolve in the slightest the question of the emergence of the 1.

This was spotted very well by Leibniz, who thought he should start off from identity, which is what he compelled himself to do, specifically positing first of all –

Two is one and one Three is two and one Four is three and one[4]

He believed he had solved the problem by showing that, by reducing each of these definitions to the preceding one, it could be demonstrated that 2 and 2 is 4.

Unfortunately there is a small obstacle that the logicians of the nineteenth century noticed fairly quickly, which is that his demonstration is only valid on the condition that one neglect the utterly necessary parentheses that have to be inserted in 2 = 1 + 1, namely the parentheses around 1 + 1. What he neglects is that it is necessary to posit the axiom –

$$(a + b) + c = a + (b + c)$$

This negligence on the part of a logician who was as true a logician as Leibniz surely deserves to be explained, and, in one respect, something does justify it. Be that as it may, that this condition should have been omitted is enough, from the logician's point of view, for Leibnizian generation to be rejected, besides the fact that it also neglects any foundation of what is involved in 0.

Here, I'm merely indicating to you which notion of concept has to be chosen as a base – a concept that is supposed to denote something – so that everything will hold together. But after all, it cannot be said that the concepts they chose, the moons of Mars or of Jupiter, do not have sufficient scope of denotation for it to be said that a number is matched to each of them. Nevertheless, the self-subsistence of number can only be assured on the basis of the equinumerosity of the objects that a concept subsumes.[5]

Thereafter, the order of numbers can be furnished by the trick that consists in moving in exactly the opposite direction from Leibniz's procedure, so to take 1 away from each number. The predecessor number is the concept that – aside from any object that might have served as a support in the concept of any particular number – is identical with a number that is very precisely characterized by not being identical with the number before, let's say, with the exception of 1.

This is how Frege works his way backwards to the conception of the concept as an emptiness, under which no object falls. It is the concept, not of nothingness – because it's a concept – but of inexistence. He does this precisely by considering what he believes nothingness to be, namely the concept for which the number would be equal to the 0 that he believes he can define by formulating the argument x different from x, $x \neq x$, that is to say, x different from itself.

This is certainly an extremely problematic denotation, because what do we get? If it is true that the symbolic is what I have said about it, namely that it is entirely within speech, that there is no such thing as metalanguage, then where in language can an object be designated about which one can be certain that it is not different from itself? Nevertheless, it is upon this hypothesis that Frege constitutes the notion that the concept equal to nought – in accordance with the formula that he provided at the start, of the predecessor number – yields a number that is different from what is involved in the 0 that is well and truly held to be nothingness. In other words, it yields a number that is different from the one for which what is suitable is not equality with 0, but the number 0.

Thereafter, it is in reference to this that the concept to which the number 0 is suited is – identical with 0 but not identical with 0.[6] The one that is quite simply identical with 0 is held to be its successor, and as such is equal to 1. The whole thing is founded on a point of departure known as equinumerosity. Clearly, the equinumerosity of the concept under which no object falls, in the capacity of inexistence, is always equal to itself. There is no difference between 0 and 0. It was from the angle of this no difference that Frege sought to establish the foundation of 1.

Either way, for us this conquest remains a precious one to the extent that it furnishes us with 1 on account of it essentially being – listen carefully to what I'm saying – the signifier of inexistence.

Nevertheless, is it so certain that this is able to establish the foundation of 1?

3

This discussion could certainly be pursued along purely Fregean paths. Nevertheless, I thought I should reproduce for clarity's sake what could be said to bear no relation to the integer, namely the arithmetical triangle.

The arithmetical triangle is organized as follows. It starts off, as a given, from the sequence of integers. Each term to be inscribed is constituted without further commentary by the addition – you will note that so far I have not spoken of addition, any more than Frege does – of two figures, the one that stands immediately to its left and the one that stands to its left on the level above it.

0	1	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	. . .
	0	1	1	1	1	1	1	1	. . .
		0	1	2	3	4	5	6	. . .

When we have a whole number of points that we shall call monads, you can easily confirm that this automatically gives us, for example, what is involved in the number of subsets that can, within the set that subsumes all these points, be formed of any number, chosen as lying underneath the integer at issue.

Thus, for example, if you take the line of the dyad, having encountered one dyad, what immediately obtains is that there will be two monads in the dyad.

1

2

1

It's not hard to imagine a dyad. It's a line with two terms, a beginning and an end.

Now let's take something more amusing. If you examine what is involved in the tetrad, you will obtain something that amounts to four possibilities of triads, in other words, to turn this into an image for you, the four faces of the tetrahedron. You next obtain six dyads, that is, the six edges of the tetrahedron. You also obtain the four vertex corners of a monad.

1

4

6

4

1

This is to lend support to what is to be expressed only in terms of subsets.[7] It's clear that you can see that, as the integer increases, the number of subsets that can be produced within it very quickly surpasses by far the integer itself.[8]

This is not what is of interest to us. It was simply that, in order for me to account for the series of integers by means of the same procedure, I had to start off from what lies at the origin of what Frege came up with.

Frege designated that the number of objects that fall under a concept qua concept of the number n, shall by itself be what constitutes the successor number. In other words, if you start counting from 0 – this will invariably make what is here, namely 7 – 7 what? – 7 of this something that I have termed inexistent, on account of it being the foundation of repetition.

0 1 2 3 4 5 6

For the rules of the triangle to be met, the 1 that is repeating here still needs to arise from somewhere. And, since we have flanked the triangle at each level with 0 – 0 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 . . .

there is, therefore, a point here, a point to be situated at the level of the row of zeros. This point is 1.

0 1 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 . . .

What does it articulate? It articulates the important thing to distinguish in the generation of 1, namely the distinction of no difference between each of these zeros, on the basis of the generation of what repeats, but which repeats as inexistent.

Frege does not, therefore, account for the sequence of integers, but rather for the possibility of repetition. Repetition is posited first and foremost as repetition of the 1, qua 1 of inexistence.

In the fact that there is not just a single 1, but rather 1 that repeats, and 1 that is posited in the sequence of integers, is there not – I can only ask the question, here – something that suggests that we have to uncover in this gap something that belongs to the realm of what we have examined by positing, as the necessary correlate to the question of logical necessity, the foundation of inexistence?

19 January 1972

THE OTHER: FROM SPEECH TO SEXUALITY

V

TOPOLOGY OF SPEECH

A TALK AT SAINTE-ANNE

Where does meaning come from?
Speech between semblance and jouissance Analysis started with the norm Science behind the wall . . .
. . . and discourse in front of it

During the same academic year that Lacan was delivering his Seminar in the Law Faculty on the Place du Panthéon, he was also delivering 'talks' in the chapel at Sainte-Anne Hospital. From the fourth talk on, they were devoted to clarifying and extending his elaborations in the Seminar. In the present book can be found, in their chronological position, the talks that pick up the thread of . . .
or Worse – JAM

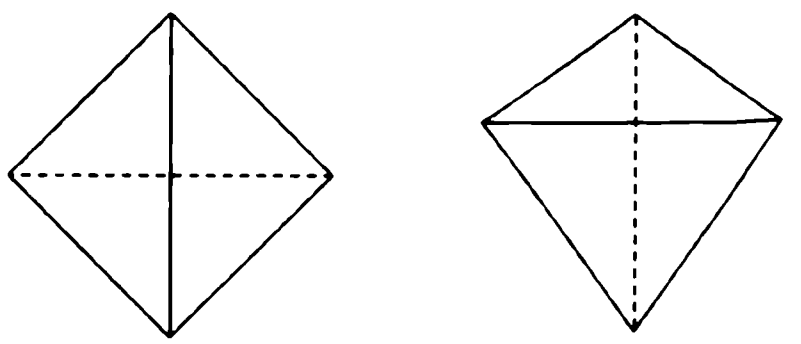
Two years ago I explained something that, once it got on the right highway, the poubellic highway, took the name quadripode. I was the one who chose the name, and you can only wonder why I gave it such a strange one. Why not quadruped or tetrapod? These would have had the advantage of not being crossbreeds. In truth, as I was writing it I asked myself the same question. I don't know why I kept it. Then I asked myself what we used to call these crossbreed terms when I was young, these half-Latin–half-Greek terms. I was sure I used to know what the purists called them but I've since forgotten.[1] Is there anyone here who knows how terms are designated when they are composed, for example, of a Latin element and a Greek element, like the word sociology, or quadripode? If anyone knows, I implore you, out with it!

Well, this is not encouraging. I started searching the day before yesterday and as I still couldn't find it I telephoned a dozen different people whom I thought most likely to be able to give me the answer. Well, too bad.

I called them quadripodes to give you the idea that one can sit on them. It was just to reassure people a little, because I was speaking through the mass media. In reality, however, when I'm on the inside, I explain that what I have isolated by way of four discourses results from the emergence of the last one to arrive, the discourse of the analyst. Indeed, the discourse of the analyst brings some order to a particular current state of thought, an order that clarifies the other discourses that emerged earlier. I have arranged them in accordance with a topology. It's one of the simplest, but it is no less a topology, in the sense that it's mathematizable. It's a topology in the most rudimentary fashion, namely in that it hinges on the grouping of no more than four points that we shall call monads.

It doesn't seem so, but it is so forcefully inscribed in the structure of our world that there is no other foundation to the fact of the space we live in. Note if you will the following, that putting four points at an equal distance from one another is the highest number with which you can do this in our space. You will never be able to put five points at an equal distance from one another.



This little shape is here to help you to sense what is at issue. The quadripodes are not tetrahedral, but tetradic. The number of vertex corners is equal to the number of surfaces, and this is linked to the same arithmetical triangle that I drew in the last lesson of my Seminar.

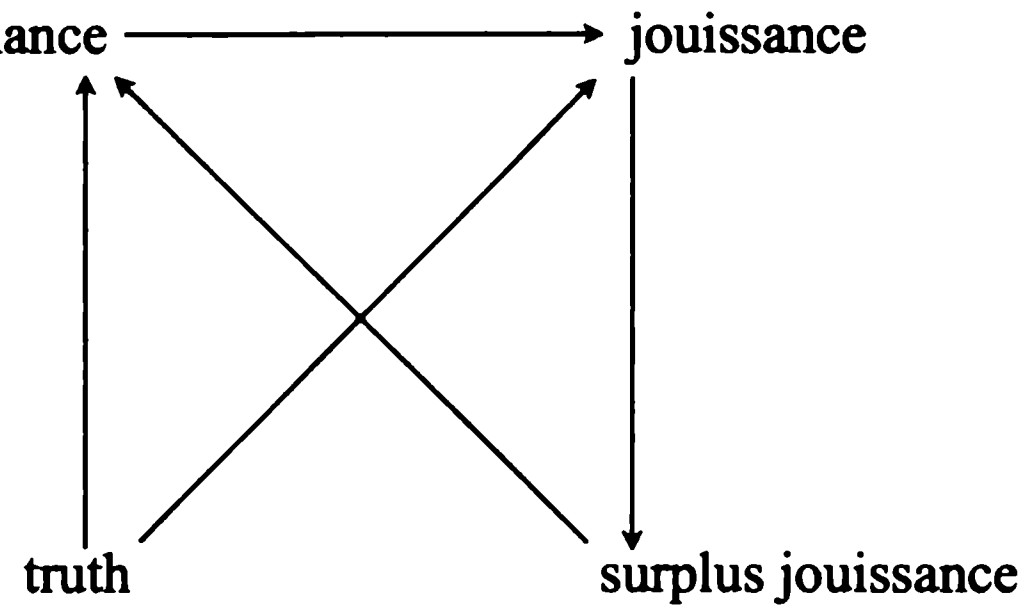
As you can see, to sit on it, whether the one on the left or the one on the right, affords no rest. You've got used to the one on the left-hand side of the board, to the point that you don't even feel it any more. The one on the right, however, isn't any the more comfortable. Imagine yourself sitting on a tetrahedron that is poised on its tip. Yet this is where we have to begin for everything that is involved in what constitutes a type of social base that is supported by what is called a discourse. This is what I specifically put forward in my antepenultimate Seminar.

The tetrahedral, to refer to it in its present appearance, possesses some curious properties. If it is not like this one, which is regular in shape – the equal distance is just to remind you of the properties of the number four with regard to space – if it is just any old how, then it will be strictly impossible for a symmetry to be defined in it.

Nevertheless, it does have the following particularity. If you take these edges – namely these short dashes that join what are known in geometry as vertices – and vectorize them, that is, give them a direction, you just have to posit as a principle that none of the vertices shall be privileged, that nowhere shall there be a convergence of three vectors at the same vertex, nor shall there be three vectors that depart from the same vertex – otherwise there would be at least two vertices that would not benefit from vectors – and you will necessarily obtain the following distribution.

2 incoming 1 outgoing
2 incoming 1 outgoing
1 incoming 2 outgoing
1 incoming 2 outgoing

This means that each of the said tetrahedrons will be strictly equivalent. In each case, by removing one of the edges you will obtain the formula with which I schematized my four discourses.



You can observe that one of the vertices has the property of divergence, but without any incoming vector to feed it. On the other hand, you've got this triangular trajectory. The number and the orientation of the vectors suffice to distinguish these four poles through a character that is altogether special. I state their terms as truth, semblance, jouissance, and surplus jouissance.

This is the fundamental topology from which any function of speech results, and it deserves to be commented on. What is the function of speech? The discourse of the analyst is formed in such a way as to make this question emerge. The function and field of speech and language – that's how I introduced what would lead us to the present point of defining a new discourse. Not that this discourse is mine, because at the time of speaking, this discourse has in fact been in place for three-quarters of a century.

That the analyst is capable, in some quarters, of rejecting what I say about this discourse is not a reason for him not to be its support. In truth, in this instance, to be the support means only to be supposed. However, that this discourse should assume meaning from the very voice of someone who is – this is my case – just as much of a subject as anyone else, is precisely what deserves to be paused over, so as to know where this meaning is drawn from.

In hearing what I've just put forward, the question of meaning might not seem to you to pose any problems. It seems that the analyst's discourse makes enough of an appeal to interpretation for the question not to arise. Effectively, going by a certain analytic scribbling, it seems that one can read – and this comes as no surprise, you're going to see why – all the meaning one wants, going right back to the most archaic. One can purportedly find an echo, the sempiternal repetition, of what has come down to us from the depths of ages under the term meaning in all the forms that, it has to be said, only become meaningful in their superposition.

Indeed, to what do we owe our comprehension of anything whatsoever in the symbolism in common use, for example in Holy Scripture? Everyone knows that comparing it with a mythology, whatever mythology it may be, is one of the most misleading types of slippage. For a while now, no one has stopped there. When one studies in a serious way what is involved in mythologies, one doesn't go to their meaning, but rather to the combinatory of mythemes. On this score, look up the works by an author whom I needn't, I think, name yet again.

The question is, therefore, as to where meaning comes from.

To introduce what is involved in the analytic discourse, I had no qualms about helping myself, because it was quite necessary, to the facilitation provided by what is called linguistics. To quell the ardour that might have been too quickly aroused in my vicinity, and which might have sent you back to the usual mire, I reminded you that this something that is worthy of the title linguistics as a science, which seems to have language and even speech as its object, was supported only on the condition that the linguists swear amongst themselves never – or never again, because this is what people had been doing for centuries – even remotely, to allude to the origin of language. This was one, among others, of the watchwords I gave to the form of introduction that was articulated in my formula the unconscious is structured like a language.

When I say that it was to avoid my audience returning to a particular miry equivocation – I'm not the one who helped myself to the term, it was Freud himself, and specifically with respect to so-called Jungian archetypes – this is certainly not in order now to lift this prohibition. On no account is it a matter of speculating about any origin of language. I said that it's a question of formulating the function of speech.

A very long time ago I asserted that the function of speech is to be the only form of action that posits itself as truth. It is an otiose question to ask oneself what speech is. Not only do I speak, do you speak, and even ça parle, it speaks, as I said, but this carries on all by itself. It's a fact, and I would even say that it lies at the origin of all facts, because whatever might be at issue only assumes the rank of a fact when it has been said.

Note that I didn't say when it has been spoken. There is something distinct between speaking and saying. A word that founds a fact is a fact of saying, but speech functions even when it doesn't found any fact. When it gives a command, when it prays, when it insults, or when it voices a wish, it doesn't found any fact.

Today, we can indulge in some fun. These are not things I would come out with at the other place, at my Seminar, where fortunately I say more serious things, as I did in the last lesson. Here, because it is implied in the seriousness that I'm always sharpening to a finer edge, we can have a bit of a laugh while still holding ourselves on this edge. I do hope there will be fewer people there the next time, because that was no laughing matter.

In an amusing register, it's not for nothing that in cartoons, speech is spelt out on banderoles. Speech is where ça bande, where hard-ons occur, role or not. It is not for nothing that this establishes the dimension of truth, because truth, the actual truth, the truth that we have only started to glimpse with the analytic discourse, is what this discourse reveals to each and every person who simply commits himself to it in an agentive manner, as an analysand. It's that bander, getting a hard-on – excuse me for using the term again, but since I've started I'm not going to abandon it – which up there, on the Place du Panthéon, I've been calling Φx, bears no relation to sex, no relation to the other in any case.

Here we're surrounded by these walls, so I will say that to get a hard-on for a woman means – because one really ought to call a spade a spade – giving her the function of Φx, which means taking her as a phallus.

The phallus is no small matter. I've already explained to you – up there, where's it's serious – that the signification of the phallus is the sole case of a fully balanced genitive. This means that the phallus is signification. This is what Jakobson was explaining to you this morning. I'm saying this for those who are a little switched-on.

The phallus is that by which language signifies. There is only one Bedeutung, and it's the phallus.

Let's begin with this hypothesis. It will explain for us to a very large extent the entirety of the function of speech. Indeed, speech is not always being applied to denoting facts. Denoting facts is all it can do – one doesn't denote things – but it does so completely by chance, once in a while. Most of the time it makes up for the fact that the phallic function is precisely what means that in mankind there are only the relations you know between the sexes – poor relations – whereas everywhere else things seem to coast along, at least to our eyes.

This is why in my little quadripode you can see, at the level of truth, two diverging vectors.

Jouissance, which is at the end of the right-hand branch, is certainly a phallic jouissance, but one which cannot be called sexual jouissance. On the left, so that any one of these odd animals who have fallen prey to speech can maintain themselves, there has to be this pole, which is correlative to the pole of jouissance inasmuch as it is an obstacle to sexual relation. It is this pole that I designate as semblance. If we dare, as is done on a daily basis, to pinpoint our partners by their sex, it is striking that man and woman alike affect a semblance, each of them in this role. The important thing, however, at least when the function of speech is at issue, is that the poles should be defined as that of semblance and that of jouissance.

Were there in mankind what we quite needlessly imagine there to be, namely a specified jouissance of sexual polarity, we would know it. Perhaps it was once known, because whole ages have boasted as much and, after all, we have numerous testimonies – though sadly they are purely esoteric – that there were times when people really believed they knew how to hold that together. A certain van Gulik, whose book struck me as excellent, prods around here and there. Of course, he does as everyone does. He goes prodding around near what is involved in the Chinese written tradition. His subject is sexual knowledge, which is not very extensive, I assure you. Nor is it very enlightened. Well, have a look at his book should this amuse you, Sexual Life in Ancient China. I defy you to get anything out of it that could serve you in what earlier I called the current state of thought.

What is of interest in what I'm pointing out does not lie in saying that things have always been the same as here at the point we've now reached. There might once have been, and perhaps there still are, places where there is a harmonious conjunction between man and woman, which would purportedly take them to seventh heaven. But, at any rate, it's curious that this is always in places where one has seriously to prove one's credentials before being allowed in. You only hear about it from the outside.

On the other hand, it's quite clear that each of us has a relation with capital Φ rather than with the other. This is plainly confirmed when one takes a look at those who are called, using a term that fits nicely thanks to the ambiguity of the Latin, or the Greek, homos. Ecce homo, as I was saying. It's quite certain that among homos there are better, firmer, and more frequent hard-ons. It's curious, but no one who has spent a certain amount of time hearing about such things can be in doubt about this fact. Still, don't be deceived. There are homos and homos. I'm not talking about André Gide. You oughtn't to believe that André Gide was a homo.

Let's not lose the thread. It's about meaning. For something to have meaning in the current state of thought, it's sad to say so, but it has to be pitched as normal. This was why André Gide wanted homosexuality to be normal. And, since you perhaps have the lowdown on this, within this meaning there are a host of different meanings. In two shakes of a lamb's tail it will fall under the cover of the normal, to such an extent that we will have new clients in psychoanalysis coming to tell us, I've come to see you because I'm not a normal pederast.[2] It's going to produce a traffic jam.

Analysis got off to a start with this. Had the notion of normal not taken on such an extension following certain vagaries of history, analysis would never have seen the light of day. It's very clear when you read Freud that a precondition to enter analysis, the minimum, to begin with was to have a good university education. This is the case for all patients, not only those whom Freud took on, but Freud says so in clear language. I have to underscore this, because the university discourse, which I have spoken badly of, and for the best reasons, is nevertheless what irrigates the analytic discourse.

You understand that you can no longer imagine, and I'm saying this to make you imagine something – if you are capable, who knows? – in being pulled along by my voice, a stretch of time that is called, because of this, Antiquity, when there was δοχα that was not academic. You know the famous δοχα that is spoken about in the Meno. Mais non, mais non! Nowadays, there is no δοχα, however futile, shaky, bumbling, or even daft it may be, that does not feature somewhere in university teaching. There is no example of an opinion, however stupid it may be, that has not been detected and, indeed, on the occasion of being detected, taught.

This falsifies everything, because when Plato speaks of δοχα as something that he literally doesn't know what to make of – even though he is a philosopher who is striving to found a science – he notices that there are true forms of this δοχα that he meets on every street corner. Naturally, he didn't bother saying why, no more than any other philosopher, but no one doubts that they are true, because truth is something that imposes itself. The fact that δοχα had not been normalized provided a completely different context from what is called philosophy. There is no trace of the word norm anywhere in antique discourse. We invented that, and naturally we did so by hunting out a Greek noun that was hardly ever used.

One nevertheless has to start from there in order to see that the discourse of the analyst did not appear by chance. Things needed to have reached the highest state of extreme urgency for it to emerge.

Of course, because it's a discourse of the analyst, as with each of the four discourses that I have named, this takes on the sense of the objective genitive. The discourse of the master is discourse about the master. This was clearly seen at the peak of the philosophical epic in Hegel. It's the same thing with the discourse of the analyst. One is speaking about the analyst. He is the object a, as I have often stressed. Naturally, this doesn't make it easy for him to grasp what his position is, but from another angle it's a restful position because it's the position of semblance.

So, our Gide, to continue weaving – I take up this Gide, then let go again, then we take up this Gide together, and so on – our Gide is nevertheless exemplary here. He doesn't get us out of our little concern, far from it. His concern is to be desired, which is something we commonly find in our analytic probing. There are people who, in their early childhood, missed out on being desired. It drives them to do things so that it will come about late in life. This is even very widespread.

However, we need to divide things up carefully. It's not at all unrelated to discourse. These are not the kind of words that pop up left, right and centre at carnival time. Here, discourse and desire bear the closest relation. This is even why I have managed to isolate – at least, I think so – the function of the object a. This is a key point that, I must say, hasn't been taken advantage of to any great extent. It will happen, slowly and surely.

The object a is that by which the speaking being is determined when he is taken up in a discourse. He doesn't know at all what determines him. It's the object a. How is he determined? He is determined as a subject, that is, he is divided as a subject. He falls prey to desire. This sounds like it occurs at the same site as those words that subvert, but it's not at all the same. It's quite regular. It has to be said that it's a product. It produces, mathematically, the object a as cause of desire.

The object a is also the one that I called, as you know, the metonymic object, which courses throughout what unfurls as discourse, discourse that is more or less coherent, until it stumbles and peters out. It is still the case that we get our idea of the cause from this. We believe that everything in nature has to have a cause, on the pretext that we have been caused by our own blather.[3]

In André Gide, all the features are there to indicate that things are as I've told you. First of all, there is his relationship with the supreme Other. On no account should one believe, despite what he said, that the big Other had no impact. Where the a takes shape, Gide even had an exceedingly specific notion, namely that the big Other's pleasure was to disturb the pleasure of all the little ones. In view of which, he twigged very well that there was a point of bother there, which clearly saved him from his childhood neglect. All his teasing with God was something deeply compensatory for someone who had got off to such a poor start. This is not a special privilege of Gide's.

Some time ago I started a Seminar on the Name-of-the-Father. I gave just one lesson. Naturally, I began with the Father. I spoke for an hour and a half about God's jouissance. If I said that it was mystical banter, it was so as never to speak about it again. It is certain that, since the time that there has only been a single God, the one and only, the God that ushered in a certain historical era, He has been precisely the one who disrupts the pleasure of others. It is even this alone that counts.

There were the Epicureans, who did all they could to teach the method whereby each individual can avoid being disrupted in his pleasure, but it failed. There were others, called Stoics, who said, But on the contrary, one should dive head first into divine pleasure. This, however, also falls flat. You know it can only be played out between the two of them. What counts is the bother. With that, you are each in your natural environment. You don't get any jouissance, of course. It would be an exaggeration to say this, all the more so given that, either way, it's too dangerous. But still, it can't be said that you don't take any pleasure. It is even upon this that the primary process is grounded.

All of this puts us in a tight spot. What exactly is meaning? Well, we would be better off starting again at the level of desire.

The pleasure that the other gives you – this is commonplace – is even called, in a nobler region, art. This is where the wall should be attentively considered, because there is a region of meaning here that is thoroughly enlightened. It was thoroughly enlightened, for example, by the man known as Leonardo da Vinci, who as you know left behind a few manuscripts and some little knickknacks – not a great deal, he didn't fill up the museums – but he uttered some profound truths that everyone ought to remember. He said, as have I, Look at the wall. Since then, he has become the Leonardo of families. They make gifts of his manuscripts. There is a luxury edition and, can you imagine, I've even been given a couple of these myself. This doesn't mean, however, that it's illegible. So, he explains to you – Look carefully at the wall.

This wall here is rather unclean. Were it better kempt, there might be damp stains and perhaps even mould. Well, going by Leonardo, when there is a mildew stain, it's invariably a fine opportunity to transform it into a Madonna or some muscular athlete. It lends itself to it far better because in mildew there are always shadows and hollows. It's very important to note that there is a class of things on walls that lends itself to the figure, to the creation of art, as they say. The stain in question is figuration itself.

All the same, we need to find out about the relation between this and something else that can occur on a wall, namely gullies. These are not only gullies of speech – though this can happen, indeed this is always how things get going – but gullies of discourse. In other words, we need to find out whether it belongs to this same order of mould on the wall, or to writing. This should be of interest to a few people here who, I think, not so long ago – it's getting on a bit now – used to be very taken with writing love letters on walls. It was a damned good time. Some of them never got over this time when one used to be able to write on walls and when, from this stuff in Publicis, one could surmise that the walls had the power of speech, as though such a thing could happen.

I would simply like to remark that it would be better were nothing ever to be written on walls. What has already been written on them should even be removed. Liberté, égalité, fraternité, for instance, it's indecent. No smoking, it's not possible, especially given how everybody smokes. There's a tactical error here. I've already said this concerning the lettre d'amur.[4] Everything that is written reinforces the wall. This is not necessarily an objection, but what is certain is that it oughtn't to be believed that this is absolutely necessary. It's useful none the less because, had no one ever written on a wall, whichever wall it might be, this one or another, it's a fact that no one would have taken a step into the meaning of what might be there to be beheld beyond the wall.

You see, there is something here of what I will be led to speak to you about a little this year, namely the relationships between logic and mathematics. To tell you straightaway, beyond the wall there is only, to the best of our knowledge, the real that is signalled precisely by the impossible, the impossibility of reaching it beyond the wall. It no less remains that this is the real.

How did we manage to form some idea of it? Language certainly served in part. This is even why I'm trying to build this little bridge that you have been able to see taking shape in the latest lessons of my Seminar. How does the One make an entrance? This is what I have already been expressing for three years now with symbols, with S_1 and S_2. So that you might understand something from them, I designated the first as the master-signifier and the second as knowledge.

Would there be S_1, however, were there no S_2? This is a problem, because they need first of all to be twain in order for there to be S_1. I broached this in the latest lesson of my Seminar by showing you that, either way, they are at least twain, so that one alone may emerge. Nought and one, as they say, makes two. But this is in the sense that is said to be insurmountable. Nevertheless, you can surmount it when you are a logician, as I have already indicated for you in reference to Frege. I hope, however, that it appeared to you none the less that it was surmounted with a jaunty step. There and then – I will be coming back to this – I indicated that there was perhaps more than a short stride. This is not the important thing.

Someone whose name a few of you doubtless heard for the first time this morning, René Thom, who is a mathematician, doesn't think that logic – that is, the discourse that stays on the wall – is something that suffices even to account for number, the first step of mathematics. On the other hand, it does seem to him that he is able to account not only for what is traced out on the wall – this is nothing less than life itself, which as you know begins with mould – but also, through number, algebra, functions and topology, for what occurs in the field of life. I will be coming back to this. I'm going to explain to you that the fact that he finds in a mathematical function the very line of these curves formed by primal mould, before moving on up to mankind, pushes him to the extrapolation of thinking that topology can furnish a typology of natural languages. I don't know whether it's possible to settle the question at present. I'm going to try to give you an idea of where its current repercussion lies, no more than that.

In any case, what I can speak about is the cleaving performed by the wall. There is something in place in front of it, which I have called speech and language, and then there is another side that this works upon, perhaps mathematically. It's quite certain that we cannot form any other idea of it. There can be no doubting that science hinges not on quantity, as some have been saying, but on number, function, and topology. A discourse that is called science has found the means to construct itself behind the wall.

Only, what I do believe I can formulate clearly, and in this respect I believe I am in agreement with everything that is most serious in scientific construction, is that it is strictly impossible to endue with the faintest shadow of meaning anything whatsoever that is articulated in algebraic or topological terms. There is meaning for those who, standing before the wall, take pleasure in mildew stains that are so readily transformed into Madonnas or athletes' backs. It is evident, however, that we cannot content ourselves with these confusional meanings. At the end of the day, this serves only to reverberate on the lyre of desire, on eroticism, to call a spade a spade.

In front of the wall, however, other things happen, and this is what I call discourses. There have been others besides the four of mine that I have listed, and which, moreover, are specified only by making you note straightaway that they are no more than four. It is quite sure that there have been others, nothing of which we are still familiar with nowadays, besides what converges in the four that remain. These four that remain are articulated in the ring of a, S_1, S_2, and indeed the subject – who is left to pick up the pieces. These four terms, in moving around in this ring to each of the four vertex corners, as follows, have allowed us to isolate something by which to take our bearings. This is something that gives us the current state of what is grounded, by way of a social bond, as discourse. In discourse, whichever place one occupies – the place of the master, of the slave, of the product, or of what sustains the whole affair – one doesn't get it in the slightest.

Where does meaning arise? It is in this respect that it's very important to have made the division, which is doubtless a heavy-handed division, that Saussure made between signifier and signified, as Jakobson was reminding us this morning. Moreover, this was something Saussure inherited from the Stoics, whose very peculiar position in these sorts of manipulations I told you about earlier. What is important, of course, is not that signifier and signified unite, or that the signified would allow us to distinguish what is specific in the signifier. On the contrary, what is important is that the signified of a signifier – which I articulate in the little letters I told you about earlier – to which one attaches something that may resemble meaning, always comes from the place that the same signifier occupies in another discourse.

This was precisely what went to their heads, all of them, when the analytic discourse was introduced. It seemed to them that they understood everything, the poor souls. Fortunately, through the care I've taken, this is not your case. Were you to understand what I say elsewhere, the place where I'm serious, you wouldn't believe your ears. This is even why, in general, you don't believe your ears. It's because, in reality, you do understand it, but in the end you keep your distance. And this is understandable because, for most of you, the analytic discourse hasn't caught hold of you yet. This will happen, unfortunately, because it's becoming increasingly important.

I would nevertheless like to say something about the analyst's knowledge, on the condition that you don't stay at this level.

My friend René Thom manages with great ease to find, by means of cuts in complicated mathematical surfaces, something like a drawing, a crest line, ultimately something that he also calls a spike, a flake, a cusp, a fold, and to turn it to truly captivating use. In other terms, a slice is made through a thing that only exists because one can write There exists an x that would satisfy the function f(x). However, while Thom performs this with such ease, it is still the case that so long as this has not accounted exhaustively for the very thing with which, in spite of it all, he is forced to explain this, namely common language and the grammar around it, there will remain a zone here, which I call the zone of discourse. It is upon this zone that the analytic discourse sheds a clear light of day.

What of this can be transmitted by way of knowledge? Well, you have to choose! It is the numbers that know. They know because they have managed to stir this organized matter at a point, an immemorial point, of course. They still know what they do. There is something quite certain here, which is that meaning is only put into this most improperly. The same goes for any idea of evolution or perfection process. In the supposed animal chain we can see absolutely nothing that attests to this so-called continual adaptation, to the point that at the end of the day they had to give up on it and say that, after all, those that made it through are those that were able to make it through. They call it natural selection. Strictly speaking, this doesn't mean anything. It has a little meaning that has been borrowed from the talk of a crook. Why not this one or some other?

The clearest thing that appears to us is that a living being does not always know very well what to do with one of its organs. After all, this is perhaps a particular case of the analytic discourse evincing the cumbrous aspect of the phallus. We are unable to say any more than the following – there is a correlation between this and what is stirred up by way of speech.

At the point we've reached in the current state of thought . . . This is the sixth time I've employed this wording and it doesn't look like it's bothering anyone. Yet this really is something worth returning to, because I'm turning this current state of thought into a permanent fixture. It's true, though. Saying that thoughts are just as strictly determined as the latest gimmick is no idealism.

In any case, in the current state of thought, we have the analytic discourse which, when one cares to hear it for what it is, shows that it is linked to a curious adaptation, because in the end, if this business of castration is true, it means that, in man, castration is the means of adapting to survive. It's unthinkable, but it's true. All this is perhaps merely an artifice, an artefact, of discourse. That this discourse, which rounds out the others so knowingly, should be sustaining itself is perhaps just a historical phase. The sexual life of ancient China may perhaps flourish again. It will have a certain number of scruffy ruins to dispatch before that happens.

For the time being, however, what does the meaning we bring tell us? When all is said and done, this meaning is an enigmatic riddle, and it's an enigmatic riddle precisely because it is meaning.

Somewhere, in the second edition of a book that I allowed to come out, and which is called Écrits, there is a short addendum called The metaphor of the subject. I played at length on the expression that my dear friend Perelman repeated with relish, an ocean of false learning. You can never be sure what's in the back of my mind when I'm amusing myself, and I recommend you start off from there. An ocean of false learning could well be the analyst's knowledge. Why not? Why not, because it's only from the analyst's perspective that the following is clarified – that learning has no meaning, and that any meaning of discourse is merely partial, sustained as it is by another discourse.

If truth can only ever come midsay – this is the kernel, the essential part, of the analyst's knowledge – then, in what I have called a tetrapod or a quadruped, S_2 stands in the place of truth. This knowledge is a knowledge that is, therefore, always to be called into question.

On the other hand, there is one thing that is to be claimed of analysis, which is that there is a knowledge that is drawn out of the subject himself. At the place of the pole of jouissance, the analytic discourse positions the barred S. This knowledge is the result of the stumbling, the bungled action, the dreams, and the work of the analysand. As far as this knowledge is concerned, it is not supposed, it is a deciduous knowledge – scrap of knowledge upon scrap of knowledge.

This is what the unconscious is. I take this knowledge on board and I define it as only being able to be posited – a newly emerging term – on the basis of the subject's jouissance.

3 February 1972

VI

I ASK YOU TO REFUSE ME MY OFFERING

. . . because: this isn't it Linguistic analysis
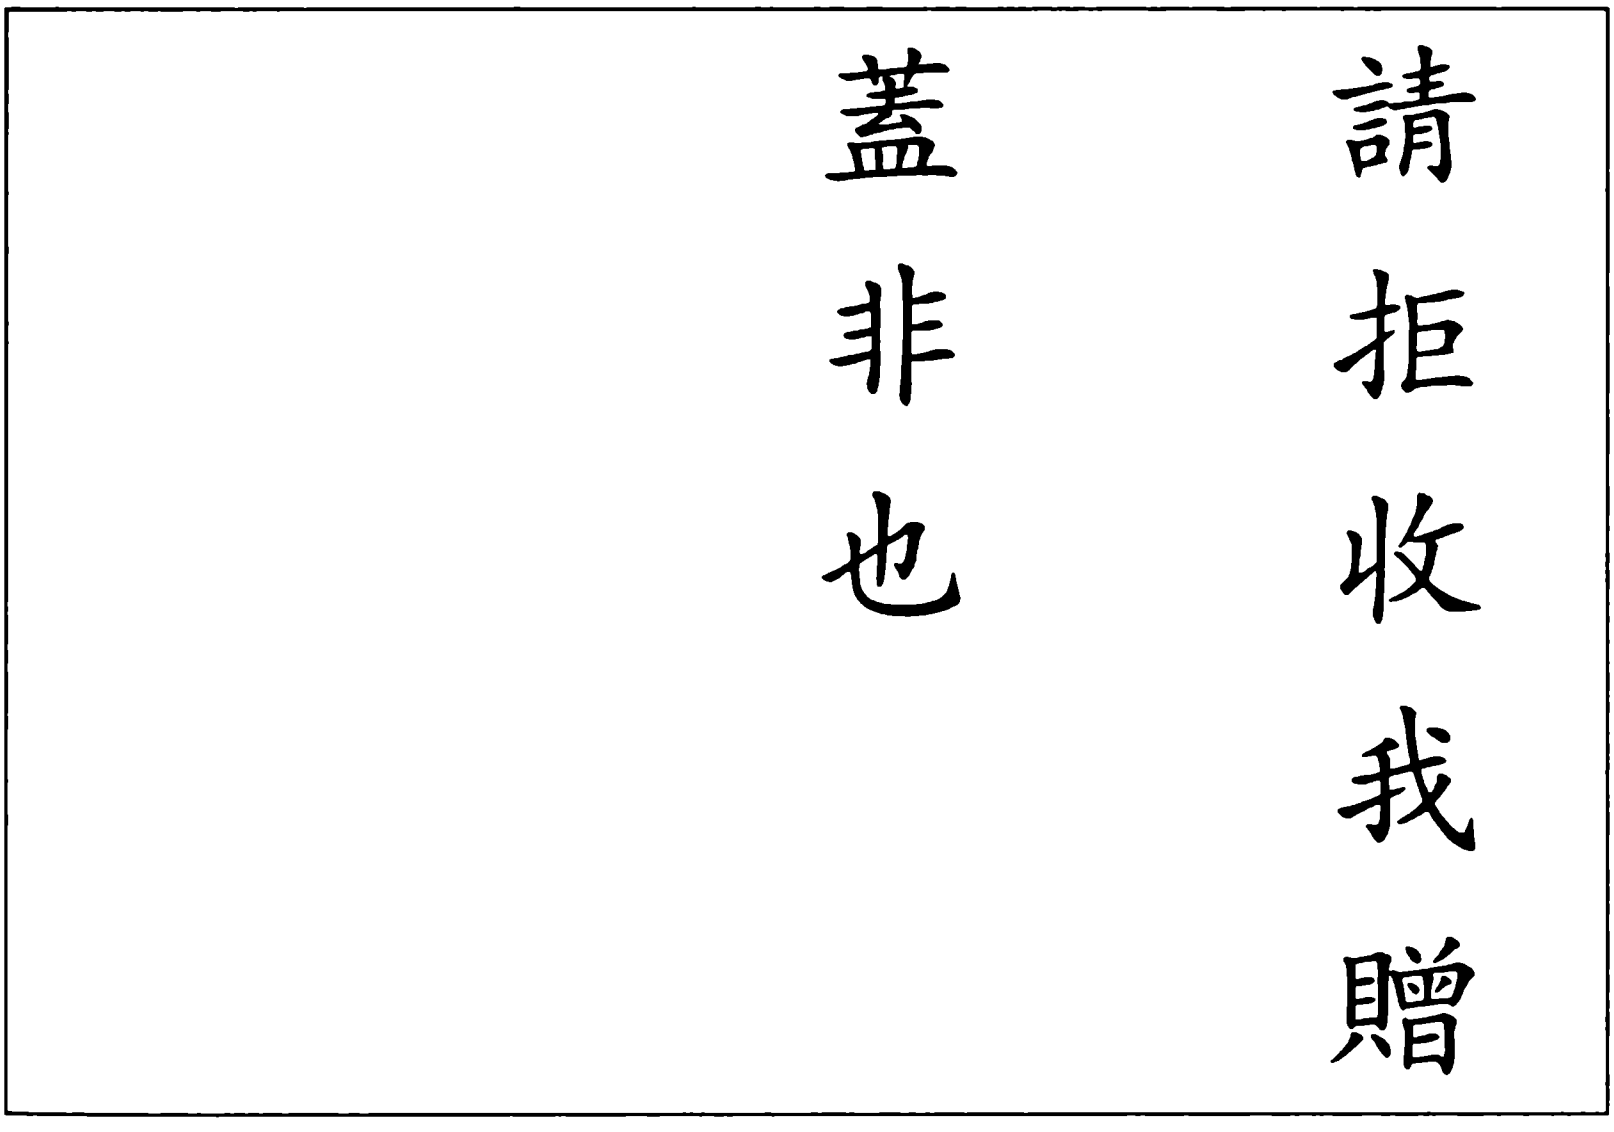
Schematizing speech
Grammar and signification
The Borromean rings



On the blackboard[1]

You're fond of conférences.[2] This is why, by means of a short note that I delivered to him at about a quarter past ten, I asked my friend Roman Jakobson to give you the conférence he didn't give yesterday. I was hoping he would be present today. After announcing it – I mean, after writing on the blackboard something equivalent to what I've just written here – he thought he should stick to what he called generalities, doubtless reckoning that this is what you would rather hear, that is to say, a conférence. Unfortunately – he telephoned me early this morning – he is tied up in a lunch appointment with some linguists, so you won't get the conférence.

I don't give conférences. As I have already said elsewhere in all seriousness, I amuse myself, whether in serious amusements or pleasant amusements. Elsewhere, specifically at Sainte-Anne, I tried my hand at some pleasant amusements. This speaks for itself. And while I said, over at Sainte-Anne, that this was also perhaps an amusement, here I say that I stick to the serious. But, even so, this is still an amusement.

Instead of relating it, at Sainte-Anne, to pleasant amusement, I related it to what I called la lettre d'amur.

1

La lettre d'amur? Well, here's a typical one – I ask you to refuse me my offering. There's a stop here, because I hope that for it to be understood there's no need to add anything. It's very precisely this, la lettre d'amur, the true one – to refuse my offering.

It can be finished off, for those who by chance might never have understood what la lettre d'amur is – to refuse my offering because this isn't it.

You see, I've slipped in – because my goodness, I'm speaking to you, to you who are fond of conférences – ça n'est pas ça. I've added the n'. When the ne is added, it doesn't need to be expletive to mean something, namely the true and rightful presence of the enunciator. The enunciation would be full precisely because the enunciator wouldn't be there. It should be written – parce que, colon, c'est pas ça.

I said that here the amusement is serious. What might that mean? I looked up the ways of saying serious in different languages. For my conception of it, I couldn't find any better than our way, which lends itself to a play on words. I don't speak the others well enough to work out what their equivalent would be, but in ours, sérieux, as I understand it, is sériel.

As a certain number of you already know, I hope, without me having to tell you, the principle behind the serial is the sequence of integers that no one has found any other way of defining but to say that a property is transferable from n to $n + 1$, which can only be the same property that transfers from 0 to 1. They also refer to this as reasoning by recurrence or mathematical induction.

Only, there you go, this is precisely the problem I tried to broach in my latest amusements – what exactly is it that could transfer from 0 to 1? It's a tall order. Yet this is the goal I set myself, for this year, to secure . . . or worse.

I won't be moving into the interval of what transfers from 0 to 1 today, which at first blush is bottomless. What is quite sure, however, is that, taking them one by one, you have to be clear in your mind about what you're doing, because whatever effort people might have made to logicize the sequence of integers, they didn't find any better than to designate the property that is common to all of them – and it's the only such property – as the property of what transfers from 0 to 1.

In the meantime, you were advised – well, those from my School were advised – not to miss the clarification that Roman Jakobson could bring you regarding what is involved in language analysis. This will be extremely useful for where I'm going to steer the question now. However, just because I took this as my starting point to get to my present amusements, it doesn't mean I should be bound to it.

What struck me, among other items, in what Roman Jakobson put before you was something that concerns the historical point that finding language on the agenda is not a recent occurrence. Indeed, he spoke to you about a certain Boetius de Dacia, who was very important, as Jakobson stressed, because he articulated suppositiones. I think that at least for some of you this will echo what I have long been saying about the subject, the subject that is radically supposed by the signifier. Then he told you that this Boetius, Dacia as he was called, which means Dane – he's not the same Boëthius whom you are familiar with, the one who is in the Bouillet dictionary, the one who extracted images of the past[3] – Boetius de Dacia took off, just like that, over a little question of deviation. In fact, he was accused of Averroism, and though it can't be said that it was unpardonable in those days, it might not be pardoned when the person concerned had caught people's attention with something that sounded a bit solid, like speaking about suppositiones, for example. It would not be altogether accurate to say that the two things are unrelated, and this is what I find striking.

What I find striking is that, for centuries, one had to be careful when one was dealing with language. There is a letter that only appears on the absolute margins in phonetic composition, the letter aitch, pronounced hache in French. Don't touch the hache![4] For centuries, this was wise when dealing with language, because it turns out that when one dealt with language in public, it used to produce an effect that was different from amusement.

One of the questions that it wouldn't be a bad idea for us to have a quick look at, right at the end – although I've indicated where it is that I amuse myself in a pleasant way, in the shape of this famous wall – is the question as to why nowadays linguistic analysis is part of scientific research. What might that mean, exactly? You don't have to look far. The definition of scientific research – here, I'm letting myself get swept along a bit – is very precisely the following. Research is the right word in that it's not a matter of finding, in any case, it's not about finding anything that would upset the public I was speaking about just now.

I recently received from a distant shore – I don't want to cause anyone any bother, so I won't say where – a question to do with scientific research. It came from a committee for scientific research on weapons. Word for word. Someone who is no stranger to me – this was why I was being consulted about him – intended to carry out a research project on fear. For this he was to receive financing that, converted into French francs, would amount to slightly more than a cool million in old francs, which would allow him – it was written in the text, which I can't give you, but I have a copy – to spend three days in Paris, twenty-eight days in Antibes, nineteen days in Douarnenez, and a fortnight in San Montano. Antonella, are you in the audience? San Montano must have a rather nice beach, I suppose? You don't know. Well, maybe it's close to Florence. Anyway, we don't know. He would then spend another three days in Paris.

Thanks to one of my pupils, I was able to sum up my appraisal [in English] in the following terms – I am bowled over with admiration. Then, I put a big cross over all the details of the appraisal I was being asked for, regarding the scientific quality of the programme, its social and practical impact, the competence of the person concerned, and all the rest. This story is only of limited interest, but it does offer some comment on what I was indicating. It doesn't get to the bottom of scientific research, but none the less it does denote something, and this is perhaps the sole interest of the affair.

Naturally, you don't know what [the English word] bowl means. Nor did I. It refers to the bowling ball. Therefore, I'm like a full set of skittles when a well-bowled ball has knocked them all over. Well, you'll believe me if you will, not knowing the expression bowled over, what I said on the phone when they called was I'm blowed over. I was trying to say Je suis soufflé. Naturally, it was completely wrong. Blow, which does indeed mean souffler, would become blown, not blowed. So, if I said blowed, was it because, without knowing, I did indeed know that it was bowled over?

Here, we're moving into the slip of the tongue, that is, into serious matters. At the same time, however, this is all it takes to indicate that, as Plato glimpsed in the Cratylus, it's not altogether sure that the signifier is arbitrary. After all, it's not for nothing that bowl and blow are so close, because this is precisely how I only missed bowl by a hair's breadth. I don't know how you would qualify this amusement, but I find it serious.

In view of which, we come back to linguistic analysis, which, certainly, in the name of research, you're going to be hearing about more and more.

It's hard to wend one's way through this where the division is worthwhile. You learn things, for instance that there are parts of discourse. I've kept away from this like the plague. I mean, I've avoided dwelling on it, so as not to bog you down.

In the end, however, since research will certainly make itself heard here just as it does elsewhere, I'm going to start with verbs.

2

You are told that verbs express all sorts of things, and that it's hard to disentangle an action from its opposite. Intransitive verbs obviously create an obstacle here, and they become very hard to classify.

To stick to what has been most accentuated in this definition, you are told, as far as typical verbs are concerned, about a binary relationship, where it has to be said that the same sense of the verb cannot be classified in the same way in every language.

There are languages in which one says the man beats the dog. There are languages in which one says there is beating of the dog by the man. This is not the essential thing, because the relationship is still binary.

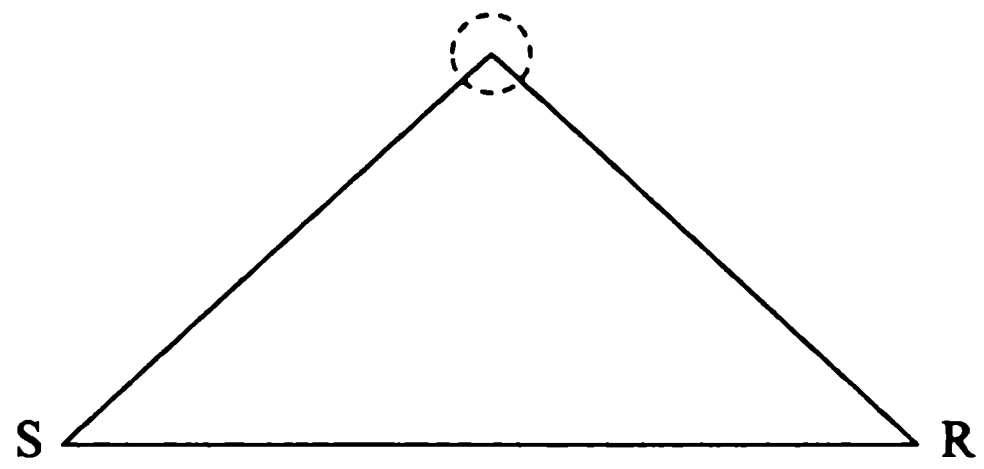
There are languages in which one says the man loves the dog. Is it still binary when one expresses oneself as follows in a language – the man loves to the dog – not to say that he likes, in the same way that he likes some trinket, but that he has love for his dog? There are differences here.

To love to someone, has always delighted me. I mean that I regret that we speak a language in which we say I love a woman, in the same way as saying, I beat her. To love to a woman seems more appropriate to me. This is so even to the extent that one day I noticed – since we're in the parapraxis, let's continue – that I was writing tu ne sauras jamais combien je t'ai aimé. I didn't put an e on the end, which is a slip, a spelling mistake if you like, incontestably.[5] On reflection, I told myself I'd written it like that because I must have felt I love to you. Well, this is a personal matter.

Be that as it may, one distinguishes with care between these first verbs and those that are defined by a ternary relationship. I give you something. This can range from a punch on the nose to a trinket, but in the end there are three terms. You've been able to note that I have always used I . . . you as an element of the relationship. This already pulls you in the direction that is precisely the one in which I'm steering you, because, as you can see, it is a piece of I ask you to refuse me my offering. This doesn't go without saying, because one can say the man gives the dog a little pat on the brow.

This distinction between the ternary relation and the binary relation is utterly essential. When the function of speech is schematized, you are told that there is S and R for Sender and Receiver.[6] To this is added the relationship that, in the commonly used scheme, is identified with the message, and it is stressed that for it to work out the Receiver has to be in possession of the code. If he doesn't have it, he will have to get it, and he will have to decode it.

Is this a satisfactory way of writing it out? The relationship that passes through speech, if indeed there is such a relationship – you know that such a thing may be called into question – implies that the ternary function should be inscribed, namely that the message should be distinguished, here –



The triangle of the message

Therefore, there is a sender, a receiver, and a message. I claim, however, that it is no less the case that what is stated in a verb is distinct from this. The fact that what is at issue is a Demand deserves to be singled out, in order to group the three elements together.[7] It is precisely in this respect that this is evident only when I employ I and you, or you and me. This I and this you, this you and this me, are precisely specified by the utterance of speech. There can be no ambiguity whatsoever here.

In other words, there is not only what is called, vaguely, code, as though it were only present at one point. Grammar forms part of the code, namely this tetradic structure that I have just marked out as essential to what is said. When you trace out your objective scheme of communication – sender, message and, at the other end, the receiver – it is less complete than grammar, which forms part of the code. It is in this respect that it was important for Jakobson to voice this generality for you – that grammar also forms part of signification, and that it is not for nothing that it is employed in poetry.

This is essential when it comes to specifying the status of the verb, because soon enough the substantives will be sifted out for you in accordance with their respective weights. There are, so to speak, heavy substantives that are called concrete, as though there could be some other kind of substantive besides substitutes. But in the end, there has to be substance. I, meanwhile, think it is more pressing to indicate first of all that we are dealing only with subjects. Let's set these items aside for the time being.

You will recognize the scope of what I have been putting forward when you consider a criticism that curiously has only reached us after reflection, from the attempt to logicize mathematics. The criticism is that, in taking a proposition as a propositional function, we will have to note down the function of the verb, and not the function of what is done with it, namely the predicative function.

For the function of the verb, let's take the verb to ask. I ask you, F, and, opening the parentheses, I and you are x and y. Thus we have –

$$\mathrm{F}(x, y$$

What do I ask you? To refuse. Another verb. This means that, in the stead of what here could be the little pat on the dog's head, that is, z, you have for example f and, again, x, y – $$\mathrm{F}(x, y, \mathrm{f}(x, y$$

Are you compelled to end here, that is, to put z? On no account is this necessary, because you can perfectly well have a ϕ. Let's not put Φ because it will only lead to confusion later. So, I'm putting a lower-case ϕ, and again x, y, for my offering to you. In view of which, we have to close three parentheses –

$$\mathrm{F}(x, y, \mathrm{f}(x, y, \phi(x, y)))$$

What I'm steering you towards is this – it's a matter of seeing, not how meaning arises, but how the object arises from a knot of meaning. I named this object, as best I could, the object a.

3

I know that reading Wittgenstein is very captivating.

Throughout his whole life, with admirable asceticism, Wittgenstein stated the following, which I'm condensing – whereof one cannot speak, thereof one must be silent. In view of which he would hardly say anything at all. From one instant to the next, he would come off the footpath and into the stream, that is, he would then get back up on the footpath, the footpath defined by this exigency.

My friend Kojève expressly formulated the same rule. Goodness knows he didn't follow it. However, just because he formulated it, this doesn't mean that I should think myself obliged to stay at the level of the living demonstration that Wittgenstein gave thereof.

It seems to me that whereof one cannot speak is very precisely what is at issue when I designate as this isn't it that which alone prompts a request such as to refuse my offering. And yet, if there is one thing that should be palpable for everyone, then it's the this isn't it. This is where we are, at each instant of our existence. So, let's try to see what it means.

We could leave the this isn't it in its place, in its dominant place, in view of which we would clearly never see the end of it. Instead of cutting it off, however, let's try to insert it into the statement itself. This isn't it – isn't what, exactly? Let's put, in the simplest way possible, the I here, the you here, and I ask you, capital D for Demand, here, to refuse me, capital R, my offering, capital S for Supply, and then there is this that is lost – lower-case i.

This isn't it inserted in the statement

However, if my offering isn't this, if I'm asking you to refuse it because this isn't it, then what you refuse is not my offering, so I needn't ask this of you. So, this is truncated at R. In view of which, if I needn't ask you to refuse it, why do I even ask you? Thus, this truncates at D.

To take this up in a more accurate diagram, the I and the you are here, the Demand here, the Refusing here, and the Supply here. This is, namely, a first tetrad, here – I ask you to refuse.

This is a second, here – refuse my offering to you.

Perhaps we can see, which will not astonish us, in the distance that lies between the distinct poles of Demand and Supply, between the poles of asking and offering, that maybe here lies the this isn't it.

Diagram of the double tetrad

However, as I've just explained, if we are to say that this is the space that lies – that can lie – between what I have to ask you and my offering to you, it is equally impossible to sustain the relation between asking and refusing, and between refusing and offering.

Do I need to give a detailed commentary? This might be useful, after all.

First, you might be wondering why I'm giving you a spatial diagram of all this. It's not about space. Space is at issue to the extent that we project our objective schemes into it. But this already indicates enough about it, namely that our objective schemes perhaps govern something of our notion of space even prior to it being governed by our perceptions.

I know full well that we are inclined to believe that our perceptions provide us with the three dimensions. A certain Poincaré, who is not unfamiliar to you, made a very nice attempt to demonstrate as much. Nevertheless, this reminder about the precondition of our objective schemes will perhaps be useful when it comes to appreciating more fully the scope of his demonstration.

What I want to insist on is not merely the turn from this isn't what I'm offering you to this isn't what you can refuse, nor even to this isn't what I'm asking you. Rather, it's that my offering is perhaps not at all what I'm offering you, but rather the fact of my offering. It is on this basis that we get things wrong.

Indeed, what does my offering mean? It's enough to reflect on it to realize that it doesn't mean at all that I'm giving. Nor does it mean that you're taking, which would endow the refusing with a meaning. When I offer something, it's in the hope that you will reciprocate. This is precisely why the potlatch exists.

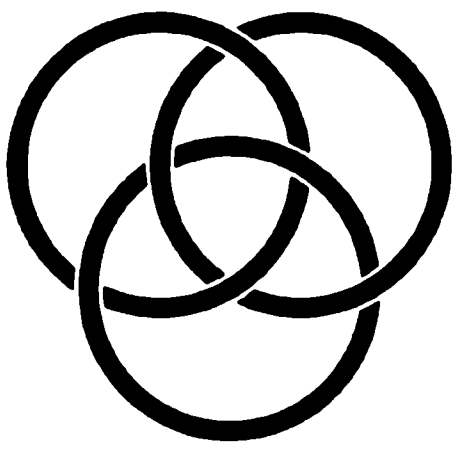
The potlatch is what drowns out, what outstrips, the impossible aspect of offering, the impossibility of it being a gift. And this is precisely why the potlatch has become completely foreign to us in our discourse. This is what makes it unsurprising that, in our nostalgia, we turn it into something that supports the impossible, namely the real – but the real as impossible.

If the this isn't it doesn't lie in the whereof of my offering either, let's observe what results from examining the fact of offering as such. It's not what I'm offering, but rather the fact of offering, as a gerund.[8] Remove supply and we see that demand and refusal lose all meaning, because what can it mean to ask to refuse?

A little exercise will be sufficient for you to notice that it is strictly the same if you withdraw any of the other verbs from the knot of I ask you to refuse me my offering. If you withdraw the refusal, what could the supply of a demand mean? As I told you, the nature of supply is that, if you withdraw demand, then refusing no longer has any signification. This is precisely why the question that arises for us is not about what is involved in the this isn't it – which plays out across each of these verbal levels – but to realize that it is by untying each of these verbs from its knot with the two others that we can uncover what is involved in this meaning-effect, in so far as I have called it the object a.

Now here's a strange thing. While I was wondering yesterday evening how I might present this to you today with my geometry of the tetrad, it so happened that, dining with a charming person who attends the courses of Monsieur Guilbaud, I was given, like a ring slid on my finger, something that I should like to show you now. It would seem to be nothing less – this I learnt yesterday evening – than the family crest of the House of Borromeo.

You need to take a bit of care over this, and this is why I'm doing just that. There you go. I haven't made any mistakes.



The Borromean rings

You can remake it with pieces of string. If you copy it down carefully, you will realize that – pay close attention – by removing this one, the third one, the other two are separated. This one passes over at this point here on the left, and again over the same ring here. They only hold together because of the third one. If you're lacking in imagination, you have to try it with three short lengths of string. You will see that they hold together.

You only have to cut one for the two others to come free, even though they might seem to be knotted together in the same way as those with which you are well acquainted, namely the rings of the Olympic Games, but the latter still hold together when one of them clears off. Well, there's no more of that with these Borromean rings! This is something that is nevertheless of great interest, because it shouldn't be forgotten that when I spoke about the signifying chain, I always implied this concatenation.

People don't seem to have realized that binary verbs have a special status that is very closely related to the object a. If, instead of taking the man and the dog as an example – these two poor animals – we had taken I and you, we would have noticed that what is most typical of a binary verb is, for example, I bore you shitless, or I look at you, or I speak to you, or I gobble you up.[9] These are the four guises, which only hold interest in their grammatical analogy, namely, on account of being grammatically equivalent.

Is it not the case that we now have, here in reduced form, in miniature, this something that enables us to illustrate the fundamental truth that any discourse only gets its meaning from another discourse? Assuredly, demand is not enough to constitute a discourse, but it possesses its fundamental structure, which is to be, as I put it, a quadripode. I stressed that a tetrad is essential for representing this demand, just as a quaternion of letters, F, x, y, z, is indispensable.

It's clear that, in the knot that I have put forward today, demand, refusal, and supply only take on their meaning each from the other. However, what results from this knot, in the way that I have tried to unravel it for you, or rather, in taking on the test of its unravelling, from telling, from showing you, that this never holds together with just two on their own, is that this is the fundament, the root, of what is involved in the object a.

I've given you the minimal knot, but you could add others to it. Because this isn't it. Isn't what? It isn't of my desiring. And who doesn't know that what is specific to demand is very precisely the fact of not being able to locate what is involved in the object of desire? With this desire, my offering, which is not of your desiring, we would easily be able to tie this thing up with your desiring of my asking.[10] And thus, the lettre d'amur will extend indefinitely.

Who can fail to see the fundamental character of a concatenation such as this for the analytic discourse?

I once said, long ago, and there are some who still find it soothing, that an analysis ends only when someone can say, not I speak to you, nor I speak of me, but it's from me that I speak to you. That was a first sketch. Is it not clear that the discourse of the analysand is grounded precisely on this – I ask you to refuse me my offering, because this isn't it? This is the fundamental request, and it's the same request that the analyst renders that much heavier when he neglects it.

I once quipped ironically – with supply, the analyst creates demand. But the demand that he satisfies is the recognition of the fundamental fact that what is being asked for, this isn't it.

9 February 1972

VII

THE VANISHED PARTNER

A TALK AT SAINTE-ANNE

The illusion of sexual relation
The Hun and the Hautre
All and not-all
The duality of woman's jouissance
The exorbitant emergence of the One

Please excuse me. This is the first time I've arrived late. I warn you that I'm unwell. You're here, and so am I. This is all well and good. It's all well and good for you. What I mean by this is that I feel abnormally well under the influence of a slightly high temperature and some medicine, and so, were this situation to change all of a sudden, I hope that those who have been listening to me for some time would explain to the newcomers that it's the first time this has happened to me.

So, this evening I'm going to try to live up to your expectations, here where I said I amuse myself. It is by no means certain that the tone will stay the same throughout. So, please excuse me, it certainly won't be due to my abnormal state. It will be in line with what I intend to say to you this evening.

Elsewhere, at my Seminar, obviously I don't make it easy on my audience. I see that a few of them are here, and they might remember that last time I spoke about this thing I encapsulated with the Borromean knot – I mean, a link of three rings made in such a way that by detaching one of them from the link, the two others will hold together not an instant more. What does this hinge on? I really do have to explain this for you because, after all, in its raw state I'm not sure this will be sufficient for everyone.

It has to do with a question concerning the condition of the unconscious, a question directed at what language is. Indeed, this is a question that has not been settled. Should language be broached in its grammar? – in which case, this is certain, it hinges on a topology . . .

WOMAN IN THE AUDIENCE: What is a topology?

How nice this person is! Topology has a mathematical definition. It is approached through non-metric relationships that can be pulled out of shape. This was the case for those sorts of flexible circles that constituted I ask you to refuse me my offering. Each of them was a closed and flexible circle that only holds fast when linked to the others. None of them can sustain itself on its own. By virtue of its mathematical insertion, this topology is linked to relationships of pure signifiance, as the latest lesson of my Seminar demonstrated. It is in so far as these three terms are threefold that we can see the presence of the third term establishing a relationship between the two others. That's what the Borromean knot means.

There is another way of broaching language, and of course this is of current pertinence. It is of current pertinence given the fact that someone whom I mentioned by name – it so happens that I mentioned him after Jakobson had, but actually I knew him from before – a certain René Thom, attempts to broach the question of language, certainly not without having already cleared a number of paths, from the angle of semantics. That is to say, he doesn't broach language on the basis of signifying combinatorics, in the way that pure mathematics can help us to form a conception of it. The semantic angle doesn't prevent him from also drawing on mathematics, from finding in certain curves, and in certain forms that are deduced from these curves, something that would enable us to conceive of language as something like an echo of these physical phenomena.

For example, these curves are elaborated on the basis of what is purely and simply the communication of phenomena of resonance. Holding validity in a certain number of fundamental relations, these curves would purportedly, in a second phase, gather together and homogenize, as it were, to be taken up in a single parenthesis from which the various grammatical functions are purported to result. It seems to me that there is already an obstacle to conceiving of things in this way, which is that one is compelled to place very different types of action under the same heading of verbs. Why would language have gathered in some way, into a single category, functions that can only be conceived of originally in very different modalities of emergence? None the less, the question remains in suspense. It is certain that there would be something extremely satisfying about considering language to be modelled in some way on functions that are supposed to be functions of physical reality, even if this reality can be broached only from the angle of a mathematical functionalization.

For my part, what I'm putting forward for you is something that is necessarily attached to the purely topological origin of language. I believe I am able to account for this topological origin on the basis of its being linked essentially to something that occurs in the speaking being through the intermediary of sexuality. Does the speaking being speak because of this something that happened to sexuality, or did this something happen to sexuality because he is a speaking being? I abstain from settling this matter. I let you take care of that.

This evening, I'm going to try to push the fundamental scheme at issue a little further.

The function called sexuality is defined, to the extent that we know anything about it – we do know a bit about it, if only from experience – by the fact that the sexes are twain. This is so, regardless of what is thought by one famous author who, in her time, oriented by goodness knows what because in truth I hadn't started teaching anything yet, thought she should confer with me before delivering The Second Sex. She called me by phone to tell me that she would certainly need my advice in order to enlighten her as to what the psychoanalytic contribution to her book would be. As I remarked to her that it would take at least a good five or six months for me to unravel the question for her – which is a minimum because I've been speaking about it now for twenty years, and this is not by chance – she announced that of course it was out of the question for a book that was already being finalized to have to wait so long, the laws of literary production being such that it seemed to her that having more than three or four consultations with me was impossible. Following which, I declined the honour.

The fundament of what I've been coming out with for a while now, since last year, is very precisely that there is no second sex. From the moment language starts functioning, there is no second sex. Or, to put it differently, concerning what is called heterosexuality, the word ἕτερος, which is the term that in Greek is used to say other, is in the position – for the relation that in the speaking being is called sexual – of emptying itself of its Being. This emptiness which it offers to speech is precisely what I call the locus of the Other, namely the locus in which the effects of the said speech are inscribed.

I'm not going to fill what I have to say to you with etymological references because that would set us back. I'll spare you how ἕτερος, in one Greek dialect that I won't name, is called ἄτερος, and how this ἕτερος joins up to δεύτερος and marks out how this δεύτερος is, in this instance, elided, so to speak.

Clearly this might appear surprising, just as it is evident that, for many an age now, such a formula is precisely what has been overlooked. Truth be told, I don't know whether there exists any reference for a time when it might have been formulated. Nevertheless, I claim that this is what the psychoanalytic experience brings, and I support this with what you can see on the blackboard.

$$\exists x.\overline{\Phi x} \qquad \overline{\exists x}.\overline{\Phi x}$$

$$\forall x.\Phi x \qquad \overline{\forall x}.\Phi x$$

For this, recall the basis of the conception we may have, not of heterosexuality – because all in all, if you have followed what I just put forward, heterosexuality bears the right name – but of bisexuality.

At the point we've reached in statements about the said sexuality, what have we got? What we refer to – and don't imagine that this goes without saying – is the model that is supposed to be animal. Therefore, there is a relation between the animal image of copulation and the sexes, which seems to furnish a sufficient model for what is involved in relation. By the same token, what is sexual is considered in terms of need.

This is far from having always been the case. Believe it. I don't need to remind you what know means in the biblical sense of the word. The relation between voῦς and something that is purported to receive its passive imprint – which is termed in various ways, but which is most usually denominated in Greek as ὕλη – this mode of relationship that is generated by the mind has always been considered to model not merely the animal relationship, but the fundamental mode of Being of what was held to be the world. The Chinese have long called upon two fundamental essences that are respectively the feminine essence, which they call Yīn, in opposition to the Yáng that I have written, doubtless not by accident, underneath.

陰 Yīn

陽 Yáng

Were there such a thing as relation that could be articulated on the sexual plane, were there such a thing as relation that could be articulated in the speaking being, the question is whether it would have to be stated of all those of one same sex with respect to all those of the other. This is obviously the idea that is suggested to us, at the point we've reached, in reference to what I've called the animal model, which is the aptitude, if I may say so, of each of those on one side to be valid for all the others on the other side. You can see, therefore, that the statement is announced in keeping with the significant semantic form of the universal. If you replace in what I have just said each of those with anyone or anybody – anybody from one of these two sides – you would be wholly in the realm of the indeterminacy of what is being chosen in each all to correspond to all the others. Recognize if you will in this conditional mood something that echoes my discourse that would not be a discourse of semblance.

The each of those that I used at first has the effect of calling to your minds how, dare I say, the effective relation is not without an evocation of the horizon of one to one, of every Jack has his Jill. This one-to-one correspondence echoes what we know to be essential when it comes to presentifying number. Note that from the outset we can eliminate the existence of both of these dimensions, and it may even be said that the animal model is precisely what is suggestive of the animistic fantasy. Even if the choice happens through encounter, one-to-one coupling is what of this is apparent to us, namely that there are only two animals that are copulating together. If we didn't have this animal model, we would not have this essential dimension which is very precisely that the encounter is unique. When I say that it is here, and only here, that the animistic model is hatched, this is not by chance. Let's call it the soul-to-soul encounter.

In any case, it will come as no surprise to anyone who knows about the condition of the speaking being that, on the basis of this fundament, the encounter is to be repeated qua unique. There is no need to bring any dimension of virtue into play here. The very necessity of what is produced as unique in the speaking being is that it repeats. It is precisely in this respect that the fantasy I have called animistic is only hatched and sustained on the basis of the animal model. This fantasy is there to say language does not exist. Clearly this is not what interests us in the analytic field.

What gives us the illusion of sexual relation in the speaking being is everything that materializes the universal in what effectively amounts to herd behaviour in the relations between the sexes. I have already underscored that, in the sexual quest, or hunt if you prefer, the lads egg each other on in groups and the lasses like to pair up, so long as it is advantageous for them, of course. This was an ethological remark that I made, but which doesn't settle anything because a moment's reflection suffices to see in this a mirage that is equivocal enough for it not to last long.

To be more insistent here, and to hold myself at the most basal level of experience, I mean at the ground level of analytic experience, I will remind you about the imaginary. We reconstitute the imaginary in the animal model, and we do so in keeping with our own ideas, of course, because it's clear that we can only reconstruct it from observation. However, we do have an experience of the imaginary, an experience that is not effortless but which psychoanalysis has allowed us to extend. To put things crudely – it's not so crude, I ought rather to say cruel – I think it will not be difficult to make myself heard if I assert that in any sexual encounter, well, good Lord, if there is something that psychoanalysis enables us to assert, it's I know not what profile of other presence for which the vulgar term partouze is not to be altogether ruled out.[1]

In itself, this reference has nothing decisive about it, because, after all, one could assume an air of seriousness by saying that this is precisely the mark of the abnormal, as though the normal could be located somewhere. In putting forward this term – the vulgar name I have just uttered – I was certainly not striving to pluck the string of the erotic lyre for you, but simply to make a remark that may have something of the value of an awakening. At least this offers you, not the dimension that might echo Eros – I am certainly not here to amuse you in that key – but simply the pure dimension of a wake-up.

Let's try now to open up what is involved in the kinship between the universal proposition and our business, namely the statement that objects ought to be shared out into two alls of opposite equivalence. I've just told you that there is no cause to demand the equinumerosity of individuals, and I stuck, as best I could, to maintaining what I had to assert concerning simply the bi-uniqueness of coupling. If this were possible, it would amount to two universals defined solely as establishing the possibility of a relation of one to the other or of the other to one.

The said relation has absolutely nothing to do with what are commonly called sexual relations. We have stacks of relations to these relations. And, on these rapports, these relations, we also have a few little rapports, a few little reports. They keep us busy in our terrestrial life. However, on the level at which I position it, it's a question of grounding this relation in universals. How does the man universal relate to the woman universal? This is the question that forces itself upon us due to the fact that language demands very precisely that it should be grounded through this. Were there no such thing as language, well, there wouldn't be any question either. We wouldn't have to bring the universal into play.

To be more precise, and to render the Other absolutely alien to what otherwise might be mere seconding, pure and simple, this relation is perhaps what will force me this evening to accentuate the A – whereby I mark out the Autre as an emptiness – by means of something extra. With an extra aitch, the Hautre might not be such a bad way of making audible the dimension of the Hun that can come into play here.[2] It would enable us to perceive, for example, that all that we possess by way of philosophical lucubration has come, perhaps not by chance, from a certain Socrates. He was clearly a hysteric, clinically speaking I mean. Well, there are reports of his cataleptic manifestations.

The said Socrates was able to sustain a discourse that, not without reason, stands at the origin of the discourse of science. He was able to do so very precisely on account of having brought the subject to the place of semblance, as I have defined it. He was able to do so precisely because of the dimension that presentified for him the Hautre as such, namely his wife's hatefulness, to call a spade a spade. She was sa femme to the point that she s'affemait,[3] to such an extent that at the time of his death he had to adjure her kindly to withdraw so as to allow his death to take on its full political signification. This is simply a dimension indicative of the point at which the question we are raising lies.

I mentioned that if we can say that there is no such thing as sexual relation, this is surely not innocently. It's because of experience, namely a mode of discourse that is absolutely not that of the hysteric but rather the one that I have inscribed with a quadripodic distribution as the analytic discourse. From this discourse emerges the dimension of the phallic function, which hitherto had never been mentioned. The phallic function is what entails that at least one of two terms is not typified by sexual relation. This term is the one to which the word Hun is here being attached. It's not that its Hun position is reducible to this something that is called either male or, in the Chinese terminology, the essence of Yáng. On the contrary, it's very precisely by virtue of what deserves to be recalled in order to accentuate the meaning of the term organ. It is an organ only as an implement. This meaning is veiled because it comes to us from afar. The analytic experience prompts us to see everything that is stated by way of sexual relation as revolving around the implement. This is something new. I mean that it corresponds to the emergence of a discourse that certainly had never come to light of day before, and which would never have been conceived of without the precondition of the discourse of science in so far as the latter is an insertion of language on the mathematical real.

I have said that what stigmatizes this relation, on account of being profoundly undermined in language, is very precisely that no longer can it be written down in terms of male and female essences. This gets done nevertheless, but in a dimension that strikes me as being a mirage. What does this mean, that it cannot be written down, since, after all, it has already been written down? If I reject this ancient writing in the name of the analytic discourse, you could raise a far more valid objection, which is that I too am writing it down. What I have put once again on the blackboard is something that claims to support the channelling of this sexual business by means of a form of writing.

Nevertheless, this writing is only authorized, it only takes shape, through a highly specified form of writing, which allowed the sudden entrance of a mathematical topology to be introduced into logic. It is only on the basis of the existence of the formulation of this topology that we have been able to imagine turning any proposition into a propositional function, that is, into something that is specified by the empty place that is left in it, and which functions to determine the argument.

What on this occasion I am borrowing from mathematical inscription, in so far as it supersedes the first forms – I'm not saying formalizations – sketched out by Aristotle in his syllogistic, might, so it would seem, offer us under the term argument-function a comfortable term with which to specify sexual opposition. What would it require? It would be enough for the respective functions of male and female to be distinct in the same way as Yīn and Yáng. It's precisely because the function is unique, because it's always Φx that is at issue, that difficulty and complication are generated. The simple fact that you are here means that it's not possible for you not to have at least a little idea of this.

Here, Φx affirms that it is true – this is the meaning that the term function carries – that what is related to the practice, to the register, of the sexual act falls within the remit of the phallic function. It is very precisely inasmuch as the phallic function is at issue, from whichever angle we look at it – I mean, from one side or the other – that something urges us to ask in what respect the two partners differ. This is what is inscribed in the formulae that I have put on the blackboard.

If it turns out that, due to the fact of dominating both partners equally, the phallic function does not make them different, it is no less the case that first of all we must seek out the difference elsewhere. It is in this respect that the formulae inscribed on the blackboard deserve to be examined from both sides. The left side stands in opposition to the right side, while the upper level stands in opposition to the lower level. The meaning of this deserves to be auscultated, if I may say so, namely to be examined first of all in how they can show evidence of a certain misuse.

Just because I have made use of a formulation produced by the sudden emergence of mathematics in logic, this doesn't mean that I have employed it in quite the same way. Moreover, my first remarks are going to consist in showing that, indeed, I make use of it in such a way that on no account can it be translated into the terms of propositional logic. The mode of the variable – namely that which makes a place for the argument – is specified here by the quadruple form in which the relationship between argument and function is posited.

To introduce what is at stake, I'm going to remind you that in propositional logic we have on the foremost plane the four fundamental relationships that are in some sense the grounding of this logic, namely negation, conjunction, disjunction and implication. There are others, but they are seldom the first, and all the others are reducible to these.

I claim that the way our positions of argument and function have been written here means that the relation called negation, whereby all that is posited as truth can only be negated by passing over to falsehood, is unsustainable here. Indeed, you can see that at either level, both the upper and the lower, where the statement of the function – namely that the function is phallic – is posited either as a truth or as dismissible, the actual truth would be precisely what is not written, which here can only be written in the form that contests the phallic function, namely It is not true that the phallic function is what grounds sexual relation. In both cases, at each of the two levels that are as such independent, it is not at all a matter of making one the negation of the other, but on the contrary of one standing as the obstacle to the other.

What you can see distributed across the upper level is There exists and There does not exist. Likewise, on the lower level, on one side there is all x, namely the domain of what is here defined by the phallic function, while the difference in the position of the argument in the phallic function is that it is not all woman that is inscribed on the other side.

You can see very well that, far from one standing in opposition to the other as its negation, they subsist, quite to the contrary, by both being negated. On one side there is an x that can be sustained here beyond the phallic function, and on the other side there is not one, simply because a woman cannot be castrated, and for the best of reasons. This is the level of what is closed off for us as regards sexual relation, while at the level of the phallic function it is inasmuch as the all stands in opposition to the pas-toute, the not-all, that there is a chance of a distribution, to the left and to the right, of what will be founded as male and as female. Therefore, far from the relationship of negation forcing us to choose, it is in so far as we have to distribute that the two sides stand in legitimate opposition to one another.

After negation, I spoke of conjunction. To put paid to this matter, I need only on this occasion remark – I hope there are enough people who have flipped through a book on logic for me not to have to insist – that conjunction is grounded in that it only takes on a value from the fact that two propositions can both be true. This is precisely what is in no way permitted by what is here on the blackboard, because you can see that from right to left there is no identity, and that at the level of what is posited as true, namely Φx, the universal propositions cannot conjoin. The universal proposition on the left-hand side stands in opposition to the right-hand side only by virtue of the fact that there is no articulable universal proposition, namely that woman, in regard to the phallic function, only situates herself as being pas toute, not all, subject to it.

The strange thing is that, in spite of this, disjunction doesn't apply either, if you recall that disjunction only takes on a value from the fact of it being impossible for two propositions to be false at the same time. Shall we say that this is the stronger or the weaker relationship? It is certainly the stronger in that it is the one that is the hardest nut to crack because, for there to be disjunction, the minimum requirement allows that one proposition is true and the other false, or else that both are true. Additionally, what I have called one true, the other false, may also be one false, the other true, so there are at least three combinatorial cases in which disjunction is sustained. The only thing that it cannot allow is for both to be false at the same time. Now, here on the board we've got two functions, the two at the top, which are posited as not being the truthful truth, as I said earlier. Seemingly, we've got something that gives hope that, at the very least, we might have articulated a veritable disjunction.

However, note what is written on one of the sides that has Φx with the sign of negation over it, the left side – and this is something that of course I will have occasion to articulate in a way that will bring it to life – namely that it's inasmuch as the phallic function is not functioning that sexual relation stands a chance. We have posited that there has to exist an x for this. Now, what do we have on the other side? Well, that there doesn't exist any other such x. This means that it may be said that the fate of a mode by which the differentiation of male and female, of man and woman, would be sustained in speaking beings, any chance of us having such a thing, is that while there is discord – and presently we shall see what I mean by this – at the level of the universals, these universals are not sustained by the fact of the inconsistency of either one of them.

What happens here, where we have dismissed the function itself? While on one side it is supposed that there exists an x that satisfies the negated Φx, on the other side we have the express formulation that there is no x. I illustrated the latter by saying that woman, for the best of reasons, can on no account be castrated. Precisely, there is only the statement, no x. This means that at the level on which the disjunction would have some chance of being produced, we have, to one side, just one – or at the very least what I have put forward as the at-least-one – and to the other, non-existence, that is to say, the relation of 1 to 0.

At the level on which sexual relation would stand a chance, not of coming about, but simply of being hoped for beyond the abolition, the dismissing, of the phallic function, we only ever find the presence, dare I say, of one of the two sexes. This is very specifically what must be related to the experience that I have accustomed you to see being stated in the form that woman educes, in that for her the universal cannot arise from the phallic function. As you know – and this is the experience, one that is, alas, far too everyday not to veil its structure – she only participates in the phallic function by wanting it, either by stealing it from the man or, good heavens, by ordering him to serve it to her, so that in the . . . or worse of cases – mark my word – she may serve it back to him. This does not, however, universalize her, apart from the fact – which is the root of the pas-toute, the not-all – that she harbours another jouissance besides phallic jouissance. This other jouissance is strictly termed feminine, and on no account does it depend on phallic jouissance.

If woman is not all, it is because of the duality of her jouissance. This is what Tiresias disclosed when he came back after having been, for a while – by the grace of Zeus – Theresa. Naturally this had the consequence we know about, and which was ultimately laid out, if I may say so, visibly – this being the operative word – for Oedipus, to show him what was in store for him, in return for having existed as a man of the supreme possession that resulted from the deception his partner exercised over him regarding the true nature of what she was offering to his jouissance. Or, let's put it differently, it was for want of his partner asking him to refuse her offering. This clearly shows, but at the level of myth, that for having existed as a man at a level that eludes the phallic function, Oedipus had no other woman but the very one who, for him, should not have existed.

Why should not have? Why the theory of incest? This would make it necessary for me to go down the path of the Names-of-the-Father, precisely where I said I would never venture again. Because it so happens that I've just reread, at someone's behest, this first lecture from the academic year of 1963/64, delivered here at Sainte-Anne. This was why I went back to it, because I enjoyed remembering it. I read it again, and it reads well. It even has a certain dignity, such that I would publish it, if I ever publish again. This doesn't depend on me. Others would have to publish with me. That would encourage me. If I do publish it, you will be able to see the care I took to pick out – though I'd already been saying it for five years – a certain number of registers, the paternal metaphor in particular, the proper noun, and so on. There was everything you need to give meaning, with the Bible, to the mythical lucubration of what I had said. But I won't ever do that again. I will never do it again because, after all, I can make do with formulating things at the level of logical structure which, after all, has every right here.

What I want to tell you is that at a certain level, the one where sexual relation stands a chance, this $\overline{\exists x}$, namely There does not exist, there is nothing else, this absent ἕτερος, is on no account necessarily a special privilege of the feminine sex. This is simply indicative of what, on my graph – I'm saying this because it's had its own small fate – I wrote as the Signifier of the barred Other. This means that, however you take it, from the moment sexual relation is at issue, the Other is absent.

Naturally, at the level of what is functioning – that is, the phallic function – there is simply the discord that I mentioned just a moment ago. It so happens that, on one side and the other, one is not in the same position. On one side, we have the universal founded on a necessary relation to the phallic function, and, on the other, a contingent relation, because woman is pas toute, not all.

Therefore, on the upper level I underscore that the relation that is grounded on the disappearance, the vanishing existence, of one of the partners, which leaves the place empty for the inscription of speech, is not at this level the special privilege of any one side. Only, for there to be a grounding of sex, as they say, they have to be twain. Nought and one certainly makes two. It makes two on the symbolic plane, in so far as we are in agreement that existence takes root in the symbol. This is what defines the speaking being.

The speaking being certainly is something. Perhaps, indeed . . . Who is not what he is? Yet this being is absolutely ungraspable. And this being is all the more ungraspable in that he is forced to go via the symbol in order to support himself. It's quite clear that a being that comes into being by the symbol alone is precisely this Beingless being in which you all partake through the mere fact that you speak. On the other hand, it's quite certain that what is supported is existence, and this is so to the extent that existing is not Being. To exist depends on the Other. All of you here, from some angle or other, do indeed exist, but when it comes to your Being, you're not so tranquil. Otherwise you wouldn't come seeking assurance for it in so many psychoanalytic endeavours.

Obviously this is something that was utterly original in the first emergence of logic. There is something quite striking in this first emergence of logic, namely the difficulty and the wavering that Aristotle displays regarding the status of the particular proposition. These are difficulties that have been underscored elsewhere. I didn't discover them myself. For those who might care to look into them, I recommend issue 10 of the Cahiers pour l'analyse. The leader article, by a certain Jacques Brunschwig, is excellent on this score. In it they will be able to see a flawless indication of Aristotle's difficulty with the particular. Certainly, Aristotle perceives that existence can in no way be established except outside the universal, which is precisely why he locates existence at the level of the particular, a particular which is on no account sufficient to sustain it, even though it gives the illusion of doing so by virtue of the use of the word some.

In formalization this is known as a quantifier, due to a trace left in philosophical history by the fact that a certain Apuleius – who was a writer of not especially good-taste prose, notably The Golden Ass, and who was a feverish mystic to boot – one day introduced the notion that, in Aristotle, whatever had to do with all and some belonged to the realm of quantity. It's nothing of the sort. On the contrary, these are simply two different modes of what I could call – if you will let this past, since it's somewhat extempore – the incarnation of the symbol.

The incarnation of the symbol, the passage into day-to-day life, the fact that there are alls and somes in every tongue, is precisely what compels us to posit that language must nevertheless have a common root. Furthermore, since all tongues are profoundly different in their structure, this common root has to be related to something that is not language. Of course, one can understand how people slip up here. What we have a sense of as what lies beyond language can only be mathematical, and, on this pretext, people imagine to themselves that, because it's number, it must be a matter of quantity. Perhaps, however, it is number, strictly speaking, in all its reality, to which language affords access, but only by being capable of locking on to 0 and 1. The real would make its entry here, this real that alone may lie beyond language, namely the only domain in which a symbolic impossibility can be formulated.

This fact of relation that is accessible to language, if it is grounded by sexual non-relation – the fact that it cannot, therefore, confront 0 and 1 – would easily ensure its reflection in Frege's elaboration of his logical generation of numbers. I have at the very least indicated what constitutes a difficulty in this logical generation, namely the wide gap that I pointed out for you in the mathematical triangle between this 0 and this 1, a gap that is duplicated by the confrontational opposition between them. Already, it is essential to remind ourselves that the fact that what may intervene is there only by virtue of it being the essence of the first couple, and that this can only be a third, is something that is far more dangerous to allow to persist in analysis than the mythical adventures of the primal Father.[4] These mythical adventures do not in themselves present any inconvenience in so far as they structure quite admirably the necessity that, somewhere, there should be at-least-one who transcends what is involved in the grip of the phallic function. The myth of the primal Father means just that. It is explained here quite well enough for us easily to make use of it, besides the fact that we find it confirmed by the logical structuration of what has been set out on the blackboard. On the other hand, there is certainly nothing more dangerous than the confusion over what is involved in the One.

As you know, Freud frequently invoked the One as the signifier of an essence of Eros, purported to be that of fusion. Specifically, libido would be a sort of essence that would tend towards making One from two. As one old myth has it, which is surely not good mysticism in the slightest, one of the fundamental tensions of the world tends only towards the forming of One. Truly, this myth is something that can function only on a horizon of delusion. It has strictly speaking nothing to do with anything we might meet in experience. If there is something quite patent in the relations between the sexes, and which analysis not only articulates but is designed to play out in every direction, it's that these relations between the sexes present a difficulty. Nothing in them resembles any kind of spontaneity, apart from the horizon I was speaking about earlier as being grounded, at a push, on goodness knows what animal myth. Eros is in no way a tendency towards One, far from it.

Any precise articulation of what is involved in the two levels depends on the fact that the opposition between the sexes is grounded only in discord, in that they can in no way be established on the basis of a universal. Conversely, at the level of existence, the possibility of the articulation of language harbours an opposition that consists in the annulling, in the voiding, of one of the functions, the function of the Other. This is what strikes me as being essential to bring to the fore.

Note that earlier, having spoken to you in succession of negation, conjunction, and disjunction, I didn't push on to what is involved in implication. Clearly, implication can function only between the two levels, between the level of the phallic function and the level that dismisses it. Now, in spite of this, nothing that is a disjunction on the lower level, the level of the insufficiency of the universal specification, implies that this should be so if and only if the syncope of existence on the upper level should effectively be produced. Nor, reciprocally, does the latter require the discord on the lower level.

On the other hand, what we see functioning once again, but distinctly and separately, is the relationship between the upper level and the lower level. The requirement that there should exist at-least-one-man is a requirement that seems to be emitted at the level of the feminine, which is specified as being a pas-toute, a not-all, a duality, the only point at which duality stands a chance of being represented. There is a requisite here that is, if I may say so, needless. Nothing imposes this at-least-one except the unique chance – it still has to be gambled – that something might be functioning on the other side, but as an ideal point, as a possibility that all men could reach. Reach how? Through identification. There is but a logical necessity here, which is imposed only at the level of the wager.

Observe, however, what results from this concerning the barred universal proposition. Moreover, it is in this respect that the at-least-one by which the Name of the Father is supported, the Name of the mythical Father, is indispensable. This is where I am offering an insight that is missing in the function, in the notion, of species or of class. It's in this respect that it was no accident that this whole dialectic was bungled in the Aristotelian forms.

In the end, where does this $\exists x$ come to function, this There exists at-least-one who is not the serf of the phallic function? It is merely a requisite, I would say, of a desperate type,[5] from the standpoint of something that is not even supported by a universal definition. However, note that with regard to the universal proposition written $\forall x.\Phi x$, every male is serf to the phallic function. What is meant by the at-least-one that functions to elude this? I shall say that it is the exception. This is indeed the one time when the proverb that says, without knowing what it says, The exception proves the rule, turns out to be confirmed. It's peculiar that it's only with the analytic discourse that a universal can find its veritable fundament in the existence of an exception. At any rate, this means that we can certainly distinguish the universal that is thus founded from any use that is rendered commonplace by the philosophical tradition of the said universal.

There is a peculiar thing that I have found along the path of enquiry, and because, given some training long ago, I'm not completely ignorant in Chinese. I asked one of my dear friends to remind me about something, some trace of which I had kept more or less. I had to have it confirmed for me by someone whose mother tongue is Chinese. It is certainly very odd that, in Chinese, the denomination of all mankind is either voiced dōu, which I won't write on the board because I'm weary, or, in a more ancient voicing, one says tcha.[6] Well, if it amuses you I will write it up for you after all.

都 Dōu (Tcha)

Can you imagine that one can say, for example, all mankind eats? Well, you say, měi gèrén dōu chī. Měi insists on the fact that he is indeed there, and should you have any doubt about it, the classifier gè shows very well that they are countable. But this doesn't make them all, so one adds dōu, which means without exception. I could of course cite you other things. I could tell you that All the soldiers have perished, they are dōu sǐ, all dead, which in Chinese is Soldiers without exception kaput. We can see the all spreading out for us from within, and meeting its limit only with inclusion, by being subsumed into larger and larger sets. In the Chinese language, one never says dōu or tcha without thinking of the totality of whatever is at issue as content.

What we discover in what I have articulated for you as a relationship, here of unique existence in relation to the status of the universal, assumes the figure of an exception. However, isn't this idea also the correlate of what earlier I called the emptiness of the Other? We have made progress in the logic of classes by creating the logic of sets. The difference between a class and a set is that when a class is empty, there is no class, whereas when a set is empty, there is still the element of the empty set. It is indeed in this respect that, once again, mathematics leads to progress in logic.

It is here that we are able to see – because we are still keeping this up, but I assure you it will be over soon[7] – where the unilateralism of the existential function can be taken up with respect to what is involved in the other party, in the partner, in so far as here it is without exception. This without exception that is implied by the non-existence of x in the right-hand portion of the table, namely that there is no exception and that here there is something that has no parallelism, no symmetry, with the requirement that earlier I called the desperate aspect of the at-least-one, is another requirement. This other requirement hinges on the fact that, all things considered, the masculine universal may feel at home in the assurance that no woman exists who would have to be castrated, and this is for reasons that strike him as obvious. Yet in fact this has no further impact for the reason that it's an utterly needless assurance. What I called to mind earlier regarding woman's conduct shows well enough that her relation to the phallic function is an altogether active one. Here, however, as was the case earlier, while the supposition is grounded in some sense upon the assurance that an impossibility is at issue, this being the quintessence of the real, it still does not undermine the fragility of the conjecture, because in any case woman has no greater assurance of her universal essence.

The reason for this is that the contrary of the limit point, namely the fact that there is no exception, does not ensure the universal of womanhood, which already is so thinly established due to its discordance. Far from enduing consistency to any all, the without exception naturally offers even less to what is defined as pas tout, as not all, as essentially dual.

I hope that this will remain for you as a necessary peg in the steep climb that we might try to negotiate later on, if indeed we are led onto the path along which the sudden entrance of this strangest of items, namely the function of the One, has to be examined with severity. People ask themselves a great many things about animal mentality, when in the end it can only serve us as a looking-glass reference. A looking glass before which, as before any looking glass, one purely and simply disavows. There is something one could ask oneself – is there such a thing as One for animals?

The exorbitant aspect of the emergence of this One is what we shall be led to open up with Plato's Parmenides, which is why I've been inviting you for some time now to reread it, before I broach it.

3 March 1972

VIII

WHAT IS INVOLVED IN THE OTHER

Your fantasies derive jouissance from you
The queue of thoughts
Ontology is a dishonour
There is no transgression of the impossible Woman between centre and absence

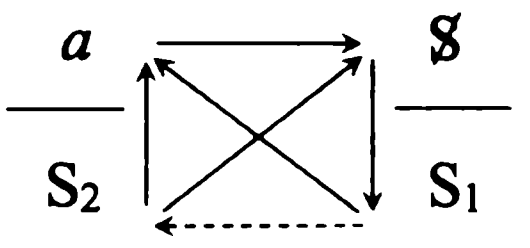
$\exists x.\overline{\Phi x}$ $\quad\quad$ $\overline{\exists x}.\overline{\Phi x}$

$\forall x.\Phi x$ $\quad\quad$ $\overline{\forall x}.\Phi x$



Since my aim this year is to speak to you about the One, I'm going to begin today by stating what is involved in the Other.

A while ago, I incurred some worry regarding this Other that I write with a capital A. It was evinced by a Marxist to whom I was then indebted for the venue where I had been able to resume my work. His worry was that this Other, this third party, when asserted in the couple's relation, could only be identified – according to him, the Marxist – with God. Did this worry develop thereafter to the extent of instilling his resolute mistrust of the trail I might leave?

This is a question that I shall leave to one side for today, because I'm going to begin by simply drawing back the veil on what is involved in this Other.

1

The Other at issue is the Other of the sexual couple, the very same. This is indeed why it will be necessary for us to produce the signifier that can be written only in so far as it bars the capital A.

Our jouissance is derived only from the Other. I'm stressing this without pausing over it because otherwise I won't move forward. It's more difficult to assert the following – inasmuch as what would seem to be vital is that what characterizes jouissance, according to what I've just said, would be evasive – our jouissance is derived only by the Other. This is precisely the gulf that is presented to us by the question of God's existence, an existence that I leave on the horizon as ineffable.

When I say that our jouissance is derived only from the Other, what is important is not the relation between what enjoys and what we might think of as our Being. What is important is that we do not derive jouissance from it sexually – there is no such thing as sexual relation – nor is jouissance derived from us in this way. You can see that lalingua – which I write in a single word – despite usually behaving itself, is resistant here. It gives a tight-lipped pout. It has to be said, from the Other we derive jouissance mentally.

There is a remark in the Parmenides that assumes the value of a model here, which is why I've been recommending that you go and sharpen yourselves up with it. Naturally, if you read it through the commentaries that are given in academia, you will locate it in the lineage of philosophers, where it's considered to be a particularly brilliant exercise, but then, after this brief salute, you are told that you won't get much out of it, that Plato was simply pushing to the ultimate degree of intensity what can be deduced for you from his Theory of Forms. Perhaps it needs to be read differently. It needs to be read innocently.

Note that every now and then something can touch you, if only for example when at the start of the seventh hypothesis he makes the passing remark that starts off from if the One is not. Very much as an aside, he says, And what if we were to say that the non-One is not?[1] Whereupon he sets about showing that the negation of anything whatsoever, not only the negation of the One but the negation of non-large or non-small, is as such distinguished by not negating the same term.

This is conducive to what is at issue, namely the negation of sexual jouissance, which is what I'm asking you to pause over now. The S, brackets, barred capital A, S(Ⱥ), is the same thing that I have just formulated, namely that from the Other we derive jouissance mentally. This writes something about the Other. As I have asserted, this

Other is the term in the relationship that, on account of vanishing, on account of not existing, becomes the locus where this relationship is written – written in the form of these four formulae that are written up here – so as to transmit a knowledge. Perhaps the knowledge at issue can be taught, but what gets transmitted is the formula.

It is precisely because one of the terms becomes the locus where the relationship gets written that it can no longer be a relationship, because the term changes function, because it becomes the locus at which the relationship gets written, and because the relationship is only on account of being written in the stead of this term. One of the terms of the relationship has to empty out to allow this relationship to be written.

Indeed, this is what radically removes any scope of idealism from the mentally that I have just put forward in the inverted commas that speech cannot state. Such incontestable idealism can be seen developing in remarks from Berkeley's pen, all of which hinge on the following – nothing of what is thought is thought unless by someone. This is the argument, or more accurately the irreducible argumentation, which would have more bite to it were it acknowledged that what is at stake is jouissance.

You derive jouissance only from your fantasies. There you have it for what sets the scope of the idealism that no one, moreover, despite it being incontestable, takes seriously. What is important is that your fantasies derive jouissance from you.

Here, I can only come back to what I was saying earlier. As you can see, even lalingua, which is well behaved, doesn't come out with this easily.

2

Idealism asserts that what is involved is que de pensées, nothing but thoughts. To get out of this, lalingua, which is well behaved, but not so well behaved as all that, might be able to offer you something that I won't need to write down in order to bid you have this que resound in a different way. Well, if I need to spell it out for you, it's q.u.e.u.e., queue de pensées, a queue of thoughts.

This is what the good behaviour of lalingua enables in French. It's the tongue in which I express myself so I don't see why I shouldn't take advantage of it. If I spoke a different one, I would find something else. What is involved here is a queue of thoughts, not, as the idealist says, in that one thinks them, nor even in that one thinks them therefore-I-am, which is still a mark of progress, but in that these thoughts really do think themselves.

It is in this respect that I include myself in the class of realists,[2] if indeed this holds the faintest interest because I don't see why I should classify myself philosophically, I through whom emerges a discourse that is not philosophical discourse, but psychoanalytic discourse, the scheme of which I have reproduced here. I qualify it as discourse because, as I have stressed, nothing takes on any meaning except from the relations between one discourse and another discourse.

Of course, this presupposes a certain practice to which I can neither say nor hope I have truly accustomed you. All this washes over you like water off a duck's back because – and this, moreover, is what constitutes your existence – you are solidly inserted in the discourses that came before, which have been there for a while, a very long while. This includes philosophical discourse, inasmuch as the university discourse transmits it to you, and in what a state! You are indeed solidly installed in all this, and this is what makes you feel quite at home.

It should not be thought that those who occupy the place of this Other, this Other that I'm bringing up to date, have been given much of an advantage over you, but even so, some furniture has been placed in their hands that is rather unwieldy.

Among this furniture there is the armchair, the nature of which has not been very well ascertained. Nevertheless, the armchair is essential because what is specific to this discourse is that it enables what is written up here in the top right, in the shape of the barred S. Like all writing, this is a very delightful shape. It is not altogether by chance that Hogarth used the S for the line of beauty. There must be some meaning to this somewhere, and surely too in the fact that it has to be barred. Be that as it may, it is curious to see that I write what is produced on the basis of this barred subject in the same way as what holds a different place, the dominant place, in the discourse of the master. This S One, S_1, is precisely what I'm trying to produce for you here in so far as I am speaking. As I have said several times, it is in this respect that I am in the place of the analysand, and this is instructive.

Has what is written been thought? This is the question. It might no longer be possible to say by whom it was thought. Indeed, this is what you are dealing with in everything that is written. The queue of thoughts that I was speaking about is the subject himself, as the hypothetical of these thoughts. Since Aristotle, people have been harping on at such length about the ὑποκείμενον, and yet it was quite clear. They made such a meal of it that a cat couldn't find her kittens. I'm going to call it a tail, this queue of thoughts, of something real that produces this comet effect that I have called queue de pensées and which might indeed be the phallus.

Either what occurs here is not capable of being recaptured nachträglich by what I have just called the tail – which is conceivable only because the effect that it constitutes projects out in the same way as does its advent, namely the disarray, if you will allow me so to name the disjunction of sexual relation – or else what has been thought lies open, within reach of a rethinking that consists precisely in noticing, by writing it down, that they were thoughts. Whatever one might say, the written comes after these thoughts, these real thoughts, have been produced. The repetition that is the fundament of what the analytic experience uncovers for us lies in this effort of rethinking, in this nachträglich. That this should be written is proof of this, but it's proof only of the effect of resumption, nachträglich. This is what grounds psychoanalysis.

How many times, in philosophical dialogues, have you seen the argument – If you don't follow me this far, there's no philosophy. What I'm going to tell you is exactly the same thing. It has to be one or the other. Either what is commonly accepted in everything that gets written on psychoanalysis, in everything that flows from the pens of psychoanalysts, is valid, namely that what thinks is unthinkable and so there is no psychoanalysis, or else, in order for there to be psychoanalysis and, to say it all, interpretation, then what the queue of thoughts starts off from has to be thought, thought as in real thought.

This is why I gave you all that spiel about Descartes. I think, therefore I am doesn't mean anything if it's not truthful. It's truthful because therefore I am is what I'm thinking, before knowing it and, whether I like it or not, it's the same thing.

This same thing is precisely what I called the Freudian Thing. It's precisely because this I think and what I think are the same thing, that is to say, therefore I am, that there is no equivalence. This is why I spoke about the Freudian Thing, because in a Thing there are deux faces – spell that how you like, face or fasse[3] – which not only are not equivalent, but cannot be replaced, one by the other, in the fact of saying. It's not equivalent. It's not even similar. This was why I only spoke about the Freudian Thing in a certain fashion.

People read what I wrote. It is even curious that this should be one of those things that compel you to reread it. It was even designed for this. And when one rereads it, one realizes that I don't speak about the Thing, because one can't speak about it. I make the Thing itself speak. The Thing in question states – I, Truth, speak. And of course it doesn't say it just like that, but surely this can be seen. This was even why I wrote it. It says it in all sorts of ways, and I daresay it's not a bad piece. Only in my conundrums can I be apprehended. What one writes of the Thing ought to be considered as what of the Thing gets written, coming from the Thing and not from whoever is writing.

This is indeed what means that ontology – in other words the consideration of the subject as Being – is, if you will allow me this, a dishonour.[4]

So, you've heard well, one has to know whereof one is speaking. Either therefore I am is merely a thought, demonstrating that the unthinkable is what is thinking, or it is the fact of saying that can act upon the Thing, enough for it to turn out otherwise. And it is in this respect that any thought is thought through its relations to what gets written thereof. Otherwise, I repeat, there is no psychoanalysis.

We are in the inane, which is currently what is most widespread, the inane-alysable. Saying that it is impossible is not enough, because this doesn't exclude it being practised. For it to be practised without being inane, it's not qualifying it as impossible that matters, rather it is its relation to the impossible that is at stake, and the relation to the impossible is a relation of thought. The relation will not carry any meaning if the demonstrated impossibility is not strictly an impossibility of thought, because it's the only demonstrable impossibility.

If we ground the impossible in its relation to the real, we still need to say the following, which I offer you as a gift. I got this from a charming woman, from way back in my past, who remains nevertheless marked by a delightful redolence of savon,[5] with her accent from the Vaud which she knew how to turn on, because even though she had purged herself of it she could still will it back. She used to say, Nothing is impossible for man – I can't imitate the Vaudois accent, not having been born over there – what he can't do, he leaves. This is to zero in on what is involved in the impossible, to the extent that this term is acceptable for anyone of sober mind.

Well, this annulling of the Other is produced only on the level at which is inscribed – in the only way it can be, namely as I inscribe it – $\overline{\Phi x}$. This means that you cannot write that what forms an obstacle to the phallic function is untrue.[6] So, what does $\exists x$ mean? Namely There exists x, such that it may be inscribed into this negation of the truth of the phallic function.

This deserves to be spelt out across its different moments in time. You can see that what we are going to call into question is very precisely this status of existence, in so far as it is unclear.

3

I think that you've had quite enough of people harping on about the distinction between essence and existence, drumming it into your comprenoire, to find it unsatisfactory.

In the meaning that the analytic discourse allows us to bring to the previous discourses, through the connection of these formulae, there is something that, at the end of the day, I will only be able to pinpoint with the term of a motivation. Failing to notice this motivation is what begets, for example, Hegel's dialectic. Due to this failure to notice it, Hegel's dialectic bypasses it only to consider that discourse as such rules the world.

Here I am moving into a little side note. I don't see why I shouldn't pick up this short digression, especially given that you ask nothing else, because when I go in a straight line, it tires you.

What does leave a shadow of meaning to Hegel's discourse is an absence, and very precisely the absence of surplus-value such as it is drawn from jouissance in the real of the discourse of the master. This absence does, however, note something. It notes, really, the Other, not as abolished, but precisely as the impossibility of any correlate. It is in presentifying this impossibility that it colours Hegel's discourse.

It won't cost you anything simply to reread the Preface to the Phänomenologie des Geistes in correlation with what I'm putting forward here. You see all the holiday homework I'm setting you, the Parmenides and the Phänomenologie, at least the Preface, because naturally you never read the Phänomenologie. But the Preface is damned fine. All by itself it's worth the effort of rereading. You'll see how it confirms, how it takes on meaning from what I'm telling you. I daren't promise you that the Parmenides will do as much, that it will take on meaning, but I do hope it will, because what is specific to a new discourse is that it refreshes what is lost in the whirling of old discourses, specifically meaning.

If I told you that there is something that colours Hegel's discourse, it's because the word colour means something other than meaning here. The promotion of what I'm putting forward precisely discolours it, and finishes off the effect of Marx's discourse. I should like to underscore something in this discourse that constitutes its limit. It entails a protest that turns out to consolidate the discourse of the master by completing it, not only with surplus-value, but by encouraging – I sense that this will cause a stir – the equal existence of woman.

Equal to what? No one knows, because one can also very well say that man = 0, since he needs the existence of something that negates him in order for him to exist as all. (Lacan slams his hand on the table.)

In other words, there is a kind of confusion. This is not unusual because we live in confusion, and it would be wrong to believe that we live on it. This doesn't go without saying. I don't see why a lack of confusion should prevent one from living. It is even very curious that people rush into it. Mark my word, people bolt into it. When a discourse emerges, like the analytic discourse, what it proposes is that you may hold the reins tight enough to uphold the conspiracy of truth.

Everyone knows that conspiracies come to a sudden end. It's easier to come out with so much blather that you end up spotting all the plotters. People confound, people rush into the negation of sexual division, of difference. I've said division because it's operational, and I've said difference because it's precisely what this use of the equals sign in woman = man claims to efface.

I will tell you that the wonderful thing is not all this doltishness but rather the obstacle that this doltishness claims – employing this grotesque word – to transgress. I have taught things that did not claim to transgress anything, but rather to circumscribe a certain number of knotty points, of points of impossibility. In view of which, there were people whom this upset, of course, because they were the representatives, the sitting officials, of the psychoanalytic discourse, who dealt me one of those blows that diminishes your voice.

I was dealt one such blow, physically, by a charming lad. He did that to me, one day. What a sweetie! He put some heart into it. He did it despite the fact that I was being threatened at the same time with a thing I didn't especially believe in – though I went along with it – a revolver. However, the fellows who cut off my voice at one point in time didn't do so despite the fact . . ., but rather because I was being threatened with a shooter, a real one that time and not a toy like the other one. It consisted in subjecting me to an assessment, that is, to the standard of people who wanted to hear nothing of the analytic discourse, even though they occupied the said sitting position. So, what would you expect me to do? From the moment I submitted to this assessment, I was condemned in advance, which naturally made it easier to cut off the voice I had.

Because a voice is something that exists. It carried on like that for several years, I must say. I scarcely had a voice at all. All the same, I did have some voice, from which the Cahiers pour l'analyse were born. It's a very, very, very fine literature. I commend them whole-heartedly, because I was so fully occupied with my voice that, to tell the whole story, well, I can't do everything. I can't read the Parmenides, reread the Phänomenologie, and other stuff, and then read the Cahiers pour l'analyse as well. I had to perk up again, which

I've now done. I've read them all, from cover to cover, and they're great.

They're great, but they're marginal, because they weren't put together by psychoanalysts. During this time, the psychoanalysts were chattering. There has never been so much talk of transgression in my ambit as during the time I had my voice cut off.

Imagine if you will that when it's a matter of the veritable impossible, the impossible that is demonstrated, the impossible such that it is articulated, well, of course, that took some time. There were the first scribblings that allowed for the birth of a logic, aided by the questioning of language, and then it was noticed that these scribblings ran into something that existed, but not in the way that had hitherto been believed, not in the way of Being, that is, not in the way that each of you believe yourselves to be, on the pretext that you are individuals. It was noticed that there were things that existed in the sense that they constitute the limit of what can hold together through the advance of articulating a discourse. This is what the real is. It is approached along the path of what I call the symbolic, which means, the modes of what is stated through this field, this field that exists, of language. This impossible, inasmuch as it is demonstrated, cannot be transgressed.

There are things that have long since performed the tracking – mythical tracking perhaps, but tracking just the same – not only of what is involved in this impossible, but of its motivation. More precisely, this is specifically the fact that sexual relation cannot be written.

As far as this tracking is concerned, no one has ever done any better than, I won't say religion – because as I'm going to explain in minute detail, one doesn't engage in ethnology when one is a psychoanalyst, blending religion into a general term, which is what engaging in ethnology amounts to – nor do I want to say that there is only one religion, but there is the one in which we are immersed, the Christian religion. Well, believe me, the Christian religion puts up with your transgressions damned well. Indeed, this is all it could wish for. It's what consolidates it. The more transgressions there are, the better it is for it.

It is precisely this that is in question. It's a matter of demonstrating where lies the truthfulness of what allows a certain number of discourses that enmesh you to stay on their feet.

Today I will end – I hope I haven't damaged my ring by banging on the table – on the same point that I opened with. I started off from the Other. I haven't got to the end of it because time has gone by, and then, after all, you shouldn't think that when the session ends I haven't had my fill of it.

So, I will wrap up what I have been saying concerning the Other, as a localized remark, leaving aside for now what might be involved in what I've put forward regarding the pivotal point on which I've set my sights this year, namely the One.

There is a good reason for my not having tackled it today, because as you will see there is nothing quite so slippery as this One. It's very curious. If there is one thing that has des faces, faces, in that they se fassent, they make themselves, not at all innumerable, but peculiarly divergent, then it's the One.

There is a good reason for my initially having to get a foothold on the Other. The Other – hear this well – is therefore an inter, the inter that is at issue in sexual relation, but displaced, and precisely on account of being Alterposed.[7] It's curious that in positing this Other, what I have had to put forward today only concerns woman. Indeed, she is the one who gives us an illustration of this figure of the Other, an illustration that is within our reach, on account of being, as one poet wrote, between centre and absence.

Between the meaning that she takes on in what I have called the at-least-one, where she finds it only in the state of what I have announced – announced and no more – of being nothing but bare existence, what does between centre and absence become for her? It becomes this second bar that I have only been able to write by defining it as pas toute, not all. Not all is she who is not contained within the phallic function, without being its negation either. Her mode of presence is inter, between centre and absence. The centre is the phallic function of which she partakes singularly, on account of the at-least-one who is her partner in love renouncing this function for her. This allows her to leave the very thing whereby she does not partake of the phallic function in the absence that is no less jouissance, on account of being jouissabsence.

I think that no one will say that what I am stating of the phallic function arises from misrecognition of what is involved in feminine jouissance. On the contrary, it's that, within the portion that makes her pas toute, not all, open to the phallic function, the at-least-one is pressed to inhabit woman's jouissepresence, if I may put it like that, in a radical misinterpretation as to the requirement of its existence. It is due to this misinterpretation, which means that no longer can it even exist, that the exception of its very existence is ruled out and that this status of the Other – the fact of not being universal – vanishes. Man's misrecognition is necessitated by this, and this is the definition of the hysteric.

On this point, I take leave of you today.

8 March 1972

THE ONE: NEVER THE TWAIN SHALL REACH

IX

IN THE FIELD OF THE UNIAN

Parmenides, the One speaking
Yad'lun
Association is not free
Plato, Lacanian and feeble-minded Existence in Aristotle

Last time, I told you something that was focused on the Other. The Other is more accommodating than what I'm going to speak to you about today, and whose relation to the Other I have already characterized by saying that it is not inscribable, which doesn't make matters any easier.

What is at issue is the One.

1

I have already indicated how its trail was blazed in Plato's Parmenides.

The first step towards understanding something in it is to perceive that everything that is stated about the One – as dialectizable, as developing – in any possible discourse on the subject of the One, is first and foremost, if we take it only at this level, which is to say nothing else about it, that It is One.

Perhaps there are a certain number of you who, on my adjuring, have opened the book and noticed that to say One is is not the same thing. It is One is the first hypothesis, and One is is the second. They are distinct.

Naturally, for this to deliver, you need to read Plato with a little something that comes from you. For you, Plato should not be what he is, an author. Since your childhood you've been brought up to faire de l'auteur-stop, to thumb a read. Ever since this became the custom, you ought to know that this way of addressing whoever they might be, the authorized ones, hasn't led anywhere, even though it can, of course, lead you far.

With these observations out of the way, I am therefore going to speak to you today about the One, due to a reason for which I shall again have to apologize, because on what grounds should I be bothering you with this? Since I'm going to speak to you about the One, I've come up with a word that will serve as a heading for what I'm going to say about it.

I didn't invent the Unary. In 1962, I extracted the unary trait from Freud by translating what he calls einzig. At the time this struck a few people as a small miracle. It's rather curious that the einziger Zug, the second form of identification singled out by Freud, had never caught their attention until then. On the other hand, the word to which I will give a special distinction in what I'm going to tell you today is utterly new.

This word is designed to be something like a precaution, because in truth there are many things that have an interest in the One. Nevertheless, I'm going to open up something straightaway that locates the interest my discourse has in going via the One, to the extent that my discourse is itself the opening up of the analytic discourse. First of all, however, take if you will the field that is broadly designated as that of the Unian.

This is a word that has never been uttered, and which none the less holds the interest of prompting you to stay on your toes each time the One is at stake. Taking it thus, in an epithetic form, will call to mind for you what Freud promoted, and Plato before him, namely that it is in its nature to have various aspects. I think it will not escape your notice that this gets spoken about in analysis, if you recall how it presides over this strange assimilating of Eros to that which tends towards coagulation.

It is peculiar that Freud promotes the One on the pretext that the body is very obviously one of the forms of the One, that it holds together, that it's an individual, so long as there's no mishap. Truth be told, this is precisely what is called into question by the dyad of Eros and Thanatos that he puts forward. If this dyad were not supported by another figure, which is very precisely the figure in which sexual relation fails, namely the figure of the One and the not-One, namely nought, we would be hard-pressed to make out the function that this stupefying couple might hold. It's a fact that it has contributed to a number of misunderstandings, indeed to the indiscriminate censuring of the so-called death drive. It is certain, however, that in this unruly discourse, which was established by the attempt to make a statement about sexual relation, it is strictly impossible to consider the copulation of two bodies as becoming One alone.

In this regard it's quite extraordinary that, while scholars snigger at the Parmenides, Plato's Symposium should be taken seriously as representing anything whatsoever to do with love. Perhaps some of you still remember that I made use of the Symposium during the academic year that preceded the one I mentioned earlier. In 1960/61, I took the Symposium as my practice range, and I didn't consider doing anything else with it but to use it to ground transference. Until further notice, while perhaps there is something of the twain on the horizon of transference, it cannot be passed off as a copulation.

None the less, I think that, at the time, I did indicate the mode of derision in which the scene unfolds, which very strictly speaking is designated as Bacchic. Aristophanes is the one who comes up with the famous bipartition of a creature that, at the start, would purportedly have been the beast with two backs that cling tightly together, and which was cleft in twain by the jealousy of Zeus. The fact that this statement comes from his lips is enough to indicate that fun is being had, and good fun too. Most incredibly, it is not apparent that she who crowns the entire disquisition, she known as Diotima, plays no other role but this, because what she teaches is that love hinges solely on the fact that the beloved, whether homo or hetero, is not to be touched. All that matters is Uranian Aphrodite. This does not exactly amount to saying that the One rules over Eros.

In and of itself, this would already be a reason to put forward a few propositions on the One – propositions which have already been opened up elsewhere – were there not also the fact that in the analytic experience the first step is to introduce, analysts that we are, the One. We bid it to step inside, whereby the first mode of the manifestation of the One is clearly when the analysand reproaches you for being merely one among others, though without noticing it of course. What thereby becomes manifest is very precisely the fact that he has no doings with these others, and this is why he wants to be the only one for you, the analyst, so that this may form two.

He doesn't know that what is at issue is precisely for him to realize that the twain is the One he believes himself to be, and in this it is a matter of his being divided.

2

So, therefore, there's Oneness. This ought to be spelt – I'm not really in the mood for writing today, but well, why not – Yad'lun.[1]

Why not spell it like this? You're going to see that spelling it like this holds a certain interest which is not without justifying my earlier choice of Unian. Spelt like this, Yad'lun brings out something propitious in the French language.

I'm not sure whether the same advantage could be drawn from [the English-language] there is, or from es gibt. Those who have a good grasp of these languages will perhaps let me know. Es gibt commands the accusative, does it not? You say, es gibt einen something, when it's in the masculine. You can say [in English], there is one, or there is a something. I know they have there, which is already a beginning that lies on this side, but it's not a simple form. In French you can say y en a.

It's very odd that there is something that I haven't managed to track down. I haven't managed to locate the historical emergence of this wording, il y a, as major as it is, which means y en a. This doesn't mean it can't be found. But, well, in my hasty fashion – I know a little something about the function of haste in logic, I have to press on because time is pressing – I didn't manage. I nevertheless consulted the Littré, the Robert while I was at it, the Damourette and Pichon, and even a few others, everything that a dictionary like the Bloch and von Wartburg is meant to afford you.

It is against a backdrop of indeterminacy that there emerges what is designated and pointed out, strictly speaking, by the il y a, for which, curiously, I shall say n'y a pas, there's no common equivalent in what we call ancient languages. It is thereby shown that, as the Parmenides tells and demonstrates, discourse changes.

It is in precisely this respect that the analytic discourse can represent an emergence, and that perhaps you would do well to make something of it, should it be the case that after my passing – which in the eyes of many is always a present, if not imminent, eventuality – you can expect the veritable downpour of rubbish that is already looming large. Indeed, the reckoning is that it can't be far off. On the trail of my discourse, it might be better for those who could take up this blazing of it to draw some reassurance from it. Fortunately, in one very particular place I have a few presages of this, but they are few and far between.

People spend their time nagging me and banging my eardrums to find out what relation the analytic discourse bears to revolution. It might well be this discourse that carries the seed of any possible revolution, in that revolution should not be confused with the low spirits that can seize hold of you just like that at every turn under this heading. It's not quite the same thing.

So, y en a stands against the backdrop of something that is formless. When one says y en a, it usually means there is some or there are some. Once in a while, to il y a des you can even add des qui, some who. There are some who think, some who say, some who tell. Stuff like that. This remains a backdrop of indeterminacy. The question begins with what is meant by de l'Un, because as soon as l'Un is uttered, the de is merely a thin pedicle onto what is involved in the backdrop.

From where does this One emerge? This is very precisely what Plato tries to push forward in the first hypothesis by saying, as best he can, not having any other words at his disposal, εἰ ἓν ἔστιν, if One is.[2] Here, ἔστιν clearly has the function of making up for what is not accentuated to the extent it is in French with il y a. I can understand the misgiving that brings the translators to a standstill here. It should surely be translated either as if there is One, or if there is the One. This is for you to decide.

What is certain, however, is that Plato does choose, and that his One has nothing to do with what surrounds it. There is even something remarkable, which is that what he demonstrates right away is that this can bear no relation whatsoever to anything of what he has passed a thousand times through metaphysical recension, namely the dyad, inasmuch as it is everywhere in the experience of thought. The largest, the smallest. The youngest, the oldest. And so on and so forth. The inclusive, the included. And anything else of the sort you might care to add.

He begins very precisely by demonstrating what happens when the One is taken as the means of a discursive questioning. Who is being questioned? It's certainly not the poor kid, the dear lad, named Aristoteles if memory serves, whom it is hard to believe is the Aristotle who has left us his legacy.[3] It's quite clear that, as in any dialogue, any Platonic dialogue, there is no trace of an interlocutor. It only seems to be called a dialogue to illustrate what I've been stating for a long time, namely that there's no such thing as dialogue. This doesn't mean that at the bottom of the Platonic dialogue there isn't a very different presence from anything to be found in a great many other things that have been written since. Let's say it – this presence is a human presence

To vouch for this we need only turn to the first inroads, to the way in which what constitutes the core of the dialogue is prepared, which I shall call the entretien préliminaire, the preliminary consultation. As in all the dialogues, there is one who explains to us how this madcap thing has come about, which looks nothing like anything that might be called a dialogue. This is where you can really sense, if you didn't already know it from the commonplaces of life, that no one has ever seen a dialogue amount to anything. In this literature of a certain date, in what is called a dialogue, it's a matter of grasping what this real is that can give the illusion that you can get to something by dialoguing with someone. So, it's worthwhile preparing the thing. It's worthwhile saying which nutcase is involved.

It's old Parmenides, and his gang, who are there. It took nothing less than that for something to be uttered that gives voice to what exactly? Well, precisely, to the One. Furthermore, once you make the One speak, it's worth taking the trouble to look at what the other one is there for, the other one who holds the floor, and who can only come out with things like

– ταῦτα ἀνάγκη
– οὐ γὰρ οὖν
– τί δέ
– αληθή
– Oh my, it's yet three times truer than you were saying, is it not?

That's what dialogue is when the One is speaking.

What is curious is the way Parmenides introduces him. The One puts his arm round his shoulder and says to the dear lad, Off you go, dear little One, all this is mere gabbing. Don't go translating ἀδολεσχίας as the idea that it has to do with adolescents. I'm saying this for those who are not conversant, especially when, on the facing page, you are told that it's a matter of behaving like innocents, like striplings, so you could get confused. This is not what striplings are called in the Greek text. Ἀδολεσχίας means gabbing.[4] It may, however, be considered as the prefiguration of what in our coarse language, wrought by the phenomenology that was to hand at the time, has been translated as free association.

Naturally, association is not free. If it were free, it wouldn't hold any interest. But it's the same thing as gabbing. This is designed to tame the sparrow. Association is, of course, tethered. I can't see what interest it would hold if it were free. It's quite certain, there can be no doubt about this, that the gabbing in question does not come from someone who is speaking. It's the One. Here you can see to what extent it is tethered, because it's highly demonstrative.

Delineating things in this way allows us to situate a number of items, and in particular the step that is taken from Parmenides to Plato.

A step had already been taken by Parmenides in this circle where, all in all, it was a matter of knowing what is involved in the real. We are still there. After they said that it was air, water, earth, and fire, and that after this you had only to start over, there was someone who became aware that the only common factor in all the substance at issue was the fact of being utterable.

Plato's step is different, however. His step is to show that as soon as one tries to say things in an articulate way, what is sketched out in terms of structure creates a difficulty. This is how we put it in what I've just called our coarse language. The word structure is worth no more than the term free association. But what is sketched out creates a difficulty, and it is along this path that the real is to be sought. Εἰδος, which is improperly translated as form, is something that already promises us a pinpointing of what stands as a gaping hole in the fact of saying.

In other words, to say it all, Plato was Lacanian. Naturally, he couldn't know that. What is more, he was somewhat feeble-minded, which doesn't make matters easier, but which surely helped him. What I call feeble-mindedness is the fact of being a speaking being who is not solidly installed in a discourse. This is what sets the value of the feeble-minded. No other definition can be given of them, except to be what is called a little off beam, that is to say, afloat between two discourses. To be solidly installed as a subject, one has to stick to one discourse, or else to know what one is doing. Either way, just because someone is on the fringes, it doesn't mean that they know what they are saying.

In Plato's case, he did have frameworks. It shouldn't be thought that in his time things weren't held in a very solid discourse. A little something of this shows through somewhere in the preliminary consultations of the Parmenides. After all, Plato is the one who wrote it. We don't know whether or not he's having a laugh, but in the end, to give us the dialectic of the master and the slave, he didn't wait for Hegel.

I must say that what he sets out is of a different pitch from what is put forward by the whole of the Phänomenologie des Geistes. Not that he comes to a conclusion, but he lays down all the material elements. He moves forward. He can do so because in his time this was no affectation. One wonders whether it was better rather than worse to allow people to imagine, which is what is affirmed therein, that the masters and the slaves can switch at any moment. And, indeed, they did switch at any moment. When masters were taken prisoner, they were enslaved, and when slaves were manumitted, well, they became masters. Thanks to this, Plato imagines, and he says as much in the preliminaries to this dialogue, the Master-essence, the εἰδος, and that of the Slave, may be considered to have nothing to do with what is really at issue. Between master and slave there are relations that have nothing to do with the relation between the Master-essence and the Slave-essence.[5] It's in this respect that he's somewhat feeble-minded.

We have seen the big mingle happening, have we not? It is always brought about along a certain path and, curiously enough, people don't see the extent to which it portends what comes next. In this big mingle, we are brothers, one and all. There is an area of history like this, of historical myth. I mean myth to the extent that it is history. This was seen once, among the Jews. We know the purpose of fraternity among them. It gave us a great model. Fraternity exists so that one can sell one's brother,[6] which didn't fail to occur in the wake of each overthrow that was said to turn around the discourse of the master.

Consider all the great effort that Hegel goes to in the Phänomenologie – the fear of death, the struggle for pure prestige, and I tell you all this, and then some – whereby the essential thing to obtain is that there is a slave. But I ask, to all those who shiver at the thought of the changing of roles, what is it that can mean that, since the slave survives, there shouldn't ensue for him, immediately afterwards, his own struggle to the death for pure prestige, and the fear of death that changes camp?

All this only stands a chance of persisting on the condition that one should see very precisely what Plato dismisses. What Plato dismisses – but in the name of what we shall never know because, good heavens, one cannot fathom the depths of his heart, and it might be mere feeble-mindedness – is what is involved in what he calls μετέχειν, partaking. This is perhaps the finest opportunity to underscore this. The slave is only ever a slave through the essence of the master. I've been calling it essence, but call it what you like. I much prefer to write it S_1, the master signifier. As for the master, were it not for the S_2, the slave's knowledge, what would he make of it?

3

I'm tarrying to tell you what is important about this implausible thing, that there should be Oneness. This is the point to be delineated.

Indeed, as soon as you start to examine this One, it transforms like a thing coming apart. It becomes impossible to relate it to anything beyond the series of integers, which is none other than this One.

This arises only at the end of a long elaboration of discourse. In Frege's logic, the logic that is laid out in the Grundlagen der Arithmetik, you will see at once the insufficiency of any logical deduction of 1, because it has to pass via 0, which cannot be said to be 1, and yet everything unfolds in such a way that the entire arithmetic sequence proceeds from the fact that 1 is missing at the level of 0. Because already, from 0 to 1, that makes two. From this point forth, it will make three, because there will be 0, 1 and 2. And so on, right on up to the first of the Alephs, which, curiously enough, yet not without reason, can only be designated as Aleph-Nought.

Of course, this might strike you as lying in some scholarly remoteness, which is why it has to be embodied, and which is why I first put Yad'lun. Yad'lun! The following announcement cannot be overexclaimed, namely that a host of exclamation marks in its wake, that precisely the Aleph-Nought, will be just enough to sound out what might be involved, if you approach it sufficiently, in the astonishment warranted by the fact that there should be Oneness.

Someone in the audience lets out a loud sneeze – Ouille!

Oui! This does indeed warrant being greeted by this ouille, because we're speaking in the langue d'oïl, I mean hoc est ille.

Well, here, it's by grabbing the One at issue by the ears that y en a shows the backdrop from which it ex-sists. This backdrop hinges on the following, which is not self-evident, namely that, taking to begin with the first item within arm's reach, the one of feeble mind, you can then add one bout of flu, one drawer, one nose-thumbing, one puff of smoke, one hello from your Catherine, one civilization, and even one mismatched garter. That makes eight. However dispersed this shovel load might seem, they all come along in answer to the call, little ones, little ones! What is important – because I have to make things palpable for you otherwise than by using 0, 1 and Aleph, don't I? – is that this always presupposes the same One, the One that cannot be deduced, contrary to the smoke and mirrors that John Stuart Mill puts on for us simply by taking distinct things and holding them to be identical.

This is a mere something that is illustrated by the abacus, which furnishes the model thereof. However, the abacus was designed expressly for things to be counted, and, when the occasion presents, for eight dispersed things such as I have just conjured up for you to be counted. Yet what the abacus will not give you is what is deduced directly, without any abacus, from the One, namely that between these eight items, there are, because there are eight of them, twenty-eight combinations, taking them two at a time, and not one more. That's how it is due to the fact of the One.

Naturally, I hope you find this striking. You didn't know in advance that, since I've taken eight, it would make twenty-eight combinations, even though this is easy. The number of subsets of n elements in a set of m elements is effectively given by the following formula, where the exclamation mark notes the factorial, namely $m! = 1 \times 2 \times \ldots \times m$.[7]

$$\frac{m!}{n!(m-n)!}$$

This gives us 7 times 8, 56, divided by 2, equals 28. This numerical figure can be known, and this is what is at issue.

Had I put fewer of them it would have put you to work, telling me that perhaps I should also count the relations of each one to the set. Why am I not doing this? I will have to wait till next time to explain this to you. The relation that each one bears to the set precisely does not eliminate the fact of there being one set and that, due to this fact, this means that you are including one again. Indeed, this would lead, taking them two at a time, to a considerable rise in the number of combinations. At the level of the triangle, if I had simply noted three 1s for you, there would be just three combinations. If on the other hand you take the set as 1, then straightaway you have six combinations. What is at stake, however, is to realize that there is another dimension to the One, which I will try to illustrate for you next time with the arithmetical triangle.

In other words, the One does not, therefore, always carry the same meaning. For example, there is the meaning of the One of the empty set, which curiously enough in our numeration of elements would add two. I'm going to be demonstrating why and on what basis. Nevertheless, we are already approaching something that, in not being based at all on the One as all, shows us how, in its emergence, the One is not univocal. In other words, we are refreshing Plato's dialectic.

This is precisely how I can claim to lead you somewhere, by pursuing, through this bifidity of the One – we still have to see if it holds up – the One that Plato distinguishes so well from Being. Certainly Being is One, always and in every case, but in the Parmenides it is perfectly demonstrated that the One knows how to be as Being.[8] It is precisely from here that the function of existence arose, historically speaking. Just because the One is not, this doesn't mean that it doesn't pose the question.[9] Indeed, it poses it all the more given that, wherever it may be that existence has to be at stake, the question will always revolve around the One.

Aristotle only approaches this timidly, at the level of the particular propositions. He imagines that it's enough to say that some – just some, not all – are like this or like that, for them to be set apart. He imagines, for example, that if these ones here are not like that, then this is enough to ensure their existence. This is precisely how already, from its first emergence, existence is initiated straightaway, is stated, through its correlative inexistence. There is no existence except against the backdrop of inexistence, and inversely, ex-sistere only derives its support from an out there that is not.

It is indeed here that we have what is at issue in the One. For, in truth, from where does it arise? It arises from a point that Plato manages to circumscribe. It shouldn't be thought that this is – as it seems – merely a point in time. He calls it τὸ ἐξαίφνης. Translate that however you please.[10] It's the instant, the sudden, and it's the only point at which he can make it subsist. Goodness knows that the elucidation of the number has been pushed far enough to give us the idea that there are other Alephs besides the Aleph of the integers, and the said instant, the said point – which is what its true translation should be – is precisely what turns out to be decisive only at the level of a higher Aleph, at the level of the continuum.

The One seems, therefore, to get lost here, and to bring what is involved in existence to its culmination, to the extent of confining to existence as such, inasmuch as it arises from what it is most difficult to attain, from what is most elusive in the utterable. This is what led me to look up this ἐξαίφνης in Aristotle himself, noticing that actually there was an emergence of the term to exist in the Physics.

You can find it in Book IV, 222b. Aristotle defines it precisely as something that, τὸ ἀναισθήτῳ χρόνῳ, in a time that is imperceptible, διὰ μικρότητα, due to its smallness, is ἑκστάν.

I don't know whether the term ἑκστάν is uttered elsewhere in the literature of Antiquity, but it's clear that this is the past participle of the second aorist of ἵστημι, the aorist that is pronounced ἔστην. It's στάν, but I don't know if there is any verb ἐξίστημι. This will have to be checked. Be that as it may, the sistere is already here, to be stable, to be stable on the basis of an out there, ἑκστάν.

That which exists but through not being, this is what is at issue, and this is what I wanted to open up today under the general chapter heading of the Unian.

Pardon me, but I chose Unien [in French] because it's an anagram of ennui.

15 March 1972

X

YAD'LUN

From Plato to Cantor Set and element Impossible to denumerate
The empty set
The nad and the One of lack

$$\exists x.\overline{\Phi x} \qquad \overline{\exists x}.\overline{\Phi x}$$

$$\forall x.\Phi x \qquad \overline{\forall x}.\Phi x$$

I'm starting right away because I've been asked, due to overriding matters in this university, to finish early, much earlier than usual.

So, to tackle what has arisen in a framework that I hope will not be a too distant memory for you, I'm going to pick up the Yad'lun that I have already uttered.

For those who have parachuted in from afar, I will repeat what this means, because it doesn't sound very usual. Yad'lun seems to have come from goodness knows where, from the One, eh? This is not a usual mode of expression. Yet this is what I'm speaking about – of the One, y en a.

This is a mode of expression that I hope will turn out, at least for you, to be in agreement with something that is not new for everyone here. I know that some of the ears here have been informed, thank goodness, of the fields that it so happens I have had to draw on so as to square up to what is at issue in the psychoanalytic discourse. I'm going to explain to you in what respect this mode of expression shows itself to be in agreement with what has been produced historically in set theory. You've heard about this because this is how mathematics is nowadays taught in the sixth form. Of course, it's by no means sure that this has greatly improved understanding of it.

Between a theory that has writing as one of its mainsprings – not, of course, that set theory entails a univocal form of writing, but rather, as with many things in mathematics, it cannot be spelt out without writing – and the wording Yad'lun which I'm trying to bring across, there lies all the difference between that which is written and speech. This is a rift that it's not always easy to bridge.

Yet this is exactly what I try to do, when the occasion presents. And you ought immediately to be able to understand why.

1

I have written again on the blackboard the four formulae in which I try to define what makes up for what I have called the impossibility of writing what is involved in sexual relation. It is to the extent that two terms confront one another in the two upper formulae, one of which is There exists and the other There does not exist, that I have been trying to make the contribution that might usefully be carried in from set theory.

It's already quite striking that the fact that there should be Oneness has never been the subject of any astonishment. It might already be somewhat brisk to word it like that, because in the end some astonishment could be accredited to what I've been speaking about – and here I call upon you to astonish yourselves – namely the famed Parmenides by our cherished Plato, which I have been warmly encouraging you to familiarize yourselves with, and which is still so poorly read. In any case, I have been trying to read it in a way that is not altogether the accepted one.

It's altogether striking to see the degree to which the Parmenides puts the university discourse in a bind. All those who proffer things sagely in academic settings do so in a tremendously awkward way, as though it were a challenge, or a kind of purely gratuitous exercise, mere manoeuvring. The sequence of the eight hypotheses on the relations of the One and of Being remains problematic, an object of indignation. Some, of course, have distinguished themselves by showing its coherence, but this coherence appears on the whole to be gratuitous, and the confrontation between the interlocutors itself confirms the ahistorical character, so to speak, of the whole.[1]

Supposing that I might be able to put something forward on this point, I would say that what I find striking is really the exact opposite. If ever something has given me the idea that in Platonic dialogue there is some kind of initial foundation of a properly analytic discourse, I would say that the Parmenides is indeed the dialogue that would confirm this for me.

If you recall what I set down as a structure, you will note that it's no accident that the S_1 is to be found at the level of production in the analytic discourse. I admit that this might not be immediately apparent for you, and I ask you not to take it as self-evident, but it indicates the opportunity of focusing the ensuing part of our examination not on the numerical figure, but very precisely on the signifier One.

$$\frac{a}{S_2} \longrightarrow \frac{$}{S_1}$$

The discourse of the analyst

That there should be Oneness does not go without saying. It seems to go without saying because, for example, there are living beings, and each of you here, lined up in such orderly fashion, looks in every respect to be quite independent from the others and to constitute what in this day and age is called an organic reality, to hold together as an individual. It was here that an entire first philosophy derived a certain support.

At the level of Aristotelian logic, in applying the principle of the same specification of the x, of the man, of the being who is qualified among speakers as masculine, if we take the term There exists, then There exists at least one for whom Φx is not admissible as an assertion. Well, from this standpoint, the standpoint of the individual, we find ourselves before a position that is markedly contradictory. Aristotelian logic is grounded on the intuition of the individual that Aristotle posits as real. Aristotle tells us that, after all, it's not the idea of the horse that is real, it's the horse that is well and truly alive, about which we are compelled to ask ourselves precisely how the idea comes about, where we draw this idea from. Aristotle, not without peremptory arguments, turns upside down what Plato stated, namely that the horse is upheld by partaking in the idea of the horse, that what is most real is the idea of the horse.

If we position ourselves from the Aristotelian angle, it's clear that there is a contradiction between the statement that for all x, x fulfils in Φx the function of an argument, and the fact that there is some x that can fulfil the place of argument only in the enunciation that is the exact negation of the former. If we are told every horse is spirited, and if it is added that there are some, or at least one horse that is not, in Aristotelian logic this is a contradiction.

By putting forward the two terms on the right in my group of four terms – it's no accident that there are four – I'm daring to advance something that is plainly lacking in the aforesaid logic. I am able to do so to the extent that the term existence has quite certainly changed meaning since then. When what is at issue is the existence of a term that is capable of holding the place of an argument in a mathematically articulated function, this is not the same existence.

So far, nothing has performed a join between the Yad'lun as such and the at-least-one that is formulated by the notation of an inverted E, x. The latter, There exists an x, at-least-one, lends a value that can be qualified as true to what is posited as a function. There is a distance between this and natural existence, which I will not name otherwise today, for want of a better word. Natural existence is not limited to living organisms. For example, we can see these Ones in the celestial bodies, which were among the first to have received properly scientific attention, and not without reason, precisely for the affinity that they have with the One. They appear as though they were inscribing themselves in the heavens as elements that are all the more easily marked out as Ones given that they are punctiform. It's certain that they did a great deal to lay the accent on the point, as a form of passage. In the interval between the individual and what is involved in what I shall call the real One, the elements that are signified as punctiform have played an eminent role as far as their transition is concerned.

Is it not palpable for you – and surely this has caught your ear in passing – that I'm speaking about the One as a real, a real that may equally have nothing to do with any reality whatsoever?

I use the word reality for the reality of your existence, for example. This is a mode of support that is assuredly material, and first and foremost because it is corporeal. However, it's a matter of knowing what is being spoken of when one says Yad'lun. On the path along which science has been travelling, I mean the path it has been travelling since the great turning point when it started to trust in number as such, the Galilean turning point, it's clear that from this scientific perspective, the One that we can qualify as individual, and then something that is stated in the register of the logic of number, there is no real cause to wonder about the existence, about the logical support, that can be given to the unicorn, given that no animal is conceived of in a more appropriate manner than the unicorn itself. It is indeed from this perspective that one can say that what we call reality, natural reality, can invariably be taken, at the level of a certain discourse, as fantasy. I do not recoil from claiming that this discourse is the analytic discourse.

The analytic discourse is designed to remind us that the real I've been speaking about is accessed via the symbolic. We access this real in and through the impossible that is defined only by the symbolic. I'm coming back to this at the level of Pliny's Natural History. I don't see what differentiates the unicorn from any other animal that is perfectly existent in the natural order. The perspective that examines the real in a certain direction compels us to state matters in this way.

Even so, on no account am I speaking to you about anything that might resemble progress. What we have gained on the scientific plane, which is incontestable, absolutely does not increase our critical sense in matters of political life, for example. I have always stressed how what we gain on one side is lost on the other, in that there is a certain inherent limitation to what may be called the field of adequation in speaking beings.

Just because we have made some progress since Pliny regarding biology, this is not an absolute progress. Were a citizen of Rome to see how we live – unfortunately it's out of the question to conjure one up in person on this occasion – he would likely be overcome with horror. Since we can only envisage this on the basis of the ruins that this civilization has left behind, the idea we may form of it is to see, or to imagine, what the remains of our civilization will be like after a similar lapse of time, if this is supposable.

This is not to get you riled up, so to speak, over the matter of some confidence that I might have in science in particular. The analytic discourse is not a scientific discourse, but rather a discourse of which the material is provided by science, which is quite different.

The grasp that speaking beings have of the world is to conceive of it as something into which they have been immersed. This scheme already smacks of fantasy, does it not? It's quite clear, therefore, that this grasp will only increase to the extent that something is elaborated, and this is the use of number. I claim to be showing you here that this number boils down quite simply to Yad'lun.

So, we have to see what has enabled us, historically speaking, to know a little more about this Yad'lun than what Plato makes of it, by laying it out flat, so to speak, alongside what is involved in Being.

It's quite certain that this dialogue is extraordinarily suggestive and fruitful, and that if you would care to look into it closely, you will already find the prefiguration of my being able to state, on this basis, on the theme of set theory, that Yad'lun.

2

Simply begin if you will with the statement of the first hypothesis – if the One. It should be taken for its signification – if the One is one.[2]

What will we be able to make of this? The first thing that Plato sets down by way of objection is that this One will not be anywhere,[3] because if it were somewhere, it would be in an envelope,[4] in a limit,[5] and this is quite in contradiction with its existence of One.

(Protests from the audience). What's the matter? Am I speaking quietly? Too bad, that's how it is today. I can doubtless do no better.

The One was able to be developed in its existence of One in the way that is grounded by Mengenlehre. This has been translated into French, not unprofitably, as la théorie des ensembles, but certainly with an accentuation that does not correspond entirely to the meaning of the original term in German, which, from the standpoint of what we're aiming at is no better. This set theory only came on the scene late in the day, and only came about at all by virtue of the entire history of mathematics itself. Of course, there is no question of my tracing out even the briefest of synopses, but, in this history, one needs to take into account the following, which has taken on its full accentuation, its full scope, namely what I might call the extravagances of number.

Clearly this began very early on, because already in Plato's time irrational numbers were posing a problem. It turned out that he inherited – Plato sets out all these developments for us in the Theaetetus – the Pythagorean scandal of the irrational character of the diagonal of a square, the scandal being that you never get to the end of it. This can be demonstrated in a figure. It was the most favourable thing there was in that era by which to bring to light the existence of what I am calling numerical extravagance. I mean, something that moves out of the field of the One.

What came next? In Archimedes' method known as exhaustion there is something that we may consider to be the avoidance of what came along so many centuries afterwards in the form of the paradoxes of infinitesimal calculus, in the form of the statement of what is called the infinitesimally small. This is something that takes a very long time to work through, by positing some finite quantity about which it is said that, either way, a certain mode of operating will reach a yet smaller quantity. At the end of the day, this amounts to saying that one makes use of the finite in order to define a transfinite.

And then, my word, one cannot fail to mention the appearance of Fourier's trigonometric series, which certainly poses all sorts of problems for theoretical foundation. All of this is conjugated with the reduction to the perfectly finitist principles of the calculus that was called infinitesimal, which was being pursued at the same time, Cauchy being the great representative.

I am giving this extremely brisk reminder simply to date what is meant by the resumption in Cantor's writings of what the status of the One amounts to. From the moment it becomes a matter of grounding it, the status of the One can only start off from its ambiguity, namely that the mainspring of set theory hinges entirely on how the One – that there is – of the set is distinct from the One of the element.

The notion of set leans on the fact that there is a set even with just one element. This is not the usual way of putting it, but what is particular to speech is that it advances clumsily. Besides, opening any old exposé of set theory is enough to put your finger on what this entails, namely that if the element posited as fundamental to a set is this something that the very notion of the set allows us to posit as an empty set, well, this means that the element is perfectly admissible. A set can have the empty set as its constituent element, and in this capacity it is absolutely equivalent to what is conventionally called a singleton, not to announce straightaway the card of the numerical figure 1. This is so in a perfectly well-founded fashion, for the good reason that we can define the numerical figure 1 only by taking the class of all the sets that are of one single element, and by highlighting their equivalence as what constitutes the grounding of the One properly speaking.

Thus, set theory is designed to restore the status of number. What proves that it does indeed restore it, within the perspective that I have been laying out, is that, setting out as it does the grounding of the One, and making number lean on this as a class of equivalence, set theory thereby manages to highlight what it calls the non-denumerable, which is very straightforward, as you are about to see. It's readily accessible, but to translate it into my vocabulary, I call it, not the non-denumerable – an object that I would unhesitatingly qualify as mythical – but the impossible to denumerate.

I apologize for not being able to give an illustration directly on the blackboard of how it is crafted, but then, after all, what's stopping those of you who are interested from opening a simple handbook called Naive Set Theory? You will see that through the Diagonal Method one can be led to put one's finger on how there is a means of laying out the sequence of integers in a series of different ways. In truth, one can lay out this sequence in umpteen thousand different ways. It will be immediately accessible to show that, irrespective of how you might have ordered it, simply by changing each time the values on the diagonal in keeping with a rule determined in advance, there will be yet another way of denumerating them.

It is very precisely in this that the real attached to the One consists.

3

If I am indeed able today to push the demonstration of this fairly far, within the time to which I promised I would limit myself, I am nevertheless going to accentuate now what is entailed by this ambiguity that lies at the foundation of the One as such.

Contrary to appearances, this ambiguity hinges precisely on the fact that the One cannot be grounded on sameness. On the contrary, it has been marked out, by set theory, as having to be grounded on pure and simple difference.

What governs the grounding of set theory consists in the following. Let's say, to go straight to the basics, that when you note down three elements, each separated by a comma – so, there are two commas – if one of these elements appears to be in any way the same as another, or if it can be united to it by any sign of equality, then it is purely and simply all-at-one with it. On the first level of assembly that constitutes set theory lies the Axiom of Extensionality, which means that, here at the outset, it cannot be a matter of the same. It is a matter of knowing at what point in this construction sameness emerges.

Not only does sameness emerge as a latecomer in this construction, and, if I may say so, on one of its edges, but I may also assert that this sameness as such is counted in number, and therefore the emergence of the One, inasmuch as it may be qualified as the same, only emerges in an exponential way, so to speak. I mean that, as soon as the One that is at issue is none other than this Aleph-Nought – which symbolizes the cardinal of the numerical infinite, this infinity that Cantor calls improper[6] and which is made up of elements of what constitutes the first proper infinite, namely the $\aleph_0$ in question – in the course of constructing this $\aleph_0$ there appears the construction of the same, and this same is itself counted as an element in the construction.

It is in this respect that it is, let's say, inadequate in the Platonic dialogue to make anything whatsoever of the existent participate in the realm of the like-for-like. Without the crossing-through whereby the One is initially constituted, the notion of like-for-like would not appear in any way whatsoever.

This is what we are going to see. If we don't see it here today, because I've been limited to a quarter of an hour less than I usually have, I will pursue this elsewhere. Indeed, why not at the forthcoming Thursday appointment at Sainte-Anne, because a certain number of you here know the route? Nevertheless, what I do want to stress is what results from this point of departure of set theory and from what I will call, why not, the Cantorization of number.

This is what is at issue. To ground cardinality in any way, there are no other paths but those of what is called the one-to-one mapping of one set onto another. When they want to illustrate this, they find no better, nothing else, but alternatively to evoke goodness knows what primitive potlatch ritual, where the prevailing competitor will emerge to be established at least temporarily as leader, or more straightforwardly the table-laying of the headwaiter, who matches each of the elements of a set of knives with a set of forks. Whether it's a matter of herds that each of the two competing chieftains send across a certain brink, or the headwaiter counting out his cutlery, what will appear? Well, it appears that the One begins on the level at which there is one missing.

The empty set is, therefore, strictly legitimized in that it is, so to speak, the gate that has to be gone through in order to constitute the birth of the One. This is the first One that is designated through an admissible experience. I mean mathematically admissible, in a way that can be taught, because this is what matheme means, and not one that appeals to any kind of coarse figuration. What constitutes the One and very precisely justifies it, which is designated only as distinct, and not through any other qualificative ascertainment, is that it only begins with its lack.

This is indeed what becomes apparent to us in the reproduction of Pascal's triangle that I have given here, namely the necessity of distinguishing each of these rows. I think you've known for a little while now how they are constituted. Each row is made by adding what stands above to what is in the same row, which is then notated to its right. Each of the rows is constituted as follows –

1	{1}	{1}	{1}	{1}	{1}
	1	2	3	4	5
		1	3	6	10
			1	4	10
				1	5
					1

What is important is to notice what each of the rows designates.

In Book VII of his Elements, lines α΄ and β΄, Euclid defines the monad thus – Μονάς ἐστιν, καθ' ἣν ἕκαστον τῶν ὄντων ἓν λέγεται. Ἀριθμὸς δὲ τὸ ἐκ μονάδων συγκείμενον πλῆθος. The monad is that by which each entity may be said to be one, and number, ἀριθμὸς, is very precisely this multiplicity composed of monads. This definition sets out the error, the lack of grounding.

Pascal's triangle is not here just for the sake of it. It is here to figure what are called in set theory, not the elements, but the parts of these sets.[7] At the level of the parts, the parts of a set laid out monadically are the second row. The monad is second. What shall we call the first row, the row that is, in sum, constituted of this empty set, the crossing of which is precisely what constitutes the One? Why not make use of the echo that Spanish gives us, and call it the nad? What is at issue here in the One that repeats across the first row is very specifically the nad, namely the entrance porthole that is designated by lack.

On the basis of what is involved in the place where a hole is made, in this something that, if you want a figuration, I would represent as being the foundation of Yad'lun, there can only be Oneness in the figure of a bag, which is a bag with a hole in it. Nothing is One that doesn't come out of this bag, or which does not go back into the bag. This is the original grounding, to take it intuitively, of the One.

Given what I've promised, I can't push what I have brought any further today, and this I regret. Let me tell you simply that we are going to be examining the most straightforward figure, which I have already designated, namely the triad in which the parts, the subsets formed of the parts of the set, can be figured in a way that is satisfactory for us, then to move back up to the level of the dyad, and to the level of the monad.

You will see that by examining these primal numbers – not prime numbers – a difficulty will arise. I hope that the fact that this is a figurative difficulty will not prevent us from understanding what the essence of the One is, and from seeing what is involved in its grounding.

19 April 1972

XI

AN ISSUE OF ONES

A TALK AT SAINTE-ANNE

The twain, the structure of real sex
The One, an effect of lack Disputing the non-denumerable
Equivalence between the element and the empty set
The two levels of the One

It's a funny old way to spend one's time, but in the end, why not? It so happens that over the weekends I sometimes write to you. In a manner of speaking. I write because I know we're going to see each other during the week. So, last weekend, I wrote to you. Naturally, in the meantime, I had all the time it took to forget this piece of writing. I've just reread it over dinner, a hurried dinner so that I could be here on time. I'm going to begin with this. It's a bit difficult, so perhaps you will take notes. Afterwards I'll say the things that I've thought since then, with you more really in mind.

I wrote the following – which, of course, I would never submit for poubellication, I don't see why I should swell the contents of libraries – There are two horizons of the signifier. Then, I've put a curly bracket. Since it's written, you'll have to pay attention. I mean that you mustn't believe you comprehend. After the bracket, there is the maternal, which is also the material, and then there is written, the mathematical.

I know I will have to, but, in the end, I can't start speaking straightaway. Were it not for this, I would never read you what I have written. Perhaps in the next part I will have to come back to this distinction, which I am underscoring as a horizon.

Articulating them as such in each of these two horizons – this is a parenthesis, I haven't written this – is therefore – this I have written – to proceed in accordance with these two horizons themselves, because any mention of their beyond . . . beyond the horizon . . . is supported only by their position . . . when this starts to bore you, let me know and I'll tell you the items that I have to tell you this evening . . . by their position in a de facto discourse. For the analytic discourse, this de facto implicates me sufficiently in its effects for it to be said that this is my fait, my doing, for it to be designated by my name. The amur . . . – what I have designated as such here – . . . reverberates this diversely with the available means of what is rightly called le bord, the rim, of this bord-homme.[1] This bord-homme inspired me to write brrom-brrom-wap-wap. This was the discovery of a person who in times gone by mothered my children. It's an indication concerning l'a-voix, th'a-voice, which, as everyone knows, aboie, barks, and also l'a-regard, th'a-gaze, not to take so close a-look, and l'a-t'suce, a-stutely licking you into shape, and then l'a-merde as well, th'a-crap that from time to time forms the somewhat injurious graffito directed at my name on the pages of newspapers. In short, c'est l'a-vie! As somebody who is having fun for the moment would say, it's cheerful. In the main, this is true.

These effects have nothing to do with the dimension that is measured against my doing. This is to say that it is from a discourse that is not my own that I make the necessary dimension. It is from the analytic discourse, which, not yet having been . . . – and for good reason – . . . properly instituted, finds itself in need of a few facilitations, to which I employ myself. On the basis of what? Solely on the basis that, in fact, my position is determined by it.

Let's speak, now, about this discourse and about the fact that the position of the signifier as such is essential to it. Given the audience that you constitute, I would like to make a remark. This position of the signifier takes shape in an experience, which is within reach of every one of you, so that you may see what's at issue and how essential it is.

When you speak a language imperfectly, and you read a text, well, you comprehend, you still comprehend. This ought to put you a little on alert. You comprehend in the sense that you know in advance what is being said in it. Of course, this can result in the text contradicting itself. When you read, for instance, a text on set theory, the text explains what constitutes the infinite set of all integers. On the next line, you are told something that you comprehend, because you keep reading – It would, however, be a fundamental mistake to deem this set infinite because the integers . . . increase infinitely. Since it's just been explained to you that this is the reason that it is so, this gives you a start. When you take a closer look, however, you find the term deem. In other words, this is not the reason why you should deem it so, because they know that the series of integers doesn't stop, that it is infinite. It's not that the series is indefinite.

You realize that either you've skipped over deem, or you're not sufficiently familiar with English, and therefore you have comprehended too quickly, that is, you have skipped over this essential element, the element of a signifier that makes this change of level possible, this change of level that, for a moment, gave you the sense of a contradiction.

One should never skip a signifier. It's to the extent that the signifier doesn't halt you that you comprehend. Now – comprehending always amounts to being comprehended oneself within the effects of discourse, a discourse that, as such, gives an order to the effects of knowledge that have already been precipitated through the formalism of the signifier alone. What psychoanalysis teaches us is that any naïve knowledge . . . this is written, which is why I'm reading again . . . is associated with a veiling of the jouissance that is realized therein, and poses the question as to what is betrayed therein of the limits of power, that is to say – what? – of the tracé, the layout, imposed on jouissance.

As soon as we speak – this is a fact – we suppose something of what is spoken, this something that we imagine as having been pre-posited, even though it is quite sure that we only ever suppose it after the event. That which speaks . . . – whatever it is – . . . is that which derives jouissance from the self as a body. The fact of speaking . . . – in the current state of our knowledge – . . . refers only to this. It derives jouissance from a body that it experiences as tuable, that is, as a body that it can address in the tu form and a body to which it can say tue-toi, kill yourself, in the same line. What is psychoanalysis? It is the tracking of what is comprehended by way of obfuscation, of what is obfuscated in comprehension, due to the fact of a signifier that has marked a point of the body.

Psychoanalysis is what reproduces . . . – here you will find the usual guardrails – . . . a production of neurosis. Everyone agrees on this point. There is not a single psychoanalyst who has not perceived this. This neurosis that is attributed, not unreasonably, to the action of the parents can be reached only to the extent that the action of the parents is articulated precisely . . . – this is the term with which I started the third line – . . . from the position of the psychoanalyst. To the extent that neurosis converges towards a signifier that emerges from it, neurosis will take on an order in accordance with the discourse whose effects produced the subject. Every traumatic parent is, in sum, in the same position as the psychoanalyst. The difference is that the psychoanalyst, from his position, reproduces the neurosis, whereas the traumatic parent produces it innocently.

What is at issue is to reproduce it – this signifier – on the basis of whatever its initial flowering had been. All in all, the operation of the analytic discourse is to fashion a model of the neurosis. Why? Well, to the extent that it takes out the rib of jouissance. Indeed, jouissance demands this special privilege. There are not two ways of doing this for each subject. Every reduplication kills jouissance. Jouissance only survives in that its repetition is of no avail, that is to say, it is always the same. It is the introduction of the model that completes it – this repetition of no avail. A completed repetition dissolves it, in that it is a simplified repetition.

Of course, when I speak of Yad'lun, I am still speaking of the signifier. To lay out this d'lun in keeping with the extent of its empire, because it assuredly is the master signifier, it has to be approached right where it has been left to its talents, so as to box it into a corner.

There you have it for what renders the point I have got to this year useful as an incidence, having no choice but this, . . . or worse. This incidence is the mathematical reference, so called because it is the realm in which the matheme governs, that is to say, that which produces a knowledge that, being merely a product, is bound to the norms of surplus jouissance, that is, of the measurable. A matheme is that which alone is taught, and strictly so. No teaching but of the One. We still have to find out what is at issue. And this is why I am examining it this year.

I'm not going to read any further. The text is rather difficult, but I think I've read it slowly enough for a few questions to be left hanging regarding each of the terms I have spelt out. I will now speak more freely.

The other day, as I was leaving the latest session up at the Panthéon, someone questioned me – he might be here again – on the subject of whether I believed in freedom. I told him he was being funny. And then, as I am always fairly weary, I broke off. But this doesn't mean I wouldn't be prepared to confide in him personally on this matter. The fact is, I seldom speak about freedom, and so this question was his initiative. Knowing why he asked me this would not be unwelcome to me.

So, what I would like more freely to say is that, in alluding in my written text to how I find myself in the position of facilitating the analytic discourse, clearly I consider it to constitute, at least potentially, this sort of structure that I have been designating with the term discourse. Through discourse, which is the pure and simple effect of language, a social bond is precipitated. Yet this was noticed without any need of psychoanalysis. This is even what is conventionally known as ideology.

The way in which a discourse takes on order in such a way as to precipitate a social bond entails, conversely, that everything that is articulated within it takes on an order through its effects. It is indeed in this way that I understand what I have been articulating for you about the discourse of psychoanalysis. Were there no psychoanalytic practice, what I might articulate thereof wouldn't have effects that I might anticipate. I didn't say, wouldn't have meaning. What is particular to meaning is that it is always confusional, that is, it believes it forms a bridge between one discourse – in so far as a social bond is precipitated therein – and what, in another realm, stems from another discourse.

What is annoying is that whenever you proceed – since I have just said in this written text that it is a question of proceeding – that is, whenever you target, from one discourse, what holds the function of the One within it, what am I doing in such an instance? If you will allow me the following neologism, I am engaging in henology.[2] Given what I have been articulating, anyone could turn it into an ontology, in keeping with what he presupposes beyond these two horizons that I have marked out as being defined as the horizons of the signifier.

In the university discourse, one may set oneself to drawing the model from my construction by presupposing, at some arbitrary point, goodness knows what essence that would become – though who knows why? – the supreme value. This is particularly conducive to what is offered to the university discourse, in which what is at issue, according to the diagram I have designed for it, is to put S_2 at the place of semblance.

$$\frac{S_2}{S_1} \longrightarrow \frac{a}{$}$$

University discourse

Before a signifier is truly put in its place, that is, picked out by the ideology for which it has been produced, it always has effects of circulation. In these effects, signification precedes the acknowledgement of its place, its instituting place. The very nature of teaching gives confirmation of the fact that the university discourse is defined by knowledge being put in the position of semblance. What can we see there? It is a false ordering of what has fanned out, so to speak,[3] over the course of the centuries by way of diverse ontologies. Its summit, its culmination, is what is gloriously termed the history of philosophy, as though philosophy didn't have its remit – and this has been amply demonstrated – in the adventures and misadventures of the discourse of the master, which does indeed need to be overhauled once in a while. The cause of philosophy's shimmerings lies elsewhere, as has been affirmed sufficiently on the basis of points from which the notion of ideology has emerged, as though the cause at stake did not lie elsewhere. What is difficult, however, is that any process of articulating a discourse, above all if it has not yet been ascertained, offers a pretext for a certain number of new beings to swell up prematurely.

I know full well that none of this is easy, and that I shall have to tell you some more amusing things, in the fine tradition of what I have been doing here. So, let's speak about the analyst and love.

People speak about love in analysis. And, of course, this is due to the position of the analyst. All things considered, people don't speak about it any more here than elsewhere since, after all, this is what love is for. This is not what is most gratifying, but in the end, in mundane terms people speak about it a great deal. It is even tremendous that people still go on about it after all this time, because they might have noticed, after all this time, that this hasn't made it any the more successful. It's clear, therefore, that it's by speaking that one makes love. So, what is the role of the analyst in this? Can an analysis really make a loving relationship successful? I have to tell you that, as far as I'm concerned, I have no such example. And yet I did try. For me, not having quite come down in the last shower, this was a challenge.

I once took on someone on the basis of a request, though thank goodness I knew beforehand that he was in need of a psychoanalysis – you realize the dirty tricks I'm capable of pulling to verify my affirmations – the request being that he should at any cost obtain conjugo with the lady on whom he had set his heart. Naturally, of course, this failed – thank the Lord – and very quickly too. I do hope he's not here. I'm almost certain he isn't.

Let's put an end to this, because all this is anecdotal. One day, when luck is going my way, and I venture to do a little La Bruyère, I'll deal with the question of the relations between love and semblance. But this is not where we are this evening. There's to be no lingering over these knick-knacks. It's rather a matter – I'm returning to this because it seems to me that I did open this up – of knowing what the relation is between everything that I've been restating, which I'm recalling by briefly touching on the truths of experience, and the function of sex in psychoanalysis.

I think that on this score I have even got through to the tin ears with a statement that deserves to be commented on – that there is no such thing as sexual relation. Of course, this deserves to be spelt out.

Why does the psychoanalyst imagine that sex forms the base of his reference? That sex is real is not to be doubted in the slightest. Its very structure is the dual, the number duo. Whatever one may think, there are two of them. Men. Women. So they say. And they insist on adding Auvergnats.[4] That's an error. At the level of the real, there are no Auvergnats.

What is at issue when sex is involved is the other, the other sex, even when one prefers the same. Just because I said a moment ago that the aid psychoanalysis can bring is precarious when it comes to the success of a loving relationship, it shouldn't be thought that the psychoanalyst doesn't give a stuff, if I can put it like that. The psychoanalyst cannot be indifferent to the fact that the partner in question is of the other sex, and that what is in play is something that bears a relation to his or her jouissance – I'm speaking of the other, the third party, about whom this gab around love is voiced – because the one that is not there is, for the analyst, the real.

This jouissance, the jouissance that is not in analysis, if you will allow me to put it like this, holds the function of the real for the analyst. On the other hand, what is in analysis, that is to say, the subject, the analyst takes for what it is, namely for an effect of discourse. I ask you to note in passing that he doesn't subjectify it. This doesn't mean that all this is his own little idea, but rather that, as a subject, he is determined by a discourse from which he has long originated, and this is what is analysable.

I will specify that the analyst is on no account a nominalist. He does not think of his subject's representations. Rather, he has to intervene in his discourse by procuring for him un supplément de signifiant, an additional signifier. This is what is called interpretation. When it comes to what is not within his reach, which is what is in question here, namely the jouissance of the one who is not there in analysis, he takes it for what it is, that is, of the order of the real, because he can do nothing about it.

No one has ever dared, not even Bishop Berkeley, to state that sex, as real – I mean as dual, I mean that there are two of them – was a little idea that each person had in their head, that it was a representation. It is highly instructive that no one in the entire history of philosophy has ever ventured to extend idealism this far.

For a while now we have been able to see what sex is under the microscope. I'm not talking about sexual organs. I'm talking about gametes. Can you imagine that they had nothing of this prior to Leeuwenhoek and Swammerdam? They were reduced to thinking that sex was everywhere. Nature, voῦς, the whole racket, all that was sex. And the female vultures made love with the wind. From the pretext that, long before it was known that there are two kinds of gamete, we have known for certain that sex is to be found in two small cells that do not resemble one another, psychoanalysts believe that there is such a thing as sexual relation. We have been seeing psychoanalysts, in their literature, in an area that cannot be said to be highly controlled, find in the intrusion of the male gamete – of the spermato, as they say, and then the zoon – through the girdle of the ovum, the model of goodness knows what formidable breach. As though there were the faintest relation between this reference – which doesn't bear the slightest relation to what is involved in copulation, except through the coarsest of metaphors – and anything whatsoever that might be referred to what is in play in love relations, which, as I said at the start, amounts to a great many words.

The whole question lies here, and it is indeed here that the evolution of the forms of discourse is far more indicative for us of what is at issue. What are at issue are effects of discourse, even if it is quite sure that the sexes are twain. This is far more indicative of what is at issue than any reference to what remains entirely in abeyance, namely whether what discourse is capable of articulating comprehends, or not, sexual relation. This is what deserves to be called into question.

The small items I have already written up on the blackboard for you include an opposition between $\exists x$ and $\overline{\exists x}$, between a There exists and a There exists not, on the same level of it is not true that Φx. Then, there is another level, that of all x complies with the function Φx, and of pas tout, not all – which is a new form, in the right-hand column – and nothing more, is apt to satisfy the phallic function.

As I shall strive to explicate in the forthcoming lessons of my Seminar, that is, somewhere else, what deserves to be pointed out is a series of gaps which are diverse, which are not the same in each case, between each of these points, the four points stated above, in order to give its rightful status to what is involved in sexual relation at the level of the subject.

This shows well enough to what extent language traces out, in its very grammar, the said subject-effects. It intersects sufficiently with what was first discovered in logic for us to be able, now, to set about hearing a signifier, as I have been doing since these reminders that I have been issuing, so that I might try to give it a meaning. For this is the only case, and rightly so, in which the term meaning is justified when stating Yad'lun, because there is one thing that must nevertheless be apparent to you, which is that if there is no relation, then each of the two remains One.

What is incredible is that, whereas psychoanalysts' mythology has been condemned, more or less justifiably, oddly enough the mythology that people have failed to condemn is precisely the one that lies closest to hand. When the gametes conjoin, this does not result in their fusion. Before this can come about, there has to be a severe elimination, known as meiosis. The newly formed One is made from what we may call, quite rightly, I won't say the debris of chacun d'eux, the debris of each of them, but a chacun deux, an each twain, that has extruded a certain amount of debris.

From the pen of Freud we find the idea that Eros se fonde – in the subjunctive, you can see the equivoque between fonder and fondre, I don't see why I shouldn't exploit the French language[5] – that Eros should be founded by making One from two. Clearly this is a strange idea from which there stems, of course, the absolutely exorbitant idea that is embodied in the sermonizing that dear Freud nevertheless abhorred with all his being. He expresses in the plainest terms, in The Future of an Illusion, and in many other places besides, in Civilization and Its Discontents, his repugnance at the idea of universal love. And yet the founding force of life, of the life instinct, as he puts it, would fall squarely into the Eros that is purportedly behind the principle of union. It is not only for didactic reasons that I would like to furnish you, on the subject of the One, with what can be used to fight back against this coarse mythology, aside from the fact that it might enable us to exorcize not only Eros – I mean the Eros of Freudian doctrine – but dear Thanatos too, which people have been boring us with for quite long enough.

At this juncture it is not unhelpful to make use of something that came to light some time ago, and not by chance. I have already introduced – I introduced it last time – an account of what has been identified as la théorie des ensembles, set theory. Men and women – we can laugh a little as well – are also ensemble, together. This doesn't stop them from being each on their own side. It's a matter of knowing whether we might be able to draw some light from the ensemble – from a set, of course, which was never designed for this – to shed on the Yad'lun. So, since I too release trial balloons, I propose simply to try to see with you what in all this might be of service, not as an illustration, for it's about something quite different. It's about what the signifier has to do with the One.

The One didn't come on the scene just yesterday. But, even so, it arose with regard to two quite different things, with regard to a certain use of instruments of measure, and at the same time something that bore absolutely no relation to this, namely the function of the individual.

The individual, this is in Aristotle. Aristotle was struck by these beings that reproduce, always the same ones. This had already struck someone else, a certain Plato. Actually, I think that this was because he didn't have anything better to offer by which to give us an idea of form. He managed to state that form is real. He did indeed have to illustrate his idea of Idea as best he could. The other fellow, of course, remarked that, even so, form is all very nice, but what singles it out is simply that form is what we recognize in a certain number of individuals that resemble one another.

Here we find ourselves sliding off down various metaphysical slopes. This is of no degree of interest to us when it comes to illustrating the One, whether by the individual or by a certain practical usage of geometry. Irrespective of the developments that you might be able to add to this geometry, considering the proportions of the manifest difference between the length of a stake and the length of its shadow, it's been a good while since we first noticed that the One poses other problems, and this is for the simple fact that mathematics has progressed somewhat. I'm not going to go back over what I stated last time, about differential calculus, about the various trigonometric series, and in a more comprehensive way about the conception of number as defined by a sequence. What appears very clearly is that the question of what is involved in Oneness is posed altogether differently there, because a sequence is typified as being composed in the same way as the sequence of integers. It's a matter of accounting for what an integer is.

I am not, of course, going to lay out for you the theory of sets. I want simply to point out that we first had to wait until rather late in the day, the end of the last century, not even a hundred years ago, before there was an attempt to account for the function of the One. It is remarkable that the set should be defined in such a way that its first apparent aspect should be that of the empty set, and that, on the other hand, this constitutes a set, namely that of which the said empty set is the only element. This makes a set with one element. This is where we begin. Last time – I'm saying this for those who weren't up at the Panthéon when I started to tackle this slippery subject – I underscored how the grounding of the One turns out, by virtue of this fact, to be strictly constituted by the place of a lack.

I referred to pedagogical use in order to give a broad illustration of what it is a matter of getting across in set theory, in order to give you a sense of how this theory has no other direct object besides that of making it apparent how the specific notion of cardinal number can be generated through one-to-one correspondence. The illustration I used was that, at the moment at which, in the two compared series, a mate is missing, the notion of the One arises. There is one missing.

Everything that is said about the cardinal number stems from the fact that, if the sequence of numbers always necessarily entails one, and only one, successor, and provided that what is at issue in cardinality is realized in the order of number, then this is strictly the cardinal sequence in that, by starting from zero, it extends up to the number that immediately precedes the successor. By stating it thus, in an extempore manner, I have made a small mistake, which is to speak of a sequence as though it were already well-ordered. Take from this the following, which I didn't assert – it's simply that each number corresponds cardinally to the cardinal that precedes it by adding to it the empty set.

What is important in what I would like to give you a sense of this evening is that while the One arises as the effect of lack, taking the sets into consideration lends itself to something that I believe worthy of mention, and which I would like to highlight, in reference to how set theory has enabled us to distinguish two types of set. It has enabled us to admit the finite set and the infinite set. In this statement, what typifies the infinite set is that it can be posited as equivalent to any one of its subsets. As had already been remarked by Galileo, who didn't have to wait for Cantor for this, the sequence of all the square numbers is in one-to-one correspondence with each of the integers. Indeed, there is no reason ever to consider any of the square numbers to be too large to be in the sequence of the integers. This is what constitutes the infinite set, whereby it is said that it can be reflexive. On the other hand, the chief property of the finite set is that it is conducive to the specifically mathematical reasoning, which makes use of it, known as induction. Induction is admissible when a set is finite.

What I would like to say is that there is a point in set theory that I deem problematic. This point stems from what is called the non-denumerability of the parts – to be understood as the subsets – such as they can be defined on the basis of a set.

This is quite straightforward if you start off from the cardinal number. For example, you have one set composed of five elements. You call subset the subsuming of each of these five elements into a set. Next, taking the groupings that are formed by two out of these five elements, it will be easy for you to calculate how many subsets this makes. There will be exactly ten. Then you can take them three at a time. There will again be ten of them. Then take them four at a time. There will be five. In the end, you get to the set of which there is only one, the present set, containing five elements. To this should be added the empty set, which, in any case, without being an element of the set, can be indicated as one of its parts. The parts are not an element.

The ordering can be written as follows.

1

5

10

10

5

1

What have we written down as parts of the set? The empty set is here. The five elements, α, β, γ, δ, and ε, for example, are here. What comes next is $\alpha\beta$, $\alpha\gamma$, $\alpha\delta$, $\alpha\varepsilon$. You can do the same starting with β. You can do the same with γ, and so on. You will see that there are ten. Next, here, you have $\alpha\beta\gamma\delta$, with ε missing. By missing out each of these five letters, you can obtain the number 5 that is necessary for the grouping as parts of elements.

1	$\varnothing$
5	$\alpha, \beta, \gamma, \delta, \varepsilon$
10	$\alpha\beta, \alpha\gamma, \alpha\delta, \alpha\varepsilon, \beta\gamma, \beta\delta, \beta\varepsilon, \gamma\delta, \gamma\varepsilon, \delta\varepsilon$
10	$\alpha\beta\gamma, \alpha\beta\delta, \alpha\beta\varepsilon, \alpha\gamma\delta, \alpha\gamma\varepsilon, \alpha\delta\varepsilon, \beta\gamma\delta, \beta\gamma\varepsilon, \beta\delta\varepsilon, \gamma\delta\varepsilon$
5	$\alpha\beta\gamma\delta, \alpha\beta\gamma\varepsilon, \alpha\beta\delta\varepsilon, \alpha\gamma\delta\varepsilon, \beta\gamma\delta\varepsilon$
1	$\alpha\beta\gamma\delta\varepsilon$

In view of which, you find that it would be enough for me to complement this statement of a set of cardinality 5 with the sequence – which we shall put alongside – that refers to a set of four elements.

1	1
4	5
6	10
4	10
1	5
	1

In other words, imagine this as a tetrahedron. You will see that you have one tetrad, that you have six sides, that you have four vertex corners, that you have four faces, and that you have one empty set. I have only alluded to this other case to show you that in both cases the sum of the parts is equal to 2^n, n being precisely the cardinal number of the elements of the set. This is not something that undermines in any way whatsoever the theory of sets. What is stated regarding denumerability has all its applications, for example in the remark that nothing changes with respect to the categorization of a set as infinite if any denumerable sequence is dropped from it. Nevertheless, with regard to the contribution that is made of non-denumerability, in that assuredly and in every case one cannot map onto a finite set the sum of its parts defined in the above manner, I ask, is this the best way to introduce the non-denumerability of an infinite set?

What is at issue here is a didactic introduction. I dispute it from the moment that the property of reflexivity, such as it is assigned to the infinite set, and which entails that it lacks the inductiveness that is characteristic of finite sets, allows it nevertheless to be written, as I have seen in some places, that the non-denumerability of the parts of the infinite set would emerge by induction due to the fact that these parts would be written just as the infinite set of integers is written, $2^{\aleph_0}$. I dispute this.

How do I dispute it? There is some artifice involved when the parts of the set are taken on the mounting scale, the addition of which does effectively give 2^n. It is clear, however, that if on one side you have a, b, c, d, e – to Romanize the Greek letters I wrote on the blackboard, which I did for a reason – and if you bring what corresponds to them, namely, a, b, c, d corresponds to e, while a, b, d, e corresponds to c, you can see that the number of parts, if you substitute a partition here, leads to a very different formula, the number 2^{n-1}. You will see why this is of interest to me.

Given the time, and then the fact that this is not of interest to absolutely everybody here, I cannot develop this now. However, I welcome contributions, as I usually do, in my helpless way. I solicit grammarians once in a while, to give me a little pointer. They do, but they're always poor ones. I've solicited mathematicians, a great many already, to respond to me on this matter, and the truth is they turn a deaf ear. I have to tell you that they cling to this non-denumerability of the parts of the set like fleas to the skin of a dog.

None the less, I propose the following, which holds its own small interest. I shall go straight to one point, which will leave to one side another point to which I should like to return afterwards. By replacing the notion of parts with that of partition, it is necessary – in the same way that we have admitted that the parts of the infinite set would be $2^{\aleph_0}$, the smallest of the transfinites, the one that is constituted by the cardinal of the set of integers – that instead of getting $2^{\aleph_0}$, we get $2^{\aleph_0-1}$.

I suspect that this will give anyone an inkling of the misuse that consists in presupposing the bipartition of an infinite set. If, as the formula itself bears the trace, what is called the set of the parts leads to a formula that contains the number 2 raised to the power of the elements of the set, is this altogether admissible, above all from the moment we call induction into question when the infinite set is at issue? How is it admissible that we should accept a formula that shows so plainly that it's a matter, not of parts of the set, but of its partition?

To this I will add something that possesses its own special interest. Of course, $\aleph_0$ is merely an index. It's an index that has not been taken at random in that it has been wrought to perform a designation. There is the whole series of integers that can, in principle, serve as the index of what is involved in the set inasmuch as it grounds the transfinite. Nevertheless, as soon as what is at stake is the exponential function, and now that it seems we have misused induction by allowing ourselves to find therein the test of the non-denumerability of the parts of the infinite set, would we not find here, on closer inspection, another function for this nought, the nought in exponential power, namely that, whichever the number, designating its power with the exponent 0 makes it equal to 1? To reiterate, any number to the power of 1 is itself, but a number to the power of 0 is always 1, for the very simple reason that a number to the power of minus 1 is its inverse. Therefore, 1 serves as the pivotal element here.

From this moment forth, the partition of the transfinite set leads to the following. If in this instance we make $\aleph_0$ equal to 1, then what seems to be altogether admissible for the partition of the set is that the sequence of integers is supported by nothing other than the reiteration of the One, the One that came out of the empty set. It is in reproducing that it constitutes what I gave last time as the principle displayed in Pascal's triangle, at the level of the cardinality of the monads. Behind the supports – I'm saying this for the deaf ones who have been wondering what I said – you have what I call the nad, that is to say, the One that has come out of the empty set, which is the reiteration of the lack.

I stress that the One at issue is specifically what set theory replaces only with the reiteration of the empty set, whereby this theory shows the true nature of the nad.

Indeed, this is affirmed, from Cantor's own pen, in the principle of the set – which is certainly naïve, as one says – when he is opening up this truly sensational path. What Cantor's pen asserts is that the elements of the set can be as diverse as one might please, on the sole condition that we posit that each of them are what he will go so far as to call objects of our intuition or of our thought.[6] This is how he expresses it. Indeed, why deny him this? It means nothing more than something as eternal as one may wish. It's utterly clear that as soon as you mix intuition with thought, you get signifiers, which of course is made manifest by the fact that this is written a, b, c, d. What is said, however, is specifically that what is ruled out when it comes to the membership of an element in a set is that any element should be repeated as such. Therefore, any element of a set subsists qua distinct. When it comes to what is involved in the empty set, it is affirmed as a founding principle of set theory that it can only be One. This One – the nad that is the principle behind the emergence of the numerical One, of the One from which an integer is made – is thus something that is posited as lying at the origin of the empty set itself.

This notion is important because we are examining this structure to the extent that for us in the analytic discourse the One suggests itself as the principle behind repetition. Therefore, it is a matter, here, precisely of the sort of One that finds itself marked out as never being anything but a lack, an empty set.

However, now that I have introduced the function of the partition, there is a point of Pascal's triangle that you will allow me to examine. With the two columns I have just made, I have enough to show you what my question marks.

If it is true that as the number of the partitions we have only the number that was previously assigned to the set n–1, the set whose cardinal number is one unit less than the cardinal of a set, see how, on the basis of this number that corresponds to the presumed parts of the set that we shall call, more briefly, lower by one, the parts – which will find themselves in a bipartition – will compose the higher set, in accordance with the first statement. Each time, we have to add together the two numbers in the column to the left, one immediately to the left and the other above it. Here we obtain the figure 10, from the figure 4, here, and the figure 6.

1	1	1	1	1	1
	1	2	3	4	5
		1	3	6	10
			1	4	10
				1	5
					1

What does this mean? It means that we obtain the first figure, that of the monads of the set, of the elements of the cardinal number of the set, solely from the fact of having put, by means of what I would call a necessary misuse, the empty set on the row of the monadic elements. In other words, it is by adding the empty set to each of the four monads from the previous column that we obtain the cardinal number of the monads, of the elements, of the higher set.

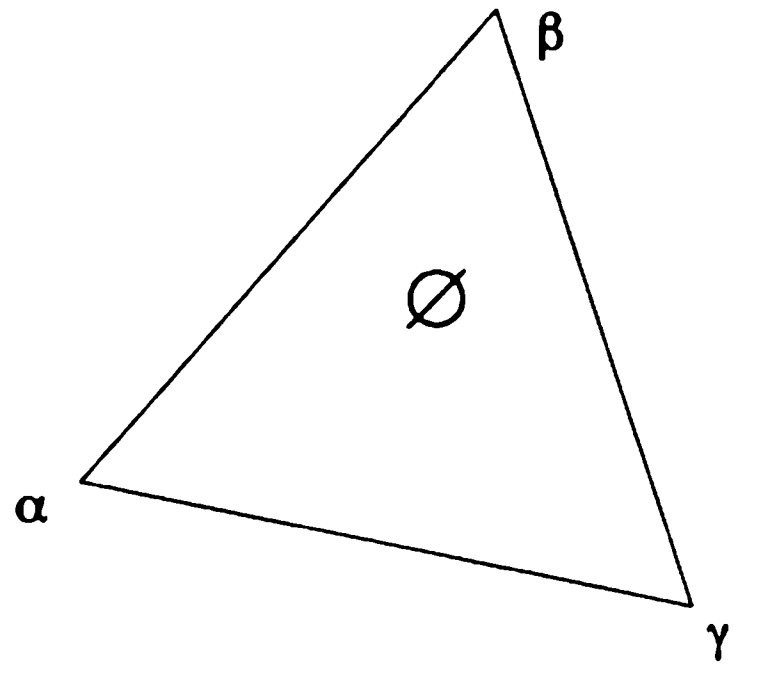
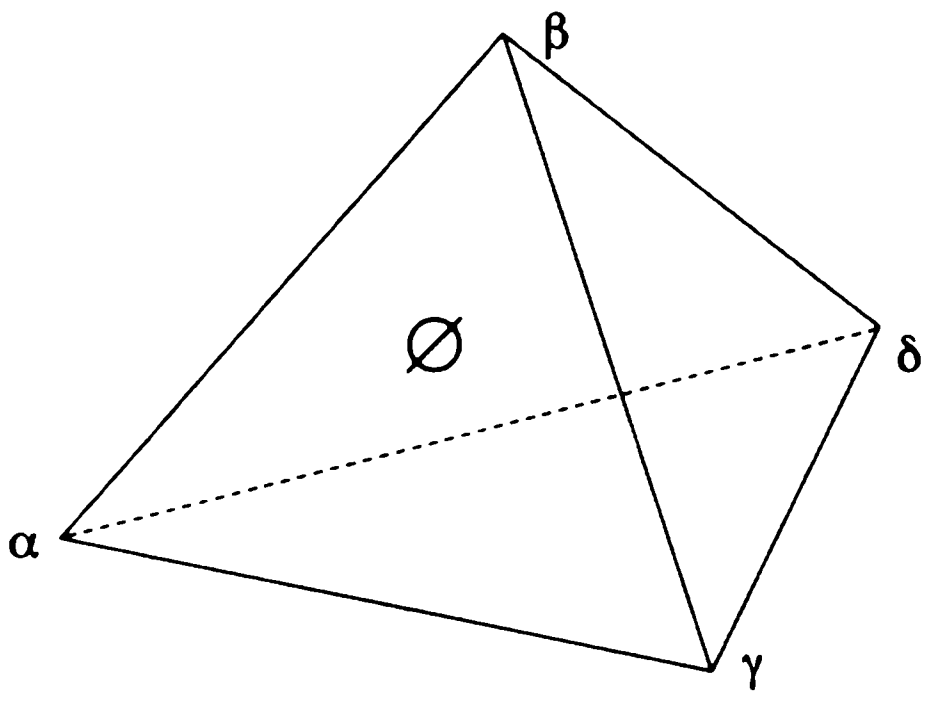
To make this figurable, let's simply try to see now what this yields in a diagram. To make things more straightforward, let's take the column before, the three monads, and not the four. We figure the set by means of a circle. But we figure the empty set as follows. It's not important for it to be in the centre.



We have said, when it's a matter of forming the tetradic set, that this empty set will come to the preceding row of monads. To represent it with a tetrahedron – of course, it's not about tetrahedra, it's about numbers – if this is designated by the Greek letters α, β, γ, we will have, here, the empty set as a fourth single-member element in the order of these subsets.

However, it no less remains that the empty set still exists at the level of this new set. At the level of this new set, we shall give a different term to what has just been extracted from the empty set. Since we already have α, β, γ, we shall call it δ.



What does this lead us to see? At the level of the elements of the antepenultimate subsets, we can see, to remain in intuition, the five quadrangles that can be highlighted in a polyhedral with five vertices.[7] There, too, what do we have to take up? We have to take up the four triangles of the tetrad in so far as we are going to be able to perform three different subtractions. This will be added together here, and constitutes it as a set, or more precisely as a subset. How can we make up our count, unless at this same level, where we will only have three subsets, each comprising three elements, we add to them the single elements of the set? Thus, α, β, γ, δ, in not having been subsumed into a set, that is, in being defined as elements – they are not sets – but in being isolated from what includes them in the set, they must be counted in order for us to have our count of four. To yield the partial aggregate of the figure 5 at the level of the five-element set, we have to bring in the elements that are four in number qua simply juxtaposed, and not as subsumed into a set, a subset in this instance.

We notice that, in set theory, every element is worth any other. And it is indeed in this way that unity can be generated. It is precisely in that the said concept of distinct and definite[8] on this occasion represents the fact that distinct can only mean radical difference, since nothing can resemble itself. There are no sorts. All that is distinguished in the same way is the same element. This is what this means.

By taking only the element of pure difference, we can also see it as the sameness of this difference. I mean, to illustrate this, that in set theory, one element is absolutely equivalent – as has already been demonstrated on the second line – to an empty set, because the empty set can also come into play as an element. Everything that is defined as an element is equivalent to the empty set. However, taking this equivalence, this sameness of absolute difference, as isolable – and not as subsumed into this aggregative inclusion, which would make it a subset – means that sameness as such is, at one point, counted.

This strikes me as having great importance, and very precisely, for example, at the level of what is played out in Plato, where similitude is turned into an idea of substance, a universal in the realist perspective, in so far as this universal is reality. What we see is that the idea of like-for-like is not introduced at the same level. This is what I alluded to in my most recent disquisition up at the Panthéon. The sameness of the elements of the set is, as such, counted as playing its role in the parts of the set.

This certainly holds importance for us, because what is at issue at the level of analytic theory? Analytic theory sees the One rearing its head at two of its levels. At a first level, the One is the One that repeats. It lies at the foundation of this major incidence in the analysand's speaking, which he decries as a certain repetition with regard to a signifying structure. On the other hand, considering the diagram that I have provided for the analytic discourse, what is produced when the subject is placed at the level of the jouissance of speaking? What is produced, and which I have designated at the storey of surplus jouissance, is S_1. This is a signifying production that I propose to acknowledge, even if it means setting myself the task of giving you a sense of its incidence, but in what exactly?

What is the sameness of difference? What does it mean that something that we designate in the signifier by means of diverse letters can be these same? What might these same mean, if not that this is unique, based indeed on the hypothesis that the function of the element starts with in set theory? The One at issue, which the subject produces – an ideal point, let's say – in analysis, is, contrary to what is at issue in repetition, the One as One by itself. It is the One inasmuch as, whatever difference might exist, all differences are worth as much as another. There is only one of them, and this is difference per se.

It is with this that I wanted to bring this disquisition to a close this evening, besides the fact that it so happens that the time and my weariness are hurrying me to it. In the coming sessions I will give you an illustration of the function of the S_1 in the way I have positioned it in the formula that gives its rightful status to the analytic discourse.

4 May 1972

XII

KNOWLEDGE ABOUT TRUTH

Wisdom is knowledge of jouissance
They peel away and go astray
The analyst does not affect a semblance
The poverty of the phenomenology of love
The inaccessible cardinals

It's hard for me to blaze a trail for you in a discourse that is of interest to not all of you. I shall say, that is of interest to you as not all, and I shall even add, only as not all.

1

One thing is clear, and this is the key character of the tous, of the all, in Freud's thinking. The notion of the crowd that he inherited from that imbecile called Gustave Le Bon served him in entifying this all. It comes as no surprise that he discovered in this the necessity of a There exists. On that occasion, the only aspect of it that he was able to see was what he translated as the unary trait, der einziger Zug.

The unary trait has nothing to do with the Yad'lun that I've been trying to tighten up this year, on the grounds that we don't have better things to do, which I've been expressing as . . . or worse. It wasn't just for the sake of it that I said to say it adverbially.

I shall say right away that the unary trait is what repetition as such is marked by. Repetition doesn't ground any all, nor does it identify anything, because tautologically, so to speak, there cannot be a first of them.

It is in this respect that all the psychology of something that is translated as des foules, crowd psychology, misses what stands to be seen here with a bit more luck, namely the nature of the pas-tous, the not-all that grounds this psychology, a nature that belongs precisely to woman, in inverted commas, which for father Freud constituted a problem right to the end, the problem of what she wants. I've already spoken to you about this. Let's come back to what I'm trying to spin out for you this year.

Anything whatsoever can serve to write the One of repetition. It's not that it's nothing, it's that it can be written with any old thing so long as it's easy to repeat in figures. For the being who finds himself in charge of making sure that, in language, it speaks, nothing lends itself more easily to figuration than what he is designed to reproduce naturally, namely, as they say, his like or his type. Not that he knows from the start how to produce his figure, but this figure marks him, and this he can give back to it. He can give back the mark that is precisely the unary trait. The unary trait is the support of what I started off from under the heading of the mirror stage, that is, imaginary identification.

However, this checking off of a support that is typical, that is to say, imaginary, the mark as such, the unary trait, does not constitute a judgement of value. It occurred to me that people said I used to make value judgements of the type – imaginary, poo, symbolic, yum-yum. But everything that I said, wrote, and inscribed in the graphs – which I schematized in the optical model where the subject is reflected in the unary trait, and where it's on this basis alone that he gets his bearings as an ideal ego – all of this insists precisely on how imaginary identification operates through a symbolic mark. So, whoever decries Manichaeism in my doctrine – the judgement of value, bah! – simply demonstrates what this is, on account of having heard me thus since the start of my disquisition, which is nevertheless coeval with it. A pig that rears back on its hind legs to become a standing pig is still the pig that it was of origin, but the pig is alone in imagining that anyone remembers this.

To come back to Freud, thus far I have only commented on the function that he introduced under the heading of narcissism. The unbelievable aspect of the institution for which he envisaged what he calls the economy of the psyche, namely the organization to which he deemed he should entrust the re-launch of his doctrine, stems indeed from the error he made when tying the ego, without any relay, to his Massenpsychologie.

Why did he want it to be so? He wanted to establish the safeguarding of a kernel of truth. This is what Freud thought it would be, and this is also how those who have proven to be the products of this conception express themselves in order to draw consideration thereof to themselves, even if they declare this kernel to be modest. Given the point things have reached in present-day opinion, this is comical. To make this apparent, it's enough to indicate what is implied in the sort of guarantor that is known as a school of wisdom. This is what it has always been called. Is this what it is?[1]

As is plainly stated in the very book of patience, of sapience, that the Ecclesiastes is, wisdom is the knowledge of jouissance. Everything that is posited as such is characterized as esotericism, and it may be said that there is no religion, besides the Christian religion, that doesn't s'en pare, in the two senses of the word. In all religions, the Buddhist and the Mohammedan, not to mention the others, there is this parading and this way of parrying, I mean, of marking out the place of this knowledge of jouissance. Need I mention the tantras, for one of these religions, and the Sufis for the other? This is what the pre-Socratic philosophies also authorized for themselves, and it was what Socrates broke with. He replaced it – and we may say nominally – with the relation to the object a that is none other than what is called the soul.

The operation is illustrated well enough by the partner he is given in the Symposium in the guise of the perfectly historical Alcibiades, in other words, in the guise of sexual frenzy, which is the normal culmination of the discourse of the absolute master, if I may say so, which produces nothing but symbolic castration. I remind you of the mutilation of the hermai, which I mentioned in its time when I was using the Symposium to spell out transference. From Socrates onwards, this knowledge of jouissance was only to survive on the fringes of civilization, not without thereby feeling what Freud discreetly calls its discontents.

Once in a while some crackpot goes bellowing on, falling in with this undermining. It only goes down in history when he's capable of making it heard in the very discourse that produced this knowledge, Christian discourse, to get things perfectly straight, because, make no mistake, it's the heir to Socratic discourse. It's the up-to-date discourse of the master, the latest model of the master, and the young women who are model models are its offspring. I am assured that, within this kind, the one I'm calling model model, which now parades under various initials but which invariably starts with an M, they are aplenty.[2] I know because I've been told. Indeed, from where I'm standing, for me to be able to see them, it's not enough just to look at you, because to begin with, they are pas toutes, not all, model models.

Clearly this produces an effect when the remark that there has been an undermining – I said that it goes down in history – is proffered by the likes of Nietzsche. I simply note that he can only proffer it – I mean, make himself heard – by voicing it in the only audible discourse, namely the one that determines the up-to-date master as his progeny. Naturally, all these lovely people are delighted by this, but it changes nothing. Everything that has been produced has been part and parcel of it from the start. Of course, the fact that the initials themselves, which were at issue just now, have also been there from the start is only discovered nachträglich.

I don't think it will be unhelpful to underscore here that the pas-tous has just slid quite naturally to pas toutes. That's what it's there for. Today I'm merely showing how all this blather can highlight one movement or another in the emergence of discourse, underscoring how its meaning remains problematic. In particular, it remains problematic on account of what ought not to be heard in what I have just said, namely a sense of history, because, like any other meaning, it only assumes clarity through what comes to pass, and what comes to pass depends only on fortune. This does not mean, however, that it isn't calculable. On what basis? On the basis of the One that is found therein. You mustn't be mistaken, however, as to which One you find. It's never the one you're seeking.

This is why, as I once said in echo of another who was in my situation, I don't seek, I find. The way, the only way, to avoid being mistaken is to start from the finding, to question oneself about what was there – if one so wanted – for the seeking.

What is the formula with which, once upon a time, I articulated transference? It was the now famous formula of the subject supposed to know. My artefacts of writing demonstrate a pleonasm here. Subject may be written with a barred S, which calls to mind how a subject is only ever supposed, ὑποκείμενον.

I only use this redundant form given the deafness of others. It's clear that knowledge is that which is supposed, and no one has ever made any mistake about it. Supposed of whom? Certainly not of the analyst, but of his position. On this point, you can consult my Seminars, because this is what's striking when you reread them. There are no blunders, unlike my Écrits.

Yes, that's how it is. It's because I write quickly. I'd never told myself that before, but I noticed it because it so happened that I recently spoke to someone, since the last time that some of you heard me at Sainte-Anne.

2

At Sainte-Anne, I put forward some items on the basis of set theory, which has been drafted in here to call into question the One I was speaking about just now.

I always take my risks, and it can't be said that I didn't this time, with all the necessary humour, by writing two to the power of Aleph subscript nought minus one.

$2^{\aleph_0-1}$

I think I've sufficiently underscored for you the difference that lies between the subscript 0 and the function of 0 when it is used in an exponential scale. Of course, this doesn't mean that I didn't tickle the sensitivity of any mathematicians who might have been in my audience that evening. What I wanted to say was in the expectation that I might receive some reaction. It was an appeal. What I wanted to say is that, subtract the One, and this entire edifice of numbers – when understood as the product of a logical operation, in particular the operation that proceeds from the position of 0 and the definition of the successor number – would come undone from the entire chain, until it comes back to its starting point.

It's curious that I had to summon someone expressly in order to hear from her lips the legitimacy of what I also uttered last time, namely that this entails not only the One that is produced from nought, but also another that, as such, I marked out as ascertainable in the chain, in passing from one number to another, when it's a matter of counting its parts. It is with this point that I should like to conclude.

Right now, however, I shall content myself with noting that the person who confirmed this to me is the same who, in a dedication that she honoured me with in connection with an article, herself expressed her perception that I wrote quickly. This idea had not occurred to me because what I write, I rewrite ten times. But it's true that the tenth time round, I do write very quickly. This is why blunders remain, because it's a text. A text, as the name indicates, can only be woven by tying knots. When one ties knots, there is something that remains and is left dangling.

I apologize for this. I have only ever written for people who were supposed to have heard me, and when, as an exception, I did write beforehand – a congress report, for example – I only ever gave an address on my report. Have a look at what I said in Rome, for the congress that went by the same name. I wrote the written report that people know about, and it was published in its time. In my written piece, I didn't take up what I said, but you shall certainly be more at ease with what I said than in the report itself. So, those for whom, all told, I carried out this work of logical recovery, which had the Rome Address as its point of departure, as soon as they give up the critical line that results from this work, to return to those beings – whom I show precisely that this address should forgo – and to make them the support of the analysand's discourse, they do no more than go back to chattering. This is why these people who gave the Address a wide berth, no sooner said than done, utterly lost the sense of it.

In peeling away from the line into which I was guiding them, it ensued that they came out with – indeed, what is more, that they even published in cold print – things that showed they no longer knew anything about my subject supposed to know. They went so far as to say that to suppose this knowledge in the position of the analyst was quite dreadful because it amounts to saying that the analyst affects a semblance. There is just a small hairline crack in this, which I already pointed out earlier, which is that the analyst does not affect a semblance, he occupies the position of semblance.

The analyst occupies the position of semblance legitimately because there is no other tenable position in relation to jouissance such as he has to grasp it in the remarks of the one who, in the capacity of analysand, is supported by the analyst in his enunciation as a subject. It is from here alone that it may be perceived how far the jouissance of this authorized enunciation can be led without wreaking overly manifest havoc. But semblance does not feed on jouissance. Those who fall back into the discourse of this same old rut would have it that semblance scorns jouissance. This semblance lends its loudhailer to something other than itself, and precisely by showing itself as a mask, one that is openly worn, as on the Greek stage.

Semblance takes effect by being manifest. When an actor wears a mask, he is not pulling a face. He is not a realist. The pathos is reserved for the chœur, the choir, who give themselves over to it à cœur joie, wholeheartedly. What for? So that the spectator, the spectator of the stage in Antiquity, may find there his own communitarian surplus jouissance. This is indeed what for us constitutes the value of cinema. There, the mask is something else. It is the unreal aspect of the projection. But let's come back to us.

It is in giving voice to something that the analyst can demonstrate that this reference to the Greek stage is opportune. For what is he doing in occupying as such this position of semblance? Nothing other than demonstrating, than being able to demonstrate, that the terror that is felt in relation to the desire by which neurosis is organized, which we call defence, is, in regard to what is produced there as a labour of sheer loss, merely a conjuration to arouse pity. At either end of this sentence you can find what Aristotle designated as the effect that tragedy has on the listener.

Where did I say that the knowledge from which this voice originates would be semblance? Need it even appear to be so? Need it even assume an inspired tone? Nothing of the sort. Neither walking the walk nor talking the talk of semblance is suited to the analyst. Yet, there you have it. Since it's clear that this knowledge is not the esoteric aspect of jouissance, nor merely the savoir faire of making a face, one must resolve to speak of truth as a fundamental position, even if not all is known about this truth, since I define it by its half-saying, by the fact that it cannot come more than midsay.

But what, then, is the knowledge that is assured by truth? It is nothing but what stems from what is noted as a result of the fact of positing truth on the basis of the signifier. This poise is rather tough to sustain, but is confirmed in yielding a non-initiatory knowledge, because it proceeds – no offence to anyone – from the subject who is subjected as such, by a discourse, to production. This is the subject that mathematicians can be found qualifying as creative,[3] specifying that a subject is indeed what is at issue, which corroborates the subject in my logic, exhausting himself to be produced as an effect of the signifier while of course still remaining just as distinct from it as a real number is from a series of which the convergence is assured rationally.

Saying non-initiatory knowledge is tantamount to saying knowledge that is taught by other paths besides the direct paths of jouissance. These paths are wholly conditioned by the founding failure of sexual jouissance. By that, I mean this whereby the constitutive jouissance of the speaking being is differentiated from sexual jouissance. The efflorescence of this separation and differentiation is certainly brief and limited, and this is why it has been possible to draw up a catalogue thereof, precisely on the basis of the analytic discourse, as an absolutely finite list of drives.

The finitude of this list is concomitant with the impossibility that is demonstrated in the veritable questioning of sexual relation as such. More exactly, it is in the very practice of sexual relation that the link – which as speaking beings we claim lies entirely elsewhere – between the impossible and the real is affirmed. The real is attested to by this alone.

All reality is suspect. It is not to be suspected of being imaginary, as is imputed to me, for in truth it's fairly patent that the imaginary such as it emerges in animal ethology is an articulation of the real. What we have to suspect of any reality is that it might be fantasmatic. And what allows of an escape from this is that an impossibility in the symbolic formula that we are enabled to draw from it demonstrates what is real therein. It is not for nothing that here, to designate the symbolic in question, the word term shall be used.

Love, after all, could be taken as the object of a phenomenology. The literary expression of what has been ventured on love is profuse enough for it to be presumed that something may be gleaned from it. Even so, it is curious that, apart from a few authors, Stendhal, Baudelaire, . . . and let's ditch the phenomenology of love in Surrealism, the moralism of which makes us go to pieces – forgive the pun – this literary expression comes up so short that it cannot even be apparent to us. The only thing that would interest us is its strangeness.

While this suffices to designate everything that is set down in this regard in the nineteenth-century novel, the opposite is the case for everything that came before. Look at L'Astrée, which for its contemporaries was no small matter. We comprehend so little of what it might have been for these contemporaries that we feel nothing more than boredom on reading it, and thus it is rather difficult for us to constitute this phenomenology. Taking up its inventory, one can only deduce the poverty of what it draws on.

Psychoanalysis went venturing into this quite innocently. Of course, what it encountered at first was not especially cheerful. It has to be acknowledged that it didn't limit itself to this, and what remains of what it initially opened up by way of example is the model of love as furnished by the mother's care of her son. This is also inscribed in the Chinese character Hǎo, which means good, or that which is good.

好

It is composed of this, which means son, Tseu –

子

And this, which means woman, Nǔ –

女

Stretching this out from the daughter who cherishes the senile father, and even up to what I allude to at the end of my Subversion of the Subject, namely the miner whose wife gives him a rubdown before he fucks her, is not what will afford any great clarification of sexual relation.

Knowledge about truth is useful for the analyst to the extent that it allows him to widen a little his relation to these subject-effects, which I said he authorizes by leaving the field open to the analysand's discourse. Indeed, that the analyst ought to comprehend the analysand's discourse strikes me as preferable. But as to whence he ought to comprehend it, this is a question that doesn't seem to force itself on people's vision in merely noting that he should be occupying the position of semblance in this discourse.

Of course, it needs to be accentuated that he occupies this position of semblance as a. The analyst cannot comprehend anything except in respect of what the analysand says, namely in seeing himself not as the cause, but rather as the effect of this discourse, which does not prevent him by rights from recognizing himself therein.

This is why it is advisable for him to have gone through this in his didactic analysis, which can only be dependable when it has not been undertaken under this heading.

3

There is one facet of knowledge about truth that derives its strength from entirely neglecting its content.

This hammers home how the signifying articulation is its time and its place, and it does so to such an extent that something is shown which is nothing but this articulation.

The monstration of this articulation, in the passive sense, finds itself assuming an active sense and imposing itself as a demonstration to the speaking being who, in this instance, can only acknowledge, for the signifier, not merely inhabiting it but being no more than its mark. The freedom to choose one's axioms, that is to say, the point of departure chosen for this demonstration, consists solely in undergoing its consequences as a subject, consequences that, for their part, are not free.

Truth can be constructed on the sole basis of 0 and 1. This came about only at the start of the last century, somewhere between Boole and De Morgan, with the emergence of mathematical logic.

It should not be thought that 0 and 1 here stand for the opposition between truth and falsehood. This was the revelation by Frege and Cantor, which only assumes its value nachträglich. This 0 was said to be falsehood, which encumbered the Stoics for whom it was just that. This led to the charming folly of material implication. Not without reason did some refuse this. It posits that the implication that would be true is the one that makes formulated truth result from formulated falsehood. The falsehood that implies truth is a true implication.

There is nothing of the like in the following position, in mathematical logic –

$$(0 \rightarrow 1) \rightarrow 1$$

That 0 should imply 1 is an implication of 1 – that is, of the true – that can be noted down. For 0 carries just as much veridical truth as 1, because 0 is not the negation of the truth, 1, but the truth of the lack that consists in 1 being missing at 2. This means that, on the plane of truth alone, truth can only speak occasionally to affirm itself, as was done for centuries, as double truth, but never as the whole truth.

0 is not the negation of just anything, especially of any multitude. It plays its role in the construction of number. As everyone knows, it is altogether accommodating. Were there only noughts, O how smoothly things would coast along. What it indicates, however, is that when there would have to be two of them, there is only ever one of them, and this is a truth. That 0 implies 1, the whole implying 1, is to be taken not as falsehood implying truth, but as two truths, one implying the other. But it can additionally be taken as affirming that the true only ever occurs in missing its mate.

The sole thing to which the 0 is opposed, but resolutely so, is that there could be a relationship with 1 such that 2 would result from it. It is not true – which I will mark with the bar that befits it – that 0 implying 1, implies 2.

$$\overline{(0 \rightarrow 1) \rightarrow 2}$$

How, then, are we to grasp what is involved in this 2, without which it is quite clear that no number whatsoever can be constructed? I haven't been speaking about numerating them, but about constructing them. It is for precisely this reason that last time I led you as far as the Aleph. It was to give you a sense, in passing, of how in the generation from one cardinal number to another, in the counting of the subsets, something somewhere is counted as such that is another One. I marked this out using Pascal's triangle, noting that each number that, to the right, stands as the number of parts, is made by adding together what corresponds to it as parts in the previous set.

1	1
3	4
3	6
1	4
	1

Counting the subsets

It is this 1, the 1 that I characterized when it was a question of 3, for example, namely ab in opposition to c, and of ba which comes from the same. For there to be 4 of them, to ab, to ba, and to ac, we have to put abc, the juxtaposition of the elements from the previous set – their juxtaposition as such – which come into account in the simple capacity of 1.[4] This is what I called the sameness of difference, since it is through no other property but that of their difference that the elements that here support the subsets are themselves counted in the generation of the parts that will ensue.

I insist. It is a question of what is at issue with respect to what has been tallied. It is the One-to-boot, in so far as it is counted as such in what has been tallied in the Aleph of its parts with each passage from a number to its successor. In counting difference as such as a property, what does the multiplication that is expressed in the exponential 2^{n-1} of the parts of the higher set, of its bipartition, bear out? What is borne out in the Aleph when put to the test of the denumerable? It is here that it is revealed that, given a One, the One at issue, what is at issue is another One. What is constituted on the basis of 1 and 0 as the inaccessibility of 2 is only delivered at the level of the $\aleph_0$, that is to say, the actual infinite.

To bring this to a close, I'm going to give you a sense of this in a form that is quite straightforward. It has to do with what can be said with respect to what is involved in the integers concerning a property that would be one of accessibility.

Let's define this property as follows – a number is accessible when it can be produced either as a sum or as an exponentiation of numbers that are smaller than it. In this respect, the start of the numbers is confirmed as not being accessible, and very precisely up to 2. This is of interest to us most especially with respect to this 2, because I have underscored sufficiently that in the relation between 1 and 0, the 1 is generated in that 0 is the mark of lack.

With 0 and 1, whether you add them, or raise one to the other, or even to itself, in an exponential relation, 2 is never reached. For the number 2, in the sense I have just set it out, the test as to whether it can generate smaller numbers, whether through a summation or an exponentiation, proves to be negative. There is no 2 that can be generated by means of 1 and 0.

A side-note from Gödel is instructive in this regard, that the $\aleph_0$, the actual infinite, turns out to realize the same case.

Meanwhile, for what is involved in the integers upwards of 2, there is no number that cannot be realized by one of the two operations using smaller numbers. Start with 3. It can be made of 1 and 2. And 4 can be made by raising 2 to its own exponentiation, and so forth.

At the level of $\aleph_0$, the rift that I'm calling inaccessibility is reproduced. There is strictly no number that ever gains access to the Aleph, irrespective of whether one uses a number by adding it to itself indefinitely, or even to each of its successors, or else by raising it to a power however high you like.

It is quite striking – and this is what I must leave aside for today, perhaps to resume it in a smaller circle should this be of interest to some of you – that from Cantor's construction it results that there is no Aleph, starting from $\aleph_0$, that may be held to be accessible. It is no less true that in the opinion of those who have pushed forward this difficulty in set theory, it is only through the supposition that, in these Alephs, there is inaccessibility, that what I shall call consistency may be reintroduced into the integers.

In other words, without this supposition of inaccessibility being produced somewhere in the Alephs, what is at issue, and which was my starting point, is what is designed to suggest to you the usefulness of there being Oneness, should you manage to hear what is involved in this bipartition, this one-to-one between man and woman, which slips away from one instant to the next.

Is everything that is not man, woman? This is what tends to be accepted. However, since woman is not-all, why would all that is not woman be man?

The fact that in this one-to-one it is impossible to apply, in this matter of gender, something that would be the principle of contradiction, the fact that it takes nothing less than the acceptance of the inaccessibility of something beyond the Aleph for non-contradiction to be consistent, and the fact that it is valid to say that which is not 1 is 0, and that which is not 0 is 1, this is what I am indicating to you as what ought to enable the analyst to hear, a little further than through the spectacle lenses of the object a, what is produced by way of effect, what is created by way of One, by a discourse that hinges only upon the grounding of the signifier.

10 May 1972

XIII

THE FOUNDING OF SEXUAL DIFFERENCE

The geniality of strike action
The ancillary position of truth and meaning Wavering in the sharing-out of the sexes Theory of hunting Difference and attribute

Analysis leads us to formulate the function Φx. What is at issue is to find out whether there exists an x that would satisfy this function. So, naturally, this presupposes that we spell out what existence might be.

It is fairly certain that, historically speaking, this notion of existence only emerged with the intrusion of the mathematical real as such. This proves nothing, however, because we are not here to set out the history of thought. There can be no history of thought. Thought is, in itself, an evasion. Under the name mémoire, it projects the misrecognition of its moire.

This does not prevent us from being able to try to map something out by starting from what I have written down in the form of a function.

1

I started to utter something that I hope will be of service to you. This something is a fact of saying. If I write it down, it goes in one direction, in the sense that it's a function that bears no relation to anything that fonde d'eux, that from eux, from them, founds One.

You can see that the whole trick is in the subjunctive, which belongs both to the verb fonder and to the verb fondre.[1] D'eux has not founded into One, nor is One founded by d'eux. This is what Aristophanes tells in a very nice tale in the Symposium. They were cleft in twain, for at first they were shaped as a beast with two backs, or as a beast à dos d'eux, with the back of them both. Of course, if the fable were thought in the least to be something other than a fable, that is, to be consistent, on no account would this imply that they should produce offspring with two backs, à dos d'eux. No one remarks on this, and fortunately so, because a myth is a myth, and this one says quite enough.

I first envisaged this myth in a more modern form, in the form of Φx. All in all, this is what, concerning sexual relations, presents itself to us as a kind of discourse. I'm speaking about the mathematical function. At the very least, I propose this to you as a model that in this regard would allow us to ground something else – semblance . . . or worse.

This morning, I got off to the worse start. In spite of it all, I don't think it will be extraneous to let you know about this, if only to see where it might lead.

It was due to the brief power cut we had. I don't how long it lasted for you, but for me it went on until ten o'clock. It was a royal pain in the arse, because this is the time of day when I usually gather together these little notes and think them over. The power cut didn't help matters. What's more, this same power cut caused someone to smash a tooth mug of which I was particularly fond. If there are people here who love me, they can send me a new one. Then I might have several, which would allow me to smash all of them save the one I might prefer. I have a little courtyard that is there just for that.

So, I told myself that this power cut wasn't the doing of just anyone, but was a workers' decision. For my part, you cannot imagine the respect I have for the geniality of this thing known as a strike, industrial action. What sensitivity, to go no further than that. A strike is the most social thing there is in the whole world. It represents fabulous respect for the social bond. On this occasion, however, this power cut that had the purport of a strike carried a slight overtone.

At that time of day, when I was cooking up what I would be saying to you now, how bothersome it must have been for she who, being the worker's wife, is called, from the lips of the worker himself – despite everything, I do rub shoulders with them – the bourgeoise.[2] It's true that this is what they call them.

So, my mind started to wander, because all of this holds together. They are the workers, the exploited, precisely because they still prefer this to the sexual exploitation of the bourgeoise. That's worse. It's the . . . or worse, you understand?

What does this lead to, laying out articulations concerning things about which one can do nothing? It cannot be said that sexual relation presents itself solely in the form of exploitation. It's prior to that. It's because of this that exploitation is organized, because we don't even have this kind of exploitation. There you go. This is worse. It's the . . . or worse.

It's not serious. It's not serious, even though we can see that this is precisely where a discourse that would not be a discourse of semblance ought to be. But it's a discourse that would end badly. It wouldn't be a social bond at all, in the way that a discourse needs to be.

So, now, what is at issue is the psychoanalytic discourse. It's a matter of making sure that he who functions as the a in this discourse should hold the position of semblance.

Of course, I explained this to you last time, and naturally it washed over you like water off a duck's back, though in the end some of you did seem to have got a little damp. I've had some feedback. Those of you who took an interest in it were moved by it. There are some psychoanalysts who have something that torments them, that anguishes them every so often.

This is not why I'm saying this, why I'm insisting on the fact that the object a should hold the position of semblance. It's not to get them all anxious. I would even prefer them not to have any anxiety. Well, that it should make them anxious is not a bad sign because it means that my discourse is not entirely superfluous, that it can take on a meaning. But this is not enough. That a discourse should have meaning guarantees absolutely nothing, because this meaning has at least to be ascertained. If you do that, well, Brownian motion means that from one instant to the next, it has a meaning. This is precisely what makes the psychoanalyst's position difficult, because the function of the object a is displacement.

It wasn't in connection with the psychoanalyst that I first fetched the object a down from the heavens. I started to circumscribe it, at a point from which it couldn't budge, in a little graph that was designed to provide the skeleton, or the bearings, of the formations of the unconscious. In the position of semblance, it's not so easy to stay put, because the object a will just slip through your paws in two shakes of a lamb's tail. As I explained when I started speaking about this, in connection with language, it's that il court, il court, le furet, in everything you say.[3] It is somewhere else from one instant to the next.

This is why we are trying to grasp whence something could be situated that would lie beyond meaning, beyond the meaning that also means that I can obtain no other effect but anxiety, when this wasn't remotely my aim. It is in this respect that we are concerned for this real to be anchored.

I say, and not without reason, that this real is mathematical, because given the experience as a whole, the experience of what is at issue, of what gets formulated, of what in this instance gets written, we are able to put our finger on how there is something here that resists. I mean that this is something of which one cannot say just any old thing. One cannot give just any old meaning to the mathematical real.

This is even quite striking among those who, in a recent age, got close to this real with the preconceived idea of making it account for its meaning on the basis of truth. There was one great eccentric, whose reputation you are aware of because he made quite a splash in the world, by the name of Bertrand Russell. He was at the heart of this enterprise, and it was in fact he who said something along the lines of mathematics being something that is articulated in such a way that, in the end, we don't even know if it's true, or if it has a meaning. This doesn't prevent – indeed this proves – the fact that it cannot be given just any meaning or just any truth, and that it resists to the point of culminating in a result, which I consider to be a success. This success, the way in which it imposes its realness, is precisely due to the fact that neither truth nor meaning dominates here. They are secondary.

This ancillary position of these two thingummies called truth and knowledge remained uncustomary for those people. It made their heads spin a bit when they took the trouble to ponder it. This was the case for Bertrand Russell. He was a thinker. It was an aristocrat's fixation, you see. There's really no reason to view this as an essential function.

Yet those who have been constructing set theory – I'm not trying to be wry – have had quite enough to do in this real to find the time to do some thinking on the side.

The way they have committed themselves to a path which not only can they not leave, but which leads somewhere with a necessity, and then with a fecundity to boot, has meant that they have touched on how this has to do with something altogether different from what is nevertheless employed, which was the step taken in the initium of this theory.

2

This initial step consisted in examining everything that was involved in this real. This is where they started because they couldn't fail to see that number was the real, and because for some time there had been some exchanging of fisticuffs with the One.

None the less, it was no mean feat to realize that it could be called into question as to whether real numbers had anything to do with the One, the 1, the first of the integers, known as the natural numbers. They'd had time, since the seventeenth century, and up to the beginning of the nineteenth century, to approach number very slightly differently from how they did in Antiquity. If this is my point of departure it's because this is what is essential.

Not only Yad'lun, but this can be seen in that the One, for its part, does not think. In particular, it does not think therefore I am. I hope you remember that even Descartes doesn't say that. He says, Ça se pense, It thinks itself, 'therefore I am', in inverted commas. The One does not think itself, even all alone, but it says something, and this is even what distinguishes it.[4]

The One didn't wait for people to ask in its regard the question of what this means from the standpoint of truth. It didn't even wait for logic. For this is what logic is. Logic is a matter of ascertaining in grammar what takes shape as the position of truth, which in language makes it suitable for forming truth. Suitable does not mean that it will invariably succeed. So, in carefully seeking out its forms, one believes one is approaching what is involved in truth. However, before Aristotle became aware of this relation to grammar, the One had already spoken, and not to say just anything. The One says what it has to say. In the Parmenides, it is the One that se dit, that says itself. It says itself – it has to be said – in aiming to be true, hence the tizzy that naturally arises from it as a result.

Among those who cook up knowledge, there's not one who hasn't felt this to be quite a smash. It smashes your tooth mug. Even though there are some who put some goodwill into it, some courage, by saying that after all it could be admitted that this is somewhat far-fetched, we haven't yet got to the bottom of this thing that was nevertheless so straightforward, and which consists in realizing that the One, when it is veridical, when it says what it has to say, leads in every case to the total rejection of any relation to Being.

When the One s'articule, when it articulates itself, the only thing that arises from it is that y en a pas deux.[5] I said so – it's a fact of saying. You can even find in this, in arm's reach, the confirmation of what I've been saying when I say that truth can only go midsay. You just have to break up the wording. In order to say this, it can only say either y en a, there is, and, as I say, Yad'lun, or else, pas deux, not twain, which for us is immediately interpreted – there is no such thing as sexual relation. So, as you can see, this is already within our arm's reach.

Of course, it's not within reach of the unian arm of the One to make something of it, in the sense of meaning. Indeed, this is why I recommend to those who want to hold the position of analyst – with all that this entails in terms of knowing how not to slip out of this position – that they should get up to speed with what could be read simply by working through the Parmenides.

But, all the same, this would come up a bit short. We hit the wall with the Parmenides, instead of something else happening, which – if, of course, we persevere a little, if we break ourselves in to it, and even if we break ourselves up on it – makes absolutely clear the distinction that there is between a real that is a mathematical real and anything whatsoever of the banter that starts off from this je ne sais quoi that is our queasy position, called truth or meaning.

This doesn't mean, of course, that this reading will not have an effect, an effect of massage, of reinvigoration, a breath of fresh air, a purging, in connection with what will become apparent to us as a requisite with regard to truth or indeed to meaning. But this is precisely what I expect from it. Training oneself to distinguish what is involved in the One, and relating it to this real which is at issue in that it supports number, will already afford the analyst a great deal. I mean that it may come to him from the angle where it is a matter of interpreting, of regenerating meaning, of saying things which are thereby a little less circumvented, a little less shimmering, than all the damned stupidity that can occur to us.

Earlier I gave you, . . . or worse, a sample of this on the mere basis of this morning's aggravation. I could have embellished, just like that, on the worker and his bourgeoise, and drawn a mythology from it. Besides, it got a laugh out of you, because when it comes to this sort of thing, the field is vast. There is no shortage of meaning and truth. It has even become the academic feeding trough, there is so much of it.

There is such a wide range of it that one day someone will come along to make an ontology out of it, as I told you, an ontology to say that I said that speech was an effect of filling in the open gap that I've been articulating as – there is no such thing as sexual relation. That can be rattled off smoothly just like that, a subjectivist interpretation, because it cannot be brought round to the fact that it requires some spiel. It's all quite straightforward.

What I've been trying to do is something different. It's to ensure that in your discourse you include less of this damned stupidity – I'm speaking about the analysts – and, to do so, that you try to air meaning a little with elements that would be somewhat novel.

Yet this is not a requirement that fails to impose itself, because it's quite clear that there is no means of sharing out any two series of attributes – any, I say – that would form a male series on one side and on the other the woman series.

To start with, I've avoided saying man so as not to lead to any confusion, because I'm going to be elaborating further on this, so as to stay in the worst. Clearly it's tempting, even for me. I amuse myself. And I'm sure to amuse you by showing you the inanity of what is called active, if this is what you ground yourselves on to distinguish man from woman.

This is common currency – man, the dear lad, is active. However, in the sexual relation, it seems to me that it's rather the woman who gets a wriggle on. Indeed, you have only to look at the positions that we shall on no account label as primitive, though it's not because they are to be found in the tiers monde, in the third world, which is the world of Monsieur Thiers, is it not? It's plain to see that in normal life – and of course I'm not speaking about those blokes from the Gas and Electricity Board, who have taken their distance, who have set on labour, but rather about a life that we shall simply describe as it is, as it is everywhere, except where our great Christian overhaul has occurred – man twiddles his thumbs while woman does the milling, the grinding, the sewing, the errands, and, in those solid civilizations that have not been lost, she still finds the wherewithal to twirl her rump for the exhilarating satisfaction of the chap beside her. I'm speaking about a dance, of course. So, as far as active and passive are concerned, allow me to . . .

It's true that he does go hunting! And this is no laughing matter, my little ones. This is very important.

Since you're goading me, I'm going to carry on amusing myself. It's unfortunate, because this way I shall never get to the end of what I had to say to you today concerning the One. Since this is making you laugh, however, this matter of hunting, I don't know whether it wouldn't be entirely superfluous to see in this precisely man's virtue. When hunting, there is a virtuous display of what is finest about him, namely to be passive.

I don't know if you're aware of this, because of course all of you here are layabouts. There are no country folk here. None of you go hunting. But even if we did have some country folk here, they don't hunt well. For the country folk – they are not necessarily men, whatever one might say – the game is flushed out into the open. Whack, whack! All the game is driven towards them. That's not what hunting is.

You only have to look at the trance that hunting, when it exists, used to put people in. We have some faint traces of everything they used to offer to the thing in propitiation, which nevertheless was a thing that was no longer there. You understand that they were no more doolally than we are. A slain beast is a slain beast. Only, if they managed to slay the beast it was because they had submitted themselves so fully to everything that goes to make up its moves, its trace, its boundaries, its territory, its sexual preoccupations, by having substituted themselves for that which does not belong to all that, for the wide-openness, for the unenclosedness, for the unboundedness, of the beast. We have to say the word – for life. And when, after having become this life so fully, they had to take it away, we can understand that they found not only that this was unpleasant, but also that it was dangerous, and that it could happen to them as well.

This might be one of those things that made a few people think, because one can still have a sense of such things. I heard this formulated in a curious way by someone who is inordinately intelligent, a mathematician. He said that it might well be that an organism's nervous system is nothing other than what results from its identifying with its prey. The fellow is extrapolating here, but even so, I'm giving you this because it's stimulating. I'm slipping you the idea, and all the more readily in that it's not mine. It was passed on to me, too. You can make what you will of it, of course. But on this basis one can knock together a new theory of evolution that will be a bit more of a hoot than the previous ones. I'm sure this will stimulate the ontological grey matter.

The same is true of the fisher, and, ultimately, of everything whereby man is woman. Think of the way a fisher rubs the underbelly of the trout beneath its rock. There must be some trout ticklers here. There is every chance of that. They would know what I'm talking about. It's quite something.

In the end, all of this does not afford us, on the subject of active and passive, a clear-cut sharing-out. I won't go on and on, because it suffices to compare each of these customary couples with an attempt at any sort of bisexual sharing-out to arrive at results that are every bit as farcical.

So, then, what might that be?

3

Even so, I do have to clean up my own backyard. I don't see why I shouldn't stick with this, because I'm going to be speaking to you on Thursday, 1 June. Can you imagine that? I'm forced to come back from my few days of holiday so as not to miss Sainte-Anne.

When I say Yad'lun, this doesn't mean that there is something of the individual. It seems to me that for many of you this is something you already know, but why not? This is precisely why I've been asking you to embed this Yad'lun right where it arises. That is to say, there is no other existence of the One but mathematical existence.[6] There is One something. One argument that satisfies a formula. And an argument is something that is completely devoid of meaning. It's simply the One as One.

This is what at the start I had intended to mark out for you in set theory. Perhaps, even so, I shall be able to give some indication of this before taking leave of you.

First, however, we need to put paid to an idea. Even the idea of the individual in no case whatsoever constitutes the One. A number of people imagine that sexual relation is grounded on there being, in principle, as many individuals on one side as on the other, at least for the being who speaks. The number of men and women evens out, save exceptions, slight exceptions I mean – the British Isles, for example, where there are slightly fewer men than women. Large massacres of men also occur. But in the end, this doesn't stop each Jill from having her Jack. Well, their going one-by-one is not remotely sufficient to account for sexual relation.

It's all the same rather odd that there is a kind of impurity here in set theory with respect to this idea of one-to-one correspondence. You can see how the set has its roots in the class and how the class, like everything that is pinpointed with an attribute, is something that has to do with sexual relation. Yet what I am asking you to come to apprehend thanks to the function of the set is that there is a One that is distinct from what unifies a class as an attribute.

There is a transition through the intermediary of this one-to-one correspondence. There are as many on one side as on the other, and some people ground the idea of monogamy on this. One wonders why this is tenable, but in the end it's in the Gospel. There are as many on either side until a social catastrophe happens, which is what apparently occurred midway though the Middle Ages in Germany. It seems they were able to decree at that time that sexual relation would not have to be bi-univocal.

It's fairly amusing that people posed themselves the problem as such of the sex ratio, namely are there as many males as there are females?

There was a literature on this that has great zest, because all in all the problem is one that is most frequently resolved by what we shall call chromosomal selection. The most frequent case is clearly the sharing-out of two sexes into a quantity of individuals reproduced in equal number in either sex. But it's really very nice that they should have asked the question of what might happen should a skew start to occur. It is very easy to demonstrate that in some cases of such skewing, it can only grow, if we stick with chromosomal selection. We won't say that this is random, because what is at issue is a sharing-out. However, the altogether elegant solution they found was that this must be compensated for by natural selection.

Here we can see natural selection for what it is. It may be summarized by saying that the strongest are necessarily the fewest, and since they are the stronger, they thrive, and so they become as numerous as the others. The connection between this idea of natural selection and sexual relation is one of those cases in which it is clearly shown that the risk one runs whenever one tackles sexual relation is that one remains at the level of quips. Indeed, everything that has been said about it is of this order.

It is important that one should be able to voice something other than what gives rise to laughter because we are striving, in order to ensure the position of the analyst, for something different from what it appears to be in many cases, namely a gag.

In set theory, the starting point can be read in the function of membership. To be an element of a set is to be something that has no business belonging to a register that could be qualified as universal, that is to say, to something that falls within the scope of the attribute. What set theory attempts is to dissociate, to disarticulate, in a definitive fashion, the predicate from the attribute.

Prior to this theory, what characterized the notion in question in what is involved in the sexual type, inasmuch as this type might prefigure something of a relation, was precisely that the universal should be grounded on a common attribute. Moreover, there is a faint prefiguration here of the logical distinction between attribute and subject, and on this basis the subject is grounded. It is through this that something that is distinct can be called attribute.

From this distinction of the attribute there quite naturally results the following – you do not put in one same whole both apples and oranges, for example. In contrast to this category that is called class, there is the category of set, in which not only are apple and orange compatible, but in a set as such of each of these two kinds, there can be only one. In a set, if there is nothing to distinguish one apple from another, there can only be one apple, just as there can only be one orange. The One qua pure difference is what distinguishes the notion of the element. The One qua attribute is thus distinct from this.

The difference between the One of difference and the One attribute is that when you make use of the latter to define a class, in any attributive statement the attribute will not be supernumerary in the definition.

If you say man is good, positing that man is good does not rule out your having to account for how man does not always correspond to this appellation. Who is not compelled to say such a thing? Besides, plenty of reasons are invariably found to show that man is capable of not corresponding to this attribute, of evincing a failure to fulfil

it. This is the theory that has been made, and with all the range of meaning you have at your disposal to contend with it, you set about explicating how, though once in a while he can admittedly be bad, this changes nothing about his attribute. You could then tot up the balance from the standpoint of number by asking how many of them hold to this attribute and how many do not correspond to it. It's still the case that the attribute good will not come into the balance on top of each of the good men.

This is very precisely the difference compared with the One of difference. When it comes to articulating its consequence, this One of difference has to be counted as such in what is stated about what it grounds, which is a set and which has parts. Not only is the One of difference countable, but also it must be counted among the parts of the set.

My time is up. Indeed, it's now two. Therefore, I can only indicate what the next part will be to what, as usual, I'm having to cut off, more or less any old how, due precisely to another cut, this morning's power cut, with the consequences it had.

So, I'm led to give you a mere indication of what I will be picking up from the following pivotal affirmation.

It has to do with the relation that this One, which has to be counted on top of the rest, bears to what is specified – in what I describe not as a stand-in, but as being deployed in a locus in the stead of sexual relation – as There exists, not Φx, but the fact of saying that this Φx is not the truth.

$$\exists x.\overline{\Phi x}$$

It is from here that arises the One that means that this formula has to be put on the side of what founds man as such. And this is the only characteristic element.

Does this mean that this founding specifies him sexually? This is very precisely what is going to be called into question in what comes next, because it is still no less the case that the relation Φx is what defines man, attributively this time, as all man.

$$\forall x.\Phi x$$

What is this tout, or this tous? What is this all men inasmuch as it founds one side of the articulation of supplementation?

This question of what a tous is needs to be entirely posed anew on the basis of the function that is articulated as Yad'lun.

17 May 1972

XIV

THEORY OF THE FOUR FORMULAE

A TALK AT SAINTE-ANNE

The analyst's relation to knowledge
Freethinkers in the Vatican Thinking only by means of the One
The modalities of the formulae
The family wowed by the father is a thing of the past

You know that here I say what I think. It's a feminine position, because all things considered, thinking is highly peculiar. So, since I write to you once in a while, I've set down in writing, during a short trip I've just taken, a number of propositions. The first of these is that it has to be acknowledged that the discourse that conditions the psychoanalyst puts him in a position that is, let's say, difficult. Freud said impossible, unmöglich. That's perhaps pushing it a bit. He was speaking for himself.

Second proposition. However little practised he may be in psychoanalysis, the psychoanalyst knows from his experience that he bears a common measure with what I've been saying. This is quite independent of whether he might be informed of what I've been saying, because what I've been saying culminates in locating his knowledge. This is the matter of knowledge about truth.

$$\frac{a}{S_2} \longrightarrow \frac{$}{S_1} \qquad \frac{\text{semblance}}{\text{truth}} \longrightarrow \frac{\text{jouissance}}{\text{surplus jouissance}}$$

Terms Places

The place of truth is on the bottom left. On the top left is the place of semblance. On the top right is the place of jouissance. On the bottom right is the place of surplus jouissance, which I'm writing in an abbreviated form as + de-jouir. For jouissance, we shall put a capital J.

What is difficult is the psychoanalyst's relation to knowledge, and not, of course, his relation to what I've been saying, because across the psychoanalytic no-man's-land as a whole they don't know that I've been saying this. It doesn't mean that they don't know anything about what I've been saying, because it comes from experience, but they abhor what they know about it.

I can say quite simply that I comprehend them. I can say means I can say, if pressed. I comprehend them. I can put myself in their place, and all the more easily in that this is where I am. I comprehend it all the more easily in that, like everyone else, I hear what I say. Nevertheless, this doesn't happen to me every day, because I don't speak every day. In reality, I hear what I say during those few days, say one or two, that come just before my Seminar, because that's the time when I start writing to you. On the other days I'm inundated with the thought of those I've been attending to. I have to confess this because right now I'm dominated by the restlessness of what in Scilicet I called my failure. That's what I called it, and I can still call it that, because seldom do I backtrack. There you have it.

Indeed, they know. I'm calling this to mind because the title of what I'm dealing with here is Le Savoir du psychanalyste. In this case, du connotes le, the definite article in French. Well, it's what is known as definite. Why not des psychanalystes, after what I've just told you? This would be in closer conformity with my theme this year, that is to say, Yad'lun. There are some who say they are such. I'm that much less inclined to dispute their saying so given that there are no others. Why am I saying du? Because I'm speaking to them, despite the presence here of a very large number of people who are not psychoanalysts.

The psychoanalyst, then, knows what I've been saying.

As I said, they know it from experience, however little they may have, even if this is restricted to the didactic aspect which is the minimum requirement for psychoanalysts to say they are such. Even if they miss out on what I've called the Pass, it will be restricted to their having had a didactic psychoanalysis, but at the end of the day this is enough for them to know what I've been saying. When I say that the Pass has been missed out on – all of this is also in Scilicet, which is the appropriate place – it doesn't mean that they haven't gone forward for the experience of the Pass. As I have often underscored, the experience of the Pass is simply what I've been proposing to those who are dedicated enough to expose themselves to it, with the sole purpose of affording information on a very delicate point, which is affirmed in the most certain fashion, namely that it's altogether a-nomalous – object a-nomalous – that someone who has been through a psychoanalysis should want to be a psychoanalyst. This really requires a sort of aberration, which it was worthwhile taking the trouble to offer up to all that might be gathered by way of testimony. This is precisely why I set up this trial run, on a provisional basis, so as to know why someone who knows what psychoanalysis is, through didactic analysis, can still want to be an analyst.

I won't say any more about what is involved in the psychoanalysts' position, simply because I chose The Psychoanalyst's Knowledge as the title I would propose for my return to Sainte-Anne this year. On no account is this designed to make things easy for the psychoanalysts. They have no need of me when it comes to feeling the vertigo of their position, but I'm not about to intensify it by telling them so. Something that could be done – and perhaps I will do so on another occasion, with zest, using a reference that I shall only call historical in inverted commas – is to speak about the word temptation. I'm saying this for the wily ones.

Here, I'm going to speak only of knowledge, and I note that it's not a matter of the truth about knowledge, but of knowledge about truth. Knowledge about truth is articulated by means of the touch that I've been putting forward this year in connection with Yad'lun. Yad'lun and nothing more. It's an altogether particular One, the same that separates 1 from 2, and it's a gulf. I repeat, truth only comes midsay. When the free time is over, which will allow me to respect the alternation, I will speak about the other facet, that of the mi-vrai, the half-true. One ought always to séparer le bon grain et la mivrai, to winnow the wheat from the half-true.[1]

I've just got back from Italy, where I can never be anything but pleased with the welcome I receive, even from my psychoanalyst colleagues. Through one of them I met a third, who is quite up to speed – to my speed, anyway. He has been using Dedekind, and he came across it quite without my influence. I can't say that at the date he first got down to it I wasn't on to it already, but in the end the fact is that I spoke about it much later than he did, because I'm only speaking about it now whereas he'd already written a piece on it. In sum, he realized the value that mathematical elements could possess when it comes to making something emerge that genuinely concerns our experience as analysts.

As he is very highly thought of – he did everything it took for that – he managed to make himself heard in the upper echelons of what is called the IPA. I would translate it as the Institution psychanalytique avouée, the Avowed Psychoanalytic Institution. He managed to make himself heard, but what is most curious is that they wouldn't publish his piece. They declined to publish, saying – you do understand, no one will understand. I must say that this comes as a surprise to me, because they're always so eager to fill the International Journal with a bit of Lacan, in inverted commas, and other items in the same vein that I'm supposed to represent for the botchers of a certain linguistics. Naturally, the more stuff there is in the bin, the less of it can be discerned. So, why the devil did they think they should stymie this case? As far as I am concerned, this is a stymie, and saying that the readers wouldn't understand is secondary. It's not necessary for all the articles in the International Journal to be understood. There's something in it, therefore, that they don't take kindly to.

Since the fellow I just mentioned – I haven't said his name, because you're utterly unfamiliar with his name given that he still hasn't managed to publish anything – is perfectly identifiable, I don't despair of seeing him published in the wake of what will filter through of today's remarks, especially if they find out that I haven't said his name. It seems that his heart is sufficiently set on this for me to help him quite willingly in this matter. Should it fail to appear, I'll speak about it a little more.

So, the psychoanalyst has a complex relationship with what he knows. He renounces it, he represses it – to employ the term that is used in English to translate refoulement, Verdrängung – and it can even happen that he may not want to know anything about it. And why not? What could this confound? Psychoanalysis, you will tell me. In this I hear the blather of someone who has not the faintest idea about psychoanalysis. In response to what might arise from this floor, I reply – is it knowledge that cures, whether the subject's knowledge or the knowledge that is supposed in the transference, or is it transference, such as it is produced in any given analysis? Why should knowledge – the knowledge which I say every psychoanalyst possesses a dimension of – be avowed, as I put it earlier?

It was from this question that Freud took Verwerfung. He calls it a judgement which, in choosing, rejects. He adds, which condemns, but I'm abridging. Just because Verwerfung makes a subject go mad when it is produced in the unconscious, this doesn't mean that the very same, and under the very same name, which Freud borrowed, doesn't rule the world as a rationally justified power.

Psychoanalysts in the plural, in contradistinction to the psychoanalyst, are the preference, the self-preference, you see. They're not the only ones. There is a tradition of this – the medical tradition. When it comes to self-preference, no one's ever done any better, except the saints. S-A-I-N-T-S. I'm spelling it out because people go on so much about the others.[2] The saints also exercise self-preference. They think only of that. They are consumed by finding the best way for self-preference, when there are such simple ways, as shown by the méde-saints, too. Well, the médecins, the doctors, are not saints. This goes without saying. Few things are so abject to leaf through as the history of medicine. It could be recommended as a purgative or an emetic. It works as both. When it comes to knowing that knowledge has nothing to do with truth, there is really nothing more convincing. It might even be said that this goes so far as to turn the doctor into a sort of provocateur. This doesn't mean that the doctors didn't see to it that psychoanalysis would be brought to their heel, and for reasons that had to do with how the platform that the doctors shared with the discourse of science was becoming more confined. They were dab hands at this, and all the more so given that the psychoanalyst, who was in a terrible bind with his position, felt that much more disposed to receive counsel from experience. A purposeful article by Freud, on Laienanalyse, took a stand against this plotting.

I insist on underscoring this point in history, which was an altogether key moment as far as my affair is concerned. Due to the plotting that happened shortly after the war, I had lost the match before even making my first move. I declare, however, that it was very precisely on account of knowing full well at the time that I had lost the match that I made my move. I'm bearing witness this evening, and I'd like you to believe me on this matter. It's no accident that I'm doing so at Sainte-Anne because I told you that here I say what I think. A whole load of matches get played out in such conditions. There's nothing heroic about it. It's even one of the fundaments of what they call the human condition, and it doesn't come off any worse than any other enterprise. The proof is right here. The only drawback – though not for me alone – is that it doesn't afford you much liberty. I say this with a passing thought for the person who questioned me on whether or not I believed in freedom.

When I say I'd noticed perfectly well that the match was lost, I ask you to believe me. After all, I wasn't so shrewd. Perhaps I thought I should plough into it, and that I could mess up the Avowed Psychoanalytic International. But I have another declaration to make, and this time no one can dispute what I'm about to say. It's that I never dropped any of the people I knew were going to leave me, before they left of their own accord. And this is true also of the period to which I alluded a moment ago, when the match was lost for France, the little brouhaha amid the plotting by the medically qualified psychoanalysts, which gave rise to the start of my teaching in 1953.

On those days when I don't harbour the idea of pursuing this teaching, that is to say a certain many, needless to say I get the idea, like any imbecile, of what it might have been for French psychoanalysis if I had been able to teach where, for the reason I've just mentioned, I wasn't remotely disposed to let anyone drop. I mean that however scandalous were my propositions on the Function and Field. . . and yackety-yak . . . of Speech and Language, I was minded to smooth out the wrinkles even for the hardest of hearing, and, at the point we've now reached, no one among the psychoanalysts would have lost out.

By the way, someone sent me a tooth mug. I'm saying this for those who were up at the Panthéon last time. I'd like to know who it was, in order to thank them. I'd like to thank them all the more extensively given that it's not a tooth mug. It's a marvellous little red glass, tall and curved, in which I shall place a rose, whoever it was who sent me it. But I only received one, I have to say. Anyway, let's move on.

I told you that I'd made a little tour of Italy. There are people who like me a bit in practically every corner, even in the wings of the Vatican. Why not, after all? There are some great people there. For the person who questioned me about freedom, I shall say that the only freethinkers I know are in the Vatican. For my part, I'm no freethinker. I'm forced to stick to what I've been saying, but over there in the Vatican, what ease they have! You can understand how the French Revolution was helped along by the abbots. If you knew what liberty they have, my dear friends, it would send a shiver down your spine. I try to bring them back to the hard line, but there's no way. They outflank me. For them, psychoanalysis is old hat. You can see what use freethinking has. They're clear-sighted.

Yet it was a good profession, don't you think? It had a good side. When they say that it's old hat, they know what they're talking about. They're saying, It's shot, because one really ought to do a bit better. I'm saying this to forewarn those people who are not behind the times, and particularly of course those who follow me, that you should have a second think before getting your descendants involved, because it's quite possible that, given the way things are going, it will come to a sudden stop. Well, this is just for those who would get their descendants involved. I advise them to be prudent.

I've already spoken about what is happening in psychoanalysis. Some points that I've already broached really need to be specified, and consequently, now that we've come this far, I think I can look briefly at the discourse of the analyst. It's the only discourse among the four that I have catalogued – and in this we may pay homage to it – that is such that knavery necessarily culminates in foolery.[3] If you were to know straightaway that someone who comes to ask you for a didactic analysis is a knave, you would tell him – No psychoanalysis for you, dear fellow, you'll become simplicity itself. But you cannot know this. It's carefully dissimulated. One does come to know, however, after a certain while of psychoanalysis. Knavery is not hereditary. It's not a matter of heredity, but rather of the desire, the desire of the Other, from which the one in question has arisen. It's not always his parents' desire. It might be his grandparents' desire. But if the desire from which he was born is the desire of a knave, then he is inevitably a knave. I've never seen an exception to this. This is even why I have always been so tender with the people I knew would leave me, at least in those cases where I was the one who had psychoanalysed them, because I knew they had become utter fools.

I can't say I did this on purpose. As I've told you, it's necessary. It's necessary when a psychoanalysis is pushed to the end, which is the least that ought to be done for a didactic analysis. If the analysis is not didactic, then it's a question of tact. You have to leave the fellow enough knavery for him thereafter to fend decently for himself. This is therapeutic in the proper sense. You should let him stay afloat. But for didactic psychoanalysis, you can't do that, because goodness knows what that would lead to. Imagine a psychoanalyst who has remained a knave. This haunts everyone's thoughts. Rest assured, contrary to what one might believe, psychoanalysis is always didactic in the true sense, even when practised by a fool, and, I would even say, all the more so in such cases. Anyway, the only risk is to have foolish psychoanalysts. As I've just told you, however, at the end of the day there are no drawbacks, because the object a in the place of semblance is a position that can be held. People can also be fools to begin with. It's very important to distinguish between the two.

As for me, I have found no better than what I've been calling matheme to approach something that concerns knowledge about truth, because all in all it's in psychoanalysis that we have managed to give it a functional scope.

It's far better when Peirce deals with it. He sets down the functions 0 and 1 to designate the two truth values. On the other hand, he doesn't imagine that one can write capital T or capital F for True and False. Up at the Panthéon, I've already indicated in a few sentences that there are two stages in relation to Yad'lun. There is the Parmenides and, then, set theory. They had to get to set theory in order to pose the question of a knowledge that takes truth as a mere function, which is far from contenting itself with this, and which also entails a real that has nothing to do with truth. None the less, we have to believe that for centuries mathematics bypassed any question of this because it was only late in the day, and through the intermediary of a logical examination, that it led a step to be taken towards this question, which is crucial for what is involved in truth, namely how and why Yad'lun.

You will excuse me. I'm not alone in this.

Around this One revolves the question of existence. I've already made some remarks in this regard, namely that existence had never been tackled as such before a certain age, and that it took a long while to extract it from essence. I've spoken of the fact that, strictly speaking, there is nothing in Greek that would commonly mean to exist. Not that I'm unaware of ἐξίστημι, ἐξίσταμαι, but rather that I observe that no philosopher ever made use of it. Yet this is where something gets under way that might interest us. It's a matter of knowing what exists. Il n'existe que de l'Un. There is no existence but on the basis of the One.

Set theory is the examination of why Yad'lun. Whatever you may think, the One is not a dime a dozen, including the utterly illusory certitude, which has long been such – this doesn't stop people from holding to it – that you are One of them as well. You just have to raise your little finger to perceive that not only are you not One, but that you are, alas, innumerable. You are each innumerable for yourself. You are innumerable right up to the point that you will be taught – which might be one of the good results of the psychoanalytic contribution – that you are, depending on the case, either quite finis,[4] for the men, it's clear, you are finis, finis, finis, or, for the women, denumerable. I'm saying this rather briskly because I don't know for how much longer I'll be able to carry on. I shall try briefly to explain to you something that is starting to clear a path for you, because of course this is not one of those things that is blindingly obvious, especially when you don't know what finite and denumerable mean. However, if you follow my indications a little, you will read anything and everything, because this abounds in all the books on set theory these days, even to take an opposing stance.

There is a certain someone who is very kind, whom I hope to see later in order to apologize for not having brought back a book that I did everything I could to find, and which is out of print. He passed it on to me last time, and it's called Cantor a tort. It's a very good book. It's clear that Cantor a tort, that Cantor is wrong, from a certain standpoint, but he is incontestably right for the simple fact that what he put forward has given rise to innumerable descendants in mathematics. It all comes down to whatever allows mathematics to advance. This is enough for it to stand up for itself.

Even if Cantor is wrong from the standpoint of those who have claimed – we don't know why – that they know what number is, the entire history of mathematics, well before Cantor, demonstrated that there is no place where it is more true that the impossible is the real.[5] This began with the Pythagoreans, who one day were struck by the patent fact – which they must have known full well because they should not be taken for infants either – that the square root of 2 is not commensurable. This was taken up by the philosophers. However, just because this has come down to us by way of the Theaetetus, it shouldn't be thought that the mathematicians of the time were not up to it, or incapable of responding. Indeed, having realized that the incommensurable existed, they started to pose the question of what number is.

I'm not going to go over the whole history. There is a certain business of the square root of minus one, which has since been labelled – we don't know why – imaginary. There is nothing less imaginary than the square root of minus one, as was proved by what came in the wake of its discovery, because this is where what are called complex numbers emerged from. Complex numbers are among the most useful and productive things that have ever been created in mathematics. In short, the more objections that are levelled at what is involved in this entry via the One, that is, via the integer, the more it is demonstrated that the real is generated in mathematics precisely from the impossible. It is precisely in so far as something was able to be generated by way of Cantor, which was nothing less than Russell's entire life's work, and indeed infinitely many other points that have been extremely productive in function theory, that it is quite certain that, with regard to the real, Cantor is the one who is wholly on track in what is at issue.

If I'm suggesting to you, the psychoanalysts, to get a bit up to speed with this, it's because there is something to be got from it, in your guilty pleasures, of course. I'm saying this because I'm dealing with beings who ponder – who ponder, of course, because they can't do otherwise – who ponder, like Telemachus, or at least like the Telemachus described by Paul-Jean Toulet, who pense à la dépense. They ponder expending. Well, it's a matter of knowing whether you analysts, and those whom you steer, spend your time in vain or not.

In this regard, the pathos of pondering, which for you may result from a short initiation in set theory – though it shouldn't be too brief – is of such a nature as to make you reflect about notions like existence, for example. It's clear that only once there had been a certain reflection on mathematics did existence take on its meaning. Everything that had previously been said about it, through a sort of presentiment, in particular a religious presentiment, namely that God exists, strictly speaking only holds meaning in that it lays the accent on the following point – I have to mettre l'accent, to lay the accent, because there are people who take me for a maître à penser – whether you're a believer or not, bear the following in mind. With God, you have to count. I don't believe in Him, but no one gives a stuff. For those who do believe it's the same thing. Whether you believe in Him or not, it's absolutely unavoidable.

This is why I'm writing once again on the blackboard the formulae around which I've tried to make what is involved in what is claimed to be sexual relation revolve.

$\exists x.\overline{\Phi x}$ $\quad\quad$ $\overline{\exists x.\overline{\Phi x}}$

$\forall x.\Phi x$ $\quad\quad$ $\overline{\forall x}.\Phi x$

Here, $\exists x.\overline{\Phi x}$ means there exists an x determined by having said no to the phallic function. The phallic function dominates sexual relation. I write it Φx. You can already see the question of existence being linked to something that we cannot fail to recognize as a fact of saying. It's a saying no, and even, I would say, a naysaying. This is crucial. It is what indicates for us, for our analytic training, the exact point at which we must take up what is stated by set theory – there is at-least-one who naysays.

This is a marker.[6] But it's a marker that doesn't hold up even for an instant, that is neither instructive nor teachable, if we do not conjoin it to another quantifier that is set down within the four terms, namely the quantifier that is said to be universal.

Thus, $\forall x.\Phi x$ is the point from which it may be said, as is stated in Freudian doctrine, that the only desire, the only libido – it's the same thing – is masculine. In truth, this is an error, but it is still the case that it's an error that has all its worth as a marker.

Next, $\overline{\exists x}.\overline{\Phi x}$ means that no x exists to say that it is not true that the phallic function is what dominates sexual relation.

Meanwhile, at a level that is complementary to these three terms, we ought to write – I'm not saying that we can write – $\overline{\forall x}.\Phi x$, the function of pas-tout, not-all, as the function that is essential to a certain type of relation to the phallic function, inasmuch as the latter founds sexual relation.

This is what turns these four inscriptions into a set. Without this set, it is impossible to orient oneself correctly in what is at issue in the practice of analysis, inasmuch as it has to do with something that is commonly defined as man, on the one hand, while on the other the corresponding term is generally qualified as woman, which leaves it on its own.[7] If it is left on its own, this is not the fault of the corresponding term. It's the fault of man.

However, fault or no fault, this is not a matter that we should settle immediately. I shall say in passing that what we need to examine for the time being is the meaning that these four functions might have inasmuch as their quantic coupling diversifies them. For the four are merely two, one being the negation of the function and the other the opposite function.

It is clear that what is meant by $\exists x.\overline{\Phi x}$ reaches far enough back to the origin for it to be said that Freud's ignorance of it is utterly confounding. This $\exists x$ negation of Φx, this at-least-one, this One all alone,[8] which is determined as the effect of naysaying the phallic function, is very precisely the corner beneath which we need to place everything that has so far been said about Totem and Taboo, so that it can be something other than a myth.[9]

This holds all the more interest in that it is not a matter of genesis, nor of history, nor of anything whatsoever that might resemble an event, even though this is what Freud seems to have called it at some moments. It could not be an event in that it is represented for us as standing prior to all history. There is only an event when connoted as such in something that is stated. It's a matter of structure. The myth of Totem and Taboo is designed in the most patent fashion so that one may speak of tout homme, of man one and all, as being subject to castration.

Is it really necessary to start returning to mytheme-atical functions to set out a logical fact? Namely that, if it is true that the unconscious is structured like a language, then the function of castration is necessitated by it. Indeed, this is exactly what is implied by something eluding it. And whatever it is that eludes it is not inevitably something human. Why should it be? This is in the myth. Why not see the father of the primal murder as an orang-utan? A number of items coincide in this regard in the Judaic tradition, from which, all the same, it has to be said that psychoanalysis arose. The year when I didn't care to deliver more than the first session of my Seminar on the Names-of-the-Father, I still had time to accentuate that in Abraham's sacrifice, what is sacrificed is effectively the father, which is none other than a ram. As in any self-respecting human lineage, its mythical descent is animal.

All things considered, what is at issue is what I said to you the other day about the function of hunting in man. I could have told you more about the fact that the hunter loves his quarry, just like the sons in the said primordial event in the Freudian mythology who kill the father, like those you can see traces of in the Lascaux caves. They killed him, my goodness, because they loved him, of course, as the ensuing part proved. The ensuing part is woeful. The ensuing part is very precisely that all the men, $\forall x$, the universality of men, is subject to castration.

At the point from which we are speaking, we shall not call the fact that there is an exception mythical. This exception is the inclusive function. What is to be stated of the universal, besides that the universal is enclosed by negative possibility? More exactly, existence here plays the role of the complement, or to speak more mathematically, of the boundary. Thus, somewhere there is an all x. This all x becomes the upside-down A of $\forall$ whenever it is embodied in what may be called One Being, one being at least that posits itself as Being, and specifically in the capacity of man.

This is very precisely what means that it is in the other column, and with a type of relation that is fundamental, that something may be articulated – for anyone who knows how to think with these symbols – in the capacity of woman. Simply by articulating it thus, $\overline{\exists x}.\overline{\Phi x}$, it gives us a sense of how there is something remarkable, remarkable for you, in what is thereby stated, namely that in the statement that it is not true that the phallic function dominates what is involved in sexual relation, there is not one who would take exception to it. To allow you to find your way here by means of references that will be a little more familiar to you, I shall say, my goodness, since I spoke earlier of the Father, that this There does not exist any x that is determined as a subject in the statement of naysaying the phallic function, concerns the virgin, properly speaking. You know that Freud reports on the taboo of virginity, and other outlandishly folkloric stories about this business, and the fact that in times gone by the virgins were not to be fucked by just anyone. It had to be a high priest or a local lord. Anyway, no matter. This is not the important thing.

What is important is what we may say in connection with this function of the vir, which is so striking in that, at the end of the day, people only ever say of a woman that she is virile.[10] Should you have ever heard anyone say of a guy that he is virile, you will point him out to me. It would be of interest to me. Here, however, while the man is anything you please of this sort, a vir-tuoso, vir-ing to the portside, make ready to vir, vir whatever you like, the virile is on the side of woman.[11] She's the only one who believes in it. She thinks. This is even what characterizes her. In a short while I'm going to explain to you in detail why the virgo is not denumerable. It's because she is located between the 1 and the 0, contrary to the One which is on the side of the Father. It is well known that what lies between 0 and 1, even when one a tort, when one is wrong, is demonstrated in Cantor's theory, and in a way that I find absolutely marvellous.

There are at least a few people here who know what I'm talking about, such that I shall give a brief indication of it. What lies between 1 and 0 is altogether demonstrable. It can be demonstrated with decimals. We use decimals in the system that goes by the same name. Let's suppose – you have to suppose – that this system is denumerable. The method known as the Diagonal Method can allow you always to forge a new decimal sequence such that it is certainly not inscribed in what has been numerated. It is strictly impossible to construct this denumerable, to provide even a way, however meagre, of lining it up, which is the most straightforward operation because the denumerable is defined by its correspondence with the sequence of integers.

We begin, therefore, with a pure and simple let's suppose. In this respect, we will quite readily accuse Cantor, as is done in the book Cantor a tort, of having quite simply forged a vicious circle. A vicious circle, my good friends, but why not! The more vicious a circle is, the more fun it is, especially if you can get something to emerge from it, something like this little bird called the non-denumerable, which is one of the most pre-eminent and one of the most ingenious things ever invented, and which tallies most closely with the real of number. Well, let's move on. The 11,000 virgins, as is said in the Legenda aurea, is the way to express the non-denumerable, because 11,000 is an enormous figure for virgins, and not only in this day and age.

Having pointed up these facts, let's try now to understand what becomes of this pas-toute, this not-all [in the feminine], which is truly the vital point, the original point, in what I have written up on the blackboard, because until now the function of the pas-tous has never been put forward as such in logic.

In so far as the pattern of thinking is, so to speak, undermined by the lack of sexual relation, we think only by means of the One. The universal is something that results from the envelopment of a certain field by something of the order of One, with the proviso that the veritable signification of set is precisely that it is the mathematical notation of this something in which, alas, I am not without responsibility, which is a certain definition that I have noted as barred S. This barred S is the subject, the subject inasmuch as it is nothing other than the effect of the signifier. In other words, it is what is represented by a signifier for another signifier. Some fellows – who were the least equipped to bring to light what is involved in the subject – found themselves, at a certain turning point in history, necessitated, as it were, in this respect. The set is nothing other than the subject. This is precisely why it cannot even be handled without the addition of the empty set.

I would say that up to a certain point the empty set is differentiated in its necessity in that it can be taken for an element of the set. Without inscribing the brackets that designate the set that has the empty set as its element, $\{\varnothing\}$, any handling of this function is absolutely unthinkable. I believe I've already indicated this sufficiently, but I will repeat that this function was devised very precisely at a certain turning point in order to examine, from the logical standpoint, but at the level of common language – the language of everybody, because on no account does *meta*language govern here – what is involved in the impact of number in language itself. Number is something that has nothing to do with language. Number is more real than anything, and the discourse of science has amply revealed this.

The pas-tout, not-all, is very precisely what results from the fact, not that nothing bounds it, but that the bound is located in a different way. To go quickly, I will say that contrary to the inclusion in $\exists x.\overline{\Phi x}$ – namely, there exists the Father whose saying no situates him in relation to the phallic function – it is in so far as there is the void, the lack, the absence of anything whatsoever that denies the phallic function at the level of woman that, conversely, there is nothing but this something that the not-all formulates in woman's position with regard to the phallic function. For her, this function is, in effect, pas-toute, not-all. This doesn't mean that she negates this function, in any capacity whatsoever.

I won't say that she is Other, because the mode whereby she does not exist in this function, which is very precisely the mode of negating it, is that she is the same as what is inscribed on my graph by the signifier of the Other as barred, $S(\not{A})$. Woman is not the locus of the Other. More to the point, she is inscribed as not being the Other in the function that I give to the capital A, namely the locus of truth. Just as I translated here, in $\exists x.\overline{\Phi x}$, the existence of the naysaying using the function of the empty set, what is inscribed here, in $\overline{\exists x}.\overline{\Phi x}$, in the non-existence of what might negate the phallic function, is the fact of absenting oneself, and even of being this jouis-centre. This jouis-centre is conjugated to what I shall call, not an absence, but a de-sense-cy. Woman is posited for the signifying fact, not only that the big Other is not here – since it's not her – but that it is altogether elsewhere, in the locus where speech is located.

Since you have had the patience to carry on listening to me – it's already eleven o'clock – I still have to designate the gap that separates each of these terms in so far as they are statements. This is crucial among the number of crystallizing themes that I'm pressing forward for you now that we're at the end of the year.

Between There exists, $\exists x$, and There does not exist, $\overline{\exists x}$ – there's no need to garble this – lies existence.

Between There exists one who does not . . ., $\exists x.\overline{\Phi x}$, and There is not one who is not . . ., $\forall x.\Phi x$, there lies contradiction. When Aristotle highlights particular propositions to contrast them with universal propositions, he establishes contradiction between a particular affirmative and a universal negative. Here, it's the contrary. The particular is negative and the universal is affirmative.

Between the $\overline{\exists x}.\overline{\Phi x}$, which is the negation of any universality, and this $\overline{\forall x}.\Phi x$, we have the undecidable. This is just an indication. I'll be accounting for it afterwards.

What is at issue between the two universal quantifiers, $\forall x$ and $\overline{\forall x}$? I think that all of our experience of this situation shows that this is not so straightforward. We will call it lack. We will call it a rift. We will call it, if you like, desire. And to be more rigorous, we shall call it the object a.

$\exists x.\overline{\Phi x}$	existence	$\overline{\exists x}.\overline{\Phi x}$
contradiction		undecidable lack rift desire
$\forall x.\Phi x$	object a	$\overline{\forall x}.\Phi x$

It's now a matter of finding out how, in the midst of all this, something functions that may resemble a circulation. For this, we have to ask ourselves about the mode in which these four terms are posited.

The $\exists x$ on the top left is literally the necessary. Nothing is thinkable. It is absolutely not our function – for the rest of us men – to think. Well, when it comes to a woman, there is thinking. This is even from time to time the thought therefore I am. In which, of course, she deceives herself. But as far as the necessary is concerned, it is absolutely necessary, to think about anything whatsoever to do with relations that are called human relations – we don't know why – within the experience that is established by the analytic discourse, to posit that there exists one for whom castration is told to scram. This is what Freud tells us in the cock-and-bull story of Totem and Total Bull. What does castration mean? It means that it leaves everything to be desired. It means nothing but that. To think this through, that is to say, to think this through on the basis of woman, there has to be one who leaves nothing to be desired. This is the story of the Oedipus myth, but it's absolutely necessary.[12] If you lose sight of this, I really don't see what would allow you to find your bearings in any way whatsoever. It's very important to find your bearings.

I've already told you that this $\exists x$ is the necessary. Necessary on what basis? Precisely on the basis of what, my word, I wrote just now – the undecidable. In the end, we can say absolutely nothing that resembles anything that might constitute a truth function if we do not admit the necessity of there being at-least-one who says no. I'm insisting a little because this evening, due to the disturbances outside, I haven't been able to tell you all the niceties that I would have liked to be able to tell you on this score. I do have one, however, which is very nice indeed, and since I'm being teased, I'll come out with it. It's the function of l'é-pater.

People have been wondering a great deal about the function of the paterfamilias. What we may require of the function of the father needs to be better focused. How people indulge in these stories of paternal shortcoming! It's a fact that there is a crisis. This is not completely false. L'é-pater ne nous épate plus. His wowing us is a thing of the past. This is the only genuinely decisive function of the father. I've already marked out how it was not the Oedipus complex, how it was shot, how if the father was a legislator, the child this would produce is President Schreber. No more no less. On any plane, the father is the one who ought to wow the family. If the father no longer wows the family, something better will be found. It's not inevitable that he should be the father in flesh and blood. There is always one who will wow the family, which as everyone knows amounts to a herd of slaves. There are others who will wow them.

You can see how the French language can serve many things. I explained this to you last time by starting with fondre or fonder, founding, d'eux, from them, a One. In the subjunctive it's the same word. To fonder you have to fondre. There are some things that can only be expressed in the French language. This is precisely why there is an unconscious, because equivoques are what found, in both senses of the word. Indeed, this is all there is. If you take tous and try to see how it is expressed in each language, you will find heaps of things, some absolutely terrific things. For my part, I have been looking into Chinese, because I can't make a catalogue of the languages of the whole world. Also, through the intermediary of the charming treasurer of our School, I questioned someone who got her father to write down how they say tous in Yoruba. It's crazy. I do this for the love of the art, but I know full well that, either way, I will find in every language that there is a means to say tous.

What is of interest to me is the signifier as One. This is what is used in every language. The only interest that the signifier holds is the equivoques that can emerge from it. That is to say, something of the order of fonde d'eux un Un, and other such messing about. This is the only interesting thing because what for us is involved in tous – you will always find this expressed – is unavoidably semantic. The mere fact that I may say that I would like to examine all the languages resolves the question because les langues, precisely, ne sont pas toutes, they are not all. This is their definition. On the other hand, when I ask you about tous, you understand. There you have it. In the end, semantics comes down to translatability. What else could I offer as a definition of this? It is thanks to semantics that a man and a woman comprehend each other only when they do not speak the same language. I'm telling you this to give you some exercises, because that's what I'm here for, and also perhaps to open up a little your comprenoire on the use I've been making of linguistics.

I want to wind this up.

With respect to what is involved in what necessitates existence, our point of departure is the gap of the undecidable [i], that is, between the not-all and the pas-une, the not-one [ii]. After, this goes to existence [iii]. Then, it goes to all men are under the might of castration [iv]. It goes to the possible, because the universal is never anything but that. When you say all men are mammals, it means all the possible men might be so.

And after that, where does it go? It goes to the object a [v]. It is with the object a that we are in relation. And where does it go after that? It goes here, where woman is distinguished in not being unifying [vi]. All that remains is to complete this, here, in order to go towards contradiction [vii]. We're coming back from the pas-toute, from the not-all which is, in sum, nothing other than the expression of contingency.

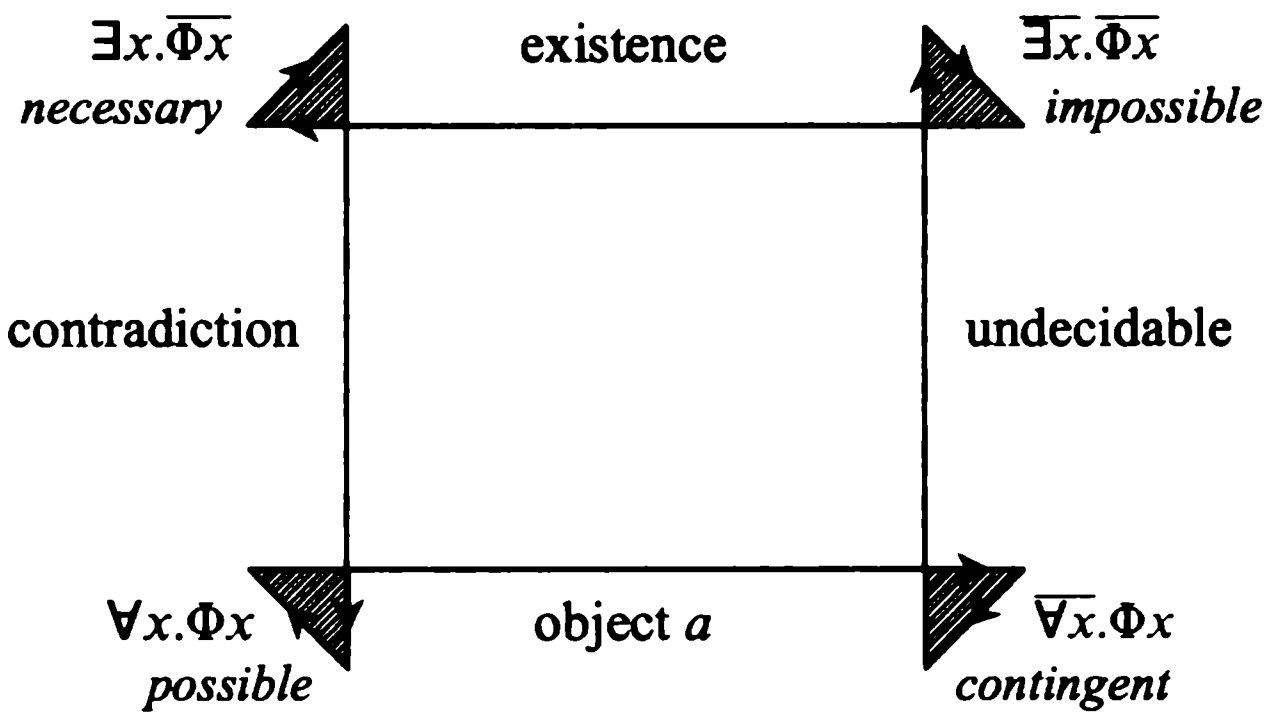
As I pointed out in its time, the alternation between necessity, the contingent, the possible and the impossible is not in the order that Aristotle gives, because what is at issue here is the impossible, that is to say, all things considered, the real.

So, follow this little path carefully, because it will be of use to us in the near future. You will be seeing something of it. The four triangles in the corners need to be indicated, too, along with the direction of the arrows.[13]



There you have it. I feel I've had enough for this evening. I have no desire to end with a show-stopping peroration. It's a matter of clearing the way. Let me check – necessary, impossible, possible, and contingent. Yes, it's written correctly enough. You will hear the rest when I give the next session of my Seminar up by the Panthéon. I'm not sure whether this is to be the last.

1 June 1972

CODA

XV

THE DESIRE TO SLEEP

Creating the verb unigate
Dreams according to Freud
The body's access to jouissance Pollution represented in existence
The objection against argumentum ad absurdum

Given what I shall call the mixing, the communicating, that has occurred between my audience here and the audience at Sainte-Anne, I'm supposing that they have now become unified, this being the operative word. Last time at Sainte-Anne you saw that we have passed from what one day I labelled here, using a predicate specially formed for your use, the Unian, to a term of another fashioning, which may be promoted in the verb form unier, to unigate.

What I put forward last time, at Sainte-Anne, is the pivotal point that is taken in this order that is founded by the One. Put fonde, indeed fondez-le, in order for it to be fondé-fondu, a founded founding. All in all, I was pressing home that this founding should not appear to you as something overly fundamental. This is what I'm labelling as le laisser dans le fondu, to leave this founding unigate in a founded state.

There exists one who naysays. It's not quite the same thing as negating, but from this forging of the term unigate, as a verb that can be conjugated, we may assert that for what is involved in the function that is represented in analysis by the myth of the Father, it unigates.

This is what was there for the hearing for those who managed to hearken through the bangers reverberating around Sainte-Anne, and this is what today I should like to enable you to accommodate, let's say.

1

So, the Father unigates.

In the myth, he has the correlate of toutes, of all the women. If we follow my quantic inscriptions, there is cause to introduce a modification here. Certainly he unigates them, but precisely pas toutes, not all.

Something is touched on here that is not my own invention, namely the kinship between logic and myth. It simply marks out how the former can rectify the latter.

This is the work that lies ahead of us. For the time being, I will remind you that with what I permitted myself in terms of approximations of the Father, with what I inscribed using l'é-pater, you can see that the path that occasionally leads myth to meet up with derision is no stranger to us. In no respect does this touch on the fundamental status of the structures concerned.

It's amusing that there are people who are discovering, somewhat late in the day, terms like signifier, sign, signification and semiotics. From where I'm standing I can say that all the buzz and excitement that is being produced around these terms is a bit non-specific. It's on the centre stage, right now. The peculiar belatedness that is being shown in this respect is quite curious.

There is a little journal that is rather good, well, no worse than any other, in which, under the heading L'Atelier d'écriture, I've seen an article that, my goodness, is no worse than any other, called 'L'Agonie du signe'. Agony is always very touching. Agony means struggle, but it also means that someone is about to pass out. So, there is pathos in the agony of the sign. I would have preferred all this not to be revolving around pathos.

The article begins with a delightful invention, the possibility of forging a new signifier, that of fourmidable. Indeed, the whole article is fourmidable, and it begins by asking what the status of this fourmidable might be.

This is very much to my liking. All the more so given that it's someone who for a good while now has been fully abreast of a number of things that I have been putting forward. Yet at the start of the article he feels compelled to play the innocent, namely to hesitate over whether fourmidable should be classified as metaphor or as metonymy. He also feels compelled to say that there is something that has been neglected in Jakobson's theory, the theory that purportedly consists in running words into one another. But I explained this ages ago. I wrote L'Instance de la lettre expressly for this purpose. Capital S over lower case s, with the result of 1 effect of signification [I over s]. It's displacement, it's condensation, it's very precisely the path along which one can create unigate, which is all the same a little bit more amusing and useful than fourmidable.

Then, unigate can be used for something else. It can be used to explain, along another path, what I completely relinquished tackling along the path of the Name-of-the-Father. I relinquished this because at a particular moment I was prevented from doing so. And then, the people who prevented me were precisely the ones to whom it might have been of service. It might have been of service to them in their private lives. These are people who are particularly implicated on the side of the Name-of-the-Father. There is in this world a very special clique, which can be pinpointed as a religious tradition. They are the ones whom this might have aerated, but I don't see why I should devote myself especially to them.

So, I've been explaining the story that Freud broached as best he could, precisely to avoid his own story. El Shaddai, in particular. This is the name to designate the one whose name is not uttered. Freud turned to the myths, and then he produced something very proper, something that was a little aseptic. He didn't push it any further, but this is very much what is at issue.

Opportunities were missed to look again at what was steering him, and which should have meant that psychoanalysis would now be at its rightful place in its discourse. The chance has been missed.

2

On the aeroplane back from Milan yesterday evening, I came upon a really very nice article in a thing called Atlas, which is handed out to Air France passengers. I don't have it with me. I forgot to bring it, and fortunately so because that would have led me to read you some passages from it and there's nothing so tiresome as to hear people read aloud. Anyway, it informs us that there are high-flying psychologists in America who have been investigating dreams. Because people investigate dreams, don't they?

They've been investigating, and they've found that, in the end, sexual dreams are very few and far between. These people dream about everything. They dream about sport. They dream about a whole load of josh. They dream about falling. But, in the end, there is not an overwhelming majority of sexual dreams. Since the widely held conception of psychoanalysis, so we are told in this text, is to believe that dreams are sexual, the general public, which comprises the psychoanalytic propagation – you are a general public as well – is naturally going to be peeved. The whole soufflé is going to collapse, just like that, to sink to the bottom of the dish.

Among this supposed general public – because all this is supposition – it's true that there is a certain resonance according to which Freud is purported to have said that all dreams are sexual. Except that he never, ever, said that. He said that dreams were dreams of desire. He never said it was sexual desire.

It took me some time to broach the relation between, on the one hand, the fact that dreams are dreams of desire and, on the other, this realm of the sexual that is characterized by what I have been putting forward.

I had to avoid throwing the spirit of these nice people into disorder, the same people who after ten years of my recounting them stuff thought only of returning to the bosom of the International Psychoanalytic Association. They were very nice exercises that I recounted, exercises in style, but these fellows were getting down to serious business. The serious business is the International Psychoanalytic Association. Which means that now I can assert, and it can be heard, that there is no such thing as sexual relation.

It is for this reason that this amounts to a whole order that is functioning in the place where this relation would be. It is here, in this order, that something has a consequence as an effect of language, namely desire. One could perhaps take a small step forward and ask, when Freud said that the dream is the satisfaction of a desire, in what sense is satisfaction to be taken?

When I think that I'm still here, and that among all these people who have set themselves to obfuscating what I say, to turning it into noise, no one has ever dared to assert the very thing that is nevertheless the strict consequence of everything I articulated in the most precise fashion, in 1957 if memory serves – no, even earlier, in '55 – in connection with the dream of Irma's injection.

To show how one ought to treat a text of Freud's, I carefully explained to them what was ambiguous. I explained that it is here, at the level of his present preoccupations, and not at all in the unconscious, that Freud interprets this dream, this dream of desire that has nothing to do with sexual desire, even if there are all the implications of transference that suit us down to the ground.

I put forward the term immixing of subjects in 1955.[1] Can you imagine? Seventeen years ago. I will have to publish that Seminar. I haven't done so already because I was absolutely sickened by the way it was taken up in a book that came out under the title L'Autoanalyse de Freud. It was my text, but added to in a way that no one would understand anything of it.

What does a dream do? It doesn't satisfy desire, for reasons that are fundamental, and which I won't start developing today because it would require four or five sessions. It's for the simple reason that Freud says that the only fundamental desire when asleep is the desire to sleep.

It's making you laugh because you've never heard this. Fair enough. Yet it's in Freud.

How is it that this fact of what sleeping consists in doesn't occur straightaway to your gumption? It consists in suspending what is in my tetrad – semblance, truth, jouissance, and surplus jouissance. Anyone can just take a look at any sleeping animal to realize that sleep is designed to suspend the ambiguousness that there is in the body's relation to itself, namely the deriving of jouissance therefrom.

The body's possibility of gaining access to deriving jouissance from itself is plain to see everywhere. When it bumps into something. When it gets hurt. That's what jouissance is. So, here, mankind has some small ports of entry that the others don't have. He can turn it into a goal. In any case, when he sleeps, it's over.

When one sleeps, it's a matter of making the body coil up. It rolls itself into a ball. To sleep is not to be disturbed. After all, jouissance is disturbing. Naturally, the body gets disturbed, but so long as it's asleep, it can hope not to be disturbed. This is why, from then on, all the rest vanishes. Nor is it a question any more of semblance, nor of truth – because all of this holds together, it's the same thing – nor of surplus jouissance.

Except, there you have it. What Freud says is that, during this time, the signifier is still on the go. This is indeed why, even when I'm sleeping, I'm preparing my seminars. Monsieur Poincaré was discovering the Fuchsian functions.

3

[Various noises]

What's going on?

A MAN IN THE AUDIENCE – Pollution![2]

Who said that? This precise term? I'm especially glad to hear you choose this term. You must be particularly intelligent.

I have already expressed in public how delighted I was that someone I analysed, who is here today somewhere – she's a particularly sensitive person – spoke about my discourse as intellectual pollution.

Pollution is an altogether fundamental dimension, you see. I probably wouldn't have pushed things quite that far today, but you seem to be so proud of having come out with this term pollution that

I suspect you might understand nothing of it. Nevertheless, you will see that not only am I going to make use of it, but also I'm glad a second time that someone should have come out with it, because this is precisely the difficulty of the analytic discourse.

I'm picking up on this interruption, seizing on it, taking on board something that, in the urgency of the end of the year, I find myself having occasion to say.

It is precisely in so far as the analytic discourse is characterized by locating the object a in the place of semblance that – can you imagine, sir, thinking you'd pulled quite a stunt – you've gone exactly in the direction of what I have to put forward, namely that the pollution that is most characteristic in this world is the object a, from which man takes his substance, you included.

In having to turn himself, in his body, in his existence as an analyst, into the representation of this pollution, which is the most certain effect across the surface of the globe, he has to take more than one look at this. It's made the little darlings ill, and I must tell you that I'm no more at ease in this situation than they are.

What I'm trying to demonstrate to them is that it's not entirely impossible to do so with a little decency. Thanks to logic, if they would kindly allow themselves to be tempted by it, I've managed to make this position bearable for them, the position that they occupy as a in the analytic discourse. It would allow them to conceive of how raising this function to a position of semblance, which is the key position in any discourse, is clearly no small matter. Here lies the mainspring of what I have always been trying to make you feel as the analyst's resistance – which is only too understandable – to truly fulfilling his function.

It oughtn't to be believed that the position of semblance is easy for anyone and everyone. It is tenable only at the level of scientific discourse. This is for the very simple reason that what is carried to the command position here is something that belongs utterly to the order of the real inasmuch as all that we touch on by way of the real is the Spaltung, the split, in other words, the way that I define the subject. This is because in scientific discourse it is the barred capital S that holds this key position.

For the university discourse, it is knowledge. The difficulty is yet greater here due to a kind of short-circuit, because in order to turn knowledge into semblance one has to know how to affect a semblance. And this soon wears thin.

In Milan, from which I have just returned, obviously I had a far less numerous audience than here, about a quarter of the number of you, but there was a throng of young people who are what is known as in the movement. There was even one most respectable character, of fairly high stature, who happens to be the representative of the movement down there. Only afterwards was I told that he was there. I didn't want to question him, but does he know or doesn't he know that, by being posted at this outcrop, what he wants, like all those who are a little involved in the movement, is to restore to the university discourse its value? As the noun indicates, this culminates in units of value, in credits. They would like to know a little better how to affect a semblance of knowledge. This is what guides them.

Well, indeed, this is respectable. And why not? The university discourse has a status that is just as fundamental as any other. However, what I'm pointing out is that it's not the same as the psychoanalytic discourse. The place of semblance is held differently there.

Good gracious, how is one to manage with a new audience, and above all if they might be confused? I tried to explain to them a little what my place is in the story. I started by saying that my Écrits are a poubellication, and that they shouldn't believe that they could take their bearings from them. The word Seminar did nevertheless crop up thereafter. Of course, I was forced to confess that the Seminar is not a seminar. It's me wittering on all by myself, my good friends, as I have been for years now. Though there was a time, back in the day, when it lived up to its name, and there were other people who contributed.

So, being forced to come to that put me beside myself. And since on the return flight there was someone who was pressing me to know how it was that there once was a time when it was like a seminar, I told myself that today I would say that, for this penultimate session, good Lord, someone should come along to say something.

Whereupon I received a letter from Monsieur Recanati. I won't tell you the story just yet. I'm not pretending that I'm conjuring up a contribution from the floor. I'm simply saying that I received a letter, which moreover was a reply to one of mine. To my great surprise, my correspondent, who is here beside me, proved to me that he had understood something of what I've been saying this year. So, I'm going to give him the floor.

He has something to say to you that bears the closest relation to what I've been trying to open up, notably to set theory and mathematical logic. He's about to tell you which.

[François Recanati's exposé revisits Lacan's thematic from the perspective of Peirce's logic. Lacan printed the exposé in the journal Scilicet 4 (1973): 55–63, followed by Recanti's commentary on his own exposé, addressed to Lacan in the form of a letter, pp. 64–73. The following four paragraphs are drawn from Lacan's responses.]

I think it should be underscored here that the bar placed over both terms, $\exists x$ and Φx, which are each negated, is an It is not true that . . . which is frequently used in mathematics, because this is the key point to which the so-called proof by contradiction leads. All in all, it's a matter of knowing why it is accepted in mathematics, but only in mathematics, that one can ground something affirmable upon an It is not true that . . . How could you do this anywhere else?

It is precisely here that the objection comes, within mathematics, to using the argumentum ad absurdum. The question is how, in mathematics, the argumentum ad absurdum can ground something, which as such proves not to lead to contradiction. This is where the specific domain of mathematics is specified.

So, under this It is not true that . . . , it's a matter of furnishing the status of the negative bar that I've been using at one of the points on my chart, in order to say There does not exist an x to satisfy a negated Φx.

I had to go to Milan to feel the need to get a response. I feel that the one I've just had is quite satisfactory enough for you to be able to be satisfied by it too, for today.

14 June 1972

XVI

BODIES CAPTURED BY DISCOURSE

The affable Umberto Eco Self-cognizance is hygiene
The bodily support in analysis Jurisprudence and fine sentiments Racism and fraternity

Qu'on dise comme fait reste oublié derrière ce qui est dit, dans ce qui s'entend.

This statement, assertive in its form, belongs to the modal for issuing what it does by way of existence.

Today, I will be taking my leave of you, of those who've been coming along and then of those who haven't been coming but have come along for this leave-taking. There's no need to strike up the band.

What can I do? Summing myself up, as they say, is absolutely out of the question. So, I shall mark something, a point, a suspension point. Of course, I could say that I've continued to circumscribe this impossibility in which, for us in the analytic discourse, everything that can be founded as real is gathered.

At the last minute and, my word, by a stroke of luck, I received testimony that what I've been saying is being heard. I received it by virtue of the person who, to his great merit, was kind enough to speak at this final moment of the year, proving to me that indeed for some, for more than one, for happenstances that come about from angles that I can on no account predict, they found some interest in what I've been trying to set out. I thank, therefore, the person who bore me this testimony, and not only to me. I hope that there are enough people for whom this created an echo, and who were able to realize that it can yield something. Naturally, it's always hard to know how far this reaches.

On this score, I don't think it beside the point to bring up the meeting I had with someone in Italy, whom I find to be a very affable fellow. He's in art history and is involved in the idea of the Work. It's not known why, though we might come to understand, he is interested in what is being set out under the heading of structure, and specifically in what I have been able to produce in this respect. He is interested in it on account of personal issues.

This idea of the Work, this art history, this vein, tends to enslave. There's no doubt about that. It can be seen quite clearly when one beholds what someone who was neither a critic nor a historian, but a creator, formed as an image of this vein, namely the slave, the captive. A certain Michelangelo showed us this. So, on the margins, there are the historians and the critics who pray for the slave. This is mummery like any other. It's a kind of divine service that can be practised. It's a way of making you forget what is in command, because the Work is always in command, even for Michelangelo.

The one in command is what I first tried to produce for you this year under the heading Yad'lun. The One is in command. The One makes Being. I asked you to go to look this up in the Parmenides. Some of you perhaps complied. The One maketh Being just as the hysteric maketh the man. Obviously, the One that maketh Being is not itself Being. It maketh Being. This is what is unbearable for a certain creativist infatuation.

The person I'm speaking about, who was really very affable with me, explained how he has got caught up on what he calls my system, in order to speak out against its barbs. This is why I'm making a big deal of this today, so as to avoid a particular confusion. He has got caught up on what in his mind is my practising too much ontology.

This is rather odd. I know that of course there are not just open ears in this audience. I think there are a certain number of deaf ears, as there are everywhere. But to say that I practise ontology is all the same fairly odd. And positioning this ontology in the big Other, which I show as having to be barred, and to which I pin the signifier of this barring, is curious indeed.

What has to be seen in the reverberations, in the response that one obtains, is that, after all, people respond to you with their own issues. His issue is that ontology, and even Being, has got stuck in his craw. This is due to the fact that, if ontology is simply the puckering of the One, then obviously everything that is done on command becomes suspended from the One, and, my goodness, this is a nuisance for him. So, what he would like, all in all, is for structure to be absent.

Indeed, this would be more convenient for the hey presto. What is wanted here is that the sleight of hand that takes place, which is the work of art, should have no need of cups and balls. You have only to behold this in a painting by Hieronymus Bosch, who was an artist far above this. He doesn't hide how it's done, the captivation of gawkers.

This is not what we are busying ourselves with here. We are dealing with the analytic discourse.

1

Regarding this analytic discourse, I thought all the same that it might not be a bad idea before leaving you to punctuate something that would give you the idea not only that this is neither ontological nor philosophical, but indeed that it is only necessitated by a particular position. This particular position is the one in which I believe I have been able to condense the articulation of a discourse.

It's a matter of showing you what relation this bears to the fact that analysts have a relation – and you would be wrong to think that I'm ignorant of this – to something that is called the human being. Yes indeed. Of course. But I don't use this label. I avoid this label so that you won't stick your necks out, so that you'll stay right where you ought to be, to the extent that you're capable of seeing what the difficulties are that arise for the analyst.

Let's speak no more of cognizance, because man's relation to a world of his own – obviously this is where we've been starting off from for a long while now – has never been anything but play-acting in the service of the discourse of the master. The only world of one's own is the world that the master strings along at his beck and call.

As for the famous knowing thyself, γνῶθι σεαυτόν, which is what supposedly maketh the man, let's take as our point of departure the following, which is straightforward and palpable. Indeed, if you so wish, cognizance has a locus. It has the locus of the body. The cognizance of oneself is hygiene. Let this be our starting point.

So, throughout the centuries, illnesses continued to exist. Everyone knows that illness cannot be remedied by hygiene. There is illness, and this is indeed something that grips the body. For centuries, illness was something of which doctors were supposed to have cognizance. During one of our recent talks I think I briefly underscored the failure of these two angles. All of this is plain to see in history. It's spread across it in all sorts of aberrations.

So, all the same, the question that I would like to make tangible for you today concerns the analyst who is now here and who seems to be taking up the baton. People speak about illness and at the same time people say that there is no such thing, that there is no mental illness, for example. They are quite right, in the sense that illness is a nosological entity, as used to be said. On no account is mental illness an entity. Rather, mentality has rifts. Let's put it like that, somewhat briskly.

Let's try to see, for instance, what is supposed in what I've written here, and which supposedly lays out where a particular chain is positioned. This chain is very certainly, and without the faintest ambiguity, structure.

$$\frac{S_1}{$} \longrightarrow \frac{S_2}{a}$$

Discourse of the master

You can see two signifiers in succession, and the subject is here only in so far as one signifier represents it for the other signifier. Then, something results from this for which over the years we have extensively developed enough reasons to justify notating it as the object a. Evidently, if it here takes this tetradic form, this is not a topology that is devoid of some kind of meaning.

This is the novelty that was introduced by Freud, and it's no small matter.

There was someone who did something very fine by crystallizing the discourse of the master on the basis of a historical perspective that he succeeded in grasping. That someone is Marx. This was a step forward. There is no cause to reduce this step to the first. Nor is there cause to mix the two together. One wonders on what grounds they would have to be in absolute accord. They are not in accord. They are perfectly compatible. They are nested. They are nested, and then there is certainly a step that takes its place quite comfortably, and that is the step of Freud.

All in all, what was the essential thing that Freud introduced? He introduced the dimension of over-determination. I afford an image of over-determination in my way of formalizing, in the most radical fashion, the essence of discourse, in so far as it occupies a pivotal position in relation to what I have just called a support.

After all, it was on the basis of discourse that Freud brought to light the fact that what was produced at the level of the support had to do with what was articulated by way of discourse. The support is the body.

We still have to pay attention when we say that it's the body. It's not necessarily one body. From the moment we take jouissance as the starting point, this means very precisely that the body is not on its own, that there is another one. It is not because of this that jouissance is sexual, since what I've just been explaining this year is that the least one can say is that this jouissance is not brought along. It's the jouissance of a bodily one-on-one. What is specific to jouissance is that, when there are two bodies, and even more so when there are more of them, naturally one cannot tell which of them is enjoying. It is for this reason that there might be several bodies involved in this affair, and even series of bodies.

One thing led to another and, goodness knows why, I found myself rereading a session of a Seminar I gave at the start of the last term of the academic year that I dedicated to the case of President Schreber. It is from 11 April 1956, right after the two first terms that are summarized in my écrit that goes by the title D'une question préalable à tout traitement possible de la psychose. I set out what is involved in structure. I'm calling it by its name, the name that it bears in my disquisition – structure. Structure is not always what the rabble believe,[1] but it's perfectly well expressed at this level.

It would have amused me to publish this Seminar, if the keybasher hadn't left a large number of lacunae because she hadn't heard me properly. If only she had accurately reproduced the sentence in Latin that I wrote on the blackboard. I no longer remember who the author was, and to find it again will certainly cost me some time, but no matter. I'll do it for the next issue of Scilicet. Everything that I said back then about the signifier – at a time when, in '56, it can't be said that it was in fashion – is still struck in a metal that I have no need to retouch.

What I said in this regard is precisely that what distinguishes the signifier is that it has no signification. I said it in a forthright way because back then I had to make myself heard by my audience. You do realize that, what is more, it was an audience of doctors. What the heck could they get out of it? They were just listening to a bit of Lacan. Well, a bit of Lacan . . . that is to say, this clown who was doing his marvellous trapeze act. Throughout that time, they already had an eye on how they would get back to their digestion, because one can't say that they are dreamers. That would be too fine. They don't dream. They digest. It's an occupation like any other.

What one has to try to see is that what Freud introduced – and people imagine that I misconstrue this because I speak about the signifier – is the return to this grounding that is in the body, and which means that, quite independently of the signifiers by which they are articulated, these four poles are determined by the emergence as such of jouissance, precisely as something that is ungraspable. This is what makes the other three rise up, and, in response, the first, which is truth.

Truth already implies discourse. This doesn't mean that it can be said. I've been knocking myself out saying that it cannot be said, or that it can only go midsay. However, for jouissance to exist, one has to be able to speak about it. In view of which, there is something else, which is called the fact of saying.

Well, all told, I spent the whole of last year explaining this for you. It took a while to articulate. You have to see in this my necessity, my way of moving forward. Precisely, I can never articulate it as a truth. You have to turn around it in keeping with your own destiny. More exactly, you have to see how it turns, how it swivels, as soon as it is touched, and even how, up to a certain point, it's unstable enough to lead to all sorts of errors.

Either way, if I came out with the title – which all the same shows some gall – D'un discours qui ne serait pas du semblant, on a discourse that would not be a discourse of semblance, then it was to allow you to sense, and you did sense it, that discourse as such is always a discourse of semblance, and that if there is something at some point that is authorized by jouissance, then this is precisely the fact of affecting a semblance. From this point of departure one can manage to conceive of something that we can only catch hold of here, namely surplus jouissance.

If there is someone who got to grips with this surplus jouissance in a way that was so self-assured, whose memory has to be hailed – mémoire as I write it, giving mé the same meaning as the mé in méconnaisance – who has been so well mémorisé,[2] so well memorialized that it's more a matter of his words having been made risible, then that someone is Plato.

Plato captured something that gives us to think that he's not only about Ideas and Forms, but also everything that can be got out of him by translating his statements with a certain grid that is, I admit, vraisemblable, plausible. Plato is nevertheless the one who put forward the function of the dyad as the chute down which everything has to pass, to leak. No larger without smaller. No older without younger. The fact that the dyad is the locus of our loss, the locus of this leak, the locus that forces Plato to forge this One of Idea, of Form, this One that immediately multiplies and becomes un-graspable, is because like the rest of us it is steeped in this supplement.

Indeed, I spoke about all this in the session of my Seminar of 11 April 1956. I spoke of the difference between the supplement and the complement. Well, I had already spelt this out very clearly in 1956. It seems that this might have served to crystallize something of the function that is to be fulfilled, the function of the analyst, and which seems to be so impossible, more so than others, that people think only of camouflaging it.

So, everything turns around this. After everything I've just set out concerning jouissance, truth, semblance, and surplus jouissance, there is this support, which is what happens at the level of the body and from which all meaning emerges, but in a non-constituted form. This is what forms the ground. Ground is the word that was used the other day by the person who was kind enough to come and speak to us about Peirce, to the extent that it was in Peirce's note that he had heard what I was saying.

I don't need to tell you that back when I wrote up Peirce's quadrants, it came to nothing. You can well imagine that remarks on the total ambiguity of the universal, whether it is affirmative or negative, and of the particular, too, . . . well, what effect could that have on those who dreamed only of finding again their same old tune?

The ground lies here. It is indeed a matter of the body with its radical meanings on which we have no purchase.

2

It is not with truth, semblance, jouissance, or surplus jouissance that one philosophizes. One is doing philosophy when there is something that fills in this support, which can be articulated only on the basis of discourse. What does it fill this support with? It has to be said that it is filled with what you are made of, and all the more so given that you are a bit philosophical. This happens sometimes, but in the end it's rare. You are above all astudied, as I once said.[3] You are in the place where the university discourse locates you. You are taken as à-former.[4] For some time now, a crisis has been afoot, but we will speak about this presently. It's secondary. The question is a different one, therefore.

You need to realize that what you depend on most fundamentally – because in the end the university did not appear just yesterday – is the discourse of the master. The discourse of the master was the first to arise, and this is the discourse that has endured and which stands little chance of being shaken. It could be compensated, balanced out, with something that would be, the day when this happens, the analytic discourse. At the level of the discourse of the master, one can say perfectly well what lies between the functions of the discourses such as they are articulated using this S_1, S_2, barred S, and a, and then, on the other hand, the body that represents you here and which, as an analyst, I address.

When someone comes to see me for the first time in my consulting room and I punctuate our entry into this business with a few preliminary consultations, what is important is the confrontation of bodies. It's precisely because it starts with this, with this encounter of bodies, that once one enters the analytic discourse, there will be no further question of this. It is still the case, however, that on the level at which discourse functions – which is not the analytic discourse – the question arises as to how this discourse has managed to capture bodies.

At the level of the discourse of the master, it's clear. As bodies, you are moulded by the discourse of the master. You can't hide this, regardless of your gambolling. This is what I shall call sentiments, and very precisely bons sentiments, fine sentiments. Between the body and discourse lies what analysts indulge in pretentiously calling affects. It's quite obvious that you are affected in analysis. But they claim that this is what constitutes an analysis. They have to hold on to something, to be sure they won't slip. What are fine sentiments formed by? We are very much compelled to come to this. At the level of the discourse of the master, it's quite clear. They are formed by jurisprudence. Given that I'm speaking here as a guest to the Law Faculty, it is as well not to forget this. It's as well not to misrecognize that fine sentiments are founded by jurisprudence, and nothing more.

Let's be clear. When something like this all of a sudden comes to move your heart because you don't know very well whether you might not be a little responsive to the way an analysis has taken a turn for the worse, if there were no deontology, if there were no jurisprudence, where would this heavy heart be? Where would this affect, as they say, be? One does have to try to speak the truth a bit once in a while.

A bit means that what I've just said is not exhaustive. I could also say something else that would be incompatible with what I've just said, and which would also be the truth. And this is indeed what happens simply on account, not of a quarter-turn, but of half a complete turn, of two quarter-turns, in the sliding of these functional elements of discourse.

In this tetrad there are vectors, the necessity of which can be established full well. These vectors are due neither to the tetrad, nor to truth, nor to semblance, nor to anything else of the kind. They stem from the fact that the tetrad is fourfold. On the sole condition that you require that there should be vectors going in both directions, namely that there should be either two incoming vectors and one outgoing, or one incoming and one outgoing, you will necessarily be led to the way they are laid out here. This is due to the number 4, and nothing else. Naturally, semblance, truth, jouissance, and surplus jouissance, cannot be added together. So, they cannot make four all by themselves. It is precisely in this that the real consists, in that the number 4 exists all on its own.

This is something that I also said on 11 April 1956, but I hadn't yet come out with all of this. Moreover, I hadn't even constructed all of this. Only, this is what proves to me that I'm on the right track because, back then, I said that the number 4 is a number that is essential when it comes to remembering. I find nothing surplus to requirement in this. I said it when it had to be said, at the time when it was a question of psychosis.

Don't trouble yourselves over the people who are walking out. They have to at this time. They have to go to the funeral of someone to whom I hereby pay my respects, someone from our School and who was very dear to me. I regret not being able to join them, in view of my commitments here.

What is there, in the analytic discourse, between the functions of discourse and this support, which is not the signification of discourse, and which does not depend on anything of what is said? Everything that is said is semblance. What's more, everything that is said is true. All that is said gives rise to jouissance. As I have written again today on the blackboard, Qu'on dise, comme fait . . . this fact of saying . . . reste oublié derrière ce qui est dit.

That which is said lies nowhere else than in what is heard. That's what speech is. The fact of saying is something else entirely. It's another plane. It's discourse. It's a matter of relationships, which hold each and every one of you together with people who are not necessarily the people here. What is called relationship, religiō, social binding, occurs as the level of a certain number of points of capture that are not produced by chance. These points of capture necessitate, save for a very occasional erring, a certain order in the signifying articulation. And for something to be said here takes something other than what you imagine under the name reality, because reality stems very precisely from the fact of saying.

The fact of saying has its effects, on the basis of which what is known as the fantasy is constituted. The fantasy is the relation between the object a – which is what is concentrated through the effect of discourse in order to cause desire – and this something that is condensed around it, as a split, and which is called the subject. It's a split because the object a always lies between each signifier and the signifier that follows it, and this is why the subject was always not between, but, on the contrary, gaping.

In Rome, where I have just been, I was able to put my finger on the fairly gripping effect, an effect in which I recognize myself full well, of the copper plates by a certain Fontana – who is apparently deceased – who after having shown great felicity as a constructor, a sculptor, and so on, dedicated his last years to making what in Italian is called squarcio. I don't speak Italian very well. I had this term explained to me. It's a gash. He made gashes in copper plates.

This produces a certain effect. It produces an effect for those who are a little sensitive. There's no need to have heard my disquisition on the Spaltung of the subject to be sensitive to this. The first person who comes along, especially if she is of the feminine sex, can experience a little wobbling.

Fontana was surely not one of those who completely misrecognize structure, and who think that it's overly ontological.

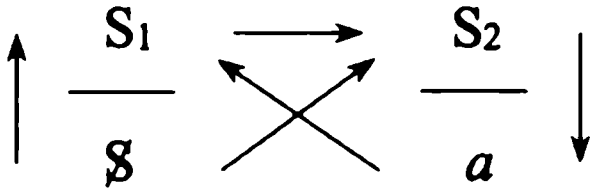
3

So, what is at issue in analysis?

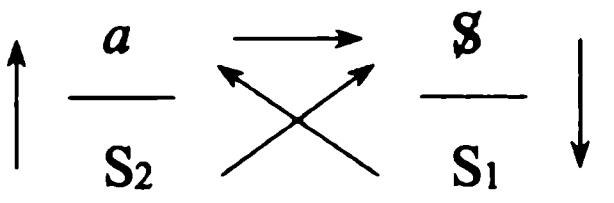
If I am to be believed, it must be thought that it is indeed as I have said it is, namely that the analyst installs the object a, and does so en corps – with all the legitimate ambiguity of this term[5] – in the place of semblance. It is on account of this that something exists that is called the analytic discourse. What does this mean? At the point we've reached, that is, where we've started to see this discourse taking shape, we can see that, as discourse – not in what is said but in its fact of saying – it allows us to apprehend what is involved in semblance.

This is why it is striking, at the end of a cosmological tradition, as we were allowed to feel it last time, to see the question being posed as to how the universe came to be born. Doesn't this question strike you as a rather dated one? It dates from the depths of ages, but it's no less dated. What is striking is that this led Peirce to a purely logical articulation, and even a logician's articulation. This is the point at which the fruit detaches from the tree of a certain articulation that I shall call illusory, which down through the ages has culminated in this cosmology fused with a psychology, with a theology, and with all that ensued.

Here we put a finger on the fact that, as was set out for you last time, there is no discourse on the origin that does not deal with the origin of a discourse. There is no graspable origin besides the origin of a discourse. This is what is important for us when it's a matter of the emergence of another discourse, the analytic discourse. In relation to the discourse of the master – the terms and arrangement of which I will quickly draw up again – the analytic discourse entails the double inversion of the slanting vectors.



Discourse of the master

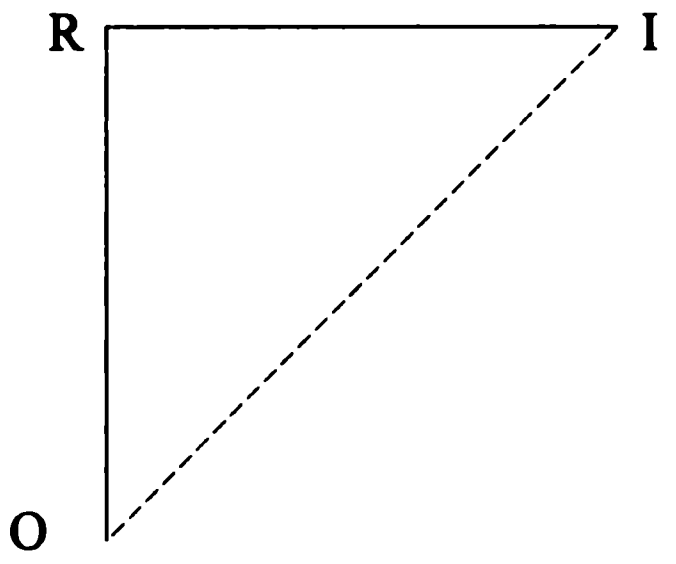


Discourse of the analyst

This holds all its importance. What Peirce dares to articulate for us, and here at the hinge of the cosmology of Antiquity, is the plenitude of what is at issue in bodily semblance. It is discourse in its relation, so he says, with the nothing. This means, with that around which any discourse necessarily turns.

Along this path, and by promoting set theory, I've been trying this year to suggest to those who hold the function of analyst that they should become versed, in order to train themselves, in this vein that exploits these statements that are formalized in logic. To train themselves in what? In the fact that there has to be a sifting apart of what earlier I called the filling in, the interval, the buffering, the gap, that lies between the body, jouissance, semblance, and discourse. This needs to be distinguished in order to realize that this is where the question is posed regarding something else, which is neither fine sentiment nor jurisprudence, and which bears a name, that of interpretation.

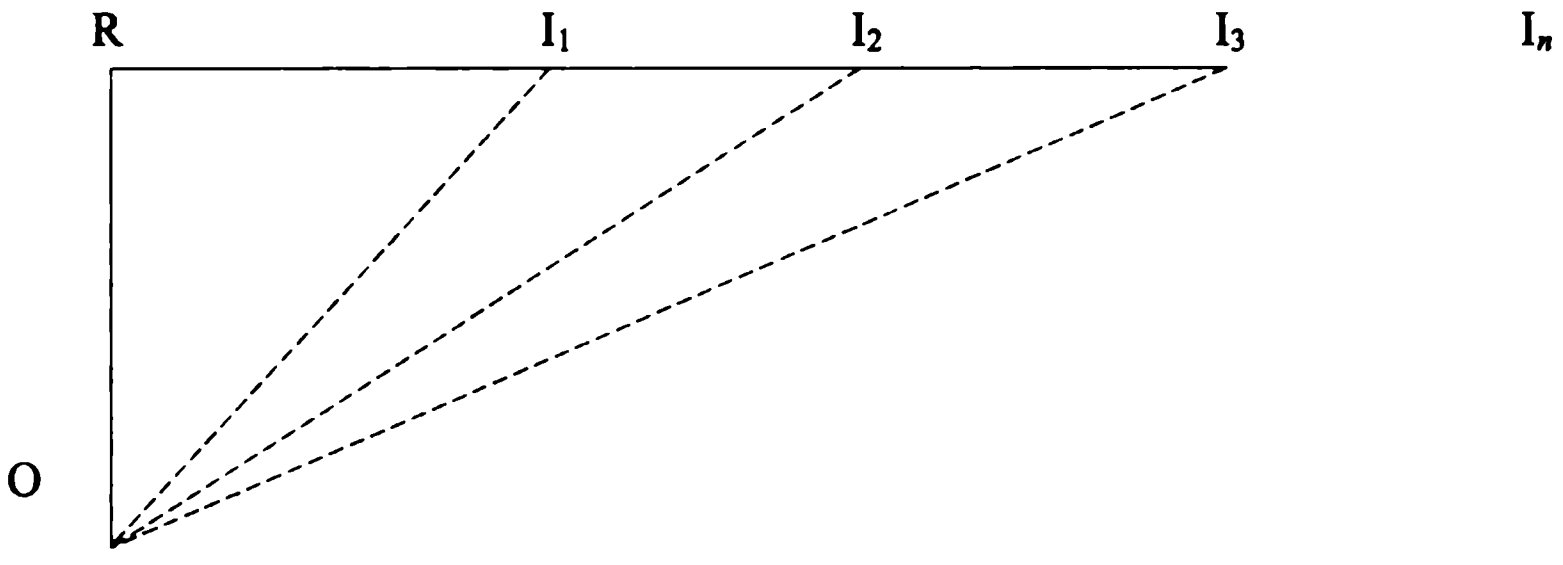
This was put up on the blackboard for you the other day in the form of what is called the semiotic triangle. It includes the Representamen, the Interpretant, and the Object. The relation is always ternary. The Representamen–Object pair is always to be reinterpreted, and this is what is at issue in analysis. The Interpretant is the analysand.



The semiotic triangle

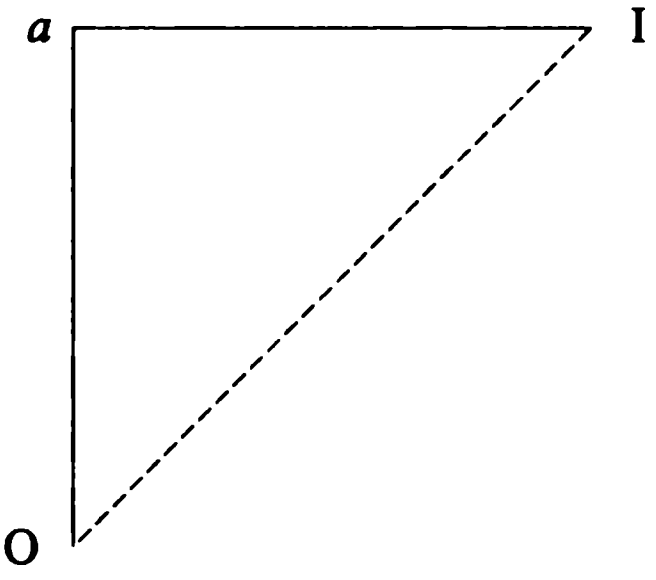
This doesn't mean that the analyst shouldn't be there to help him, to give him a bit of a push in the direction of interpreting. It has to be said that this cannot be done at the level of just one analyst, for the simple reason that if what I say is true, then this would merely be the lode of logic, the extraction of articulations from what is said, and not from the fact of saying. To spell it right out, if the analyst in his function – I mean, en corps – does not know how to gather up sufficiently what he hears from the Interpretant, from the one whom he allows to speak in the capacity of analysand, well, this analytic discourse effectively remains where Freud said it would, without budging a line. But then, as soon as it becomes part of common discourse, which is nowadays the case, it enters the armature of fine sentiments.

According to Peirce's diagram, which was drawn up last time, what does it take for interpretation to progress, for it to be possible? What is at issue in this relation between interpretation and Object? What is this Object for Peirce? There is no end to the extension of each new interpretation, unless there should be a limit precisely in what the analytic discourse should bring about, provided it doesn't languish in its current stagnation.



Endless interpretation

What needs to be replaced in Peirce's diagram so that it will match my articulation of the analytic discourse? Well, it's as easy as pie. For the effect of what is at issue in analytic treatment, there is no other Representamen but the object a. The analyst turns himself into the Representamen, in the place of semblance.



Where am I in the fact of saying?

The Object at issue is none other than what I've been examining here in my two formulas on the blackboard. It is none other than the fact of saying qua forgotten. This is the Object of the question that each of us poses – Where am I in the fact of saying?

If it is quite clear that neurosis has this staggered extension, this is very precisely because of this, which explains for us the wavering in what Freud put forward concerning desire, and especially desire in dreams. It's quite true that there are dreams of desire, but when Freud analyses one of his dreams, we can see which desire is at issue. It's the desire to posit the equation that desire equals zero.

At a time that was not much later than 11 April 1956, in 1957 precisely, I analysed the dream of Irma's injection.[6] This was transcribed as you can imagine it would be, by an academic, in a PhD thesis that is doing the rounds at present. The way that it was . . . I won't say heard, because he wasn't there – instead he worked from notes, and he thought he could add some of his own inventions to it. All the same, it's clear that if there is one thing that the sublime and divine dream of Irma's injection allows us to show, then it's what should have been exploited, given the time that's passed since I announced it, by anyone within the field of analysis. I left it to languish, because after all, as you're going to see, the thing isn't as consequential as all that. If, as I was reminding you recently, the essence of sleep is the suspension of the body's relation to jouissance, then it's quite obvious that desire, which is suspended from surplus jouissance, will not for all that be bracketed out.

One can clearly see what the dream works with, what it knits together. It uses elements from the day before, as Freud says it does. That is, it uses whatever is still lying utterly at the surface of memory, not in the depths. The only thing that connects the desire of the dream to the unconscious is the way in which it has to be worked through in order to solve the problem with a formula that includes = 0, in order to find the root whereby its functioning is annulled. If it is not annulled, as they say, you wake up. In view of which, the subject goes on dreaming in his life.

Freud underscores that if desire has some interest in the dream, then it's in so far as there are cases in which the fantasy cannot be resolved. That is to say, it is perceived that desire – allow me to express it like this since I'm nearing the end – has no reason for being. It's that something has occurred, which is the encounter from which neurosis stems, the Medusa's head, the split from earlier, seen directly, inasmuch as it has no solution. It is precisely for this that, in most people's dreams, it is indeed a matter of the question of desire, in so far as it refers far beyond, to the structure by virtue of which the a is the cause of the Spaltung of the subject.

So, what binds us to the one with whom we are setting off, stepping beyond the first apprehension of the body? Is the analyst there to give him grief for not being sufficiently sexuated, for not enjoying well enough, and goodness knows what else? What is it that binds us to the one who is setting off with us in the position that is called that of the patient?

The term frère is splashed across every wall. Liberté, égalité, fraternité. But I ask you, at the cultural point we've reached, with whom are we brothers? With whom are we brothers in any other discourse besides the analytic discourse? Is the boss the brother of the worker? Does it not strike you that this word brother is precisely the one to which the analytic discourse affords its presence, if only in that it brings it back to what are called family affairs? If you think this is simply to avoid class struggle then you're mistaken. It has to do with many other things besides the family racket. We are brothers with our patient in that, like him, we are sons of discourse.

To represent this effect that I designate as the object a – to accustom us to this désêtre, this deserted Being, by dint of being the support, the refuse, the abjection, onto which can be hooked what will, thanks to us, be begotten by the fact of saying, which will of course be an Interpretant – I invite the analyst to support himself, in such a way as to be worthy of transference, through this knowledge that can be questioned as such, on account of being in the place of truth. This knowledge can be questioned with respect to what has always been involved in the structure of knowledge, from savoir-faire through to the knowledge of science. From here, of course, we interpret. But who can do so if not the very one who engages himself in the fact of saying and who, brother that we are to him, will uplift us?

What is begotten by an analysis, what is begotten at the level of the subject, of the subject who speaks, of the analysand, is something that happens with – man thinks, said Aristotle, with his soul.[7] The analysand analyses with this piece of crap that is proposed to him in the figure of his analyst, the object a. It is with this something, this split thing, that must be begotten what is none other when all is said and done – to take up something that was put forward the other day with respect to Peirce – than the beam by which the scales of what is called justice can be set in balance. Our brother transfigured is what is begotten by the analytic conjuration, and this is what binds us to the one who is improperly called our patient.

It has to be said that this parasexal discourse can produce this kind of backlash. I would not like to leave you with just this saccharine treat. When it comes back at the level of a discourse, the notion of brother, however solidly it has been rubber-stamped by virtue of all sorts of jurisprudence throughout the ages, will produce its backlash at the level of the support.

In all of this, I haven't made the faintest mention of the Father. I consider that people have already said enough and explained enough about the Father to show you that it's around him who unigates, him who says no, that all that is universal can be grounded, must be grounded, and alone can be grounded. When we come back to the root of the body, if we reassert the value of the word brother, it will return full sail at the level of fine sentiments.

Since, nevertheless, it's not just about painting a rose-tinted future, you should know that what is on the rise, the ultimate consequences of which we have still not seen, and which is rooted in the body, in the fraternity of bodies, is racism.

You have not heard the last of this.

21 June 1972

APPENDICES

REPORT ON SEMINAR XIX

Jacques Lacan

First published in the Annuaire de l'École pratique des Hautes Études, 1972–1973, pp. 287–91; reprinted with minor editorial modifications in Scilicet 5 (1975): 5–10.

The title is a choice. Others s' . . . oupirent, suspire for worse. I abet not making as much my honour. At issue is the sense of a practice, psychoanalysis.

I will note that I doubled this seminar, with another bearing the entitling of the 'psychoanalyst's knowledge', seen through by the air of sarcasm of my inspiring by Saint-Anne where I was making a return.

In which respect does my Hautes-Études title justify that at Paris I–II, playing host, my having spoken of the One, this is what might have been asked of me, tacit as it was.

That such an idea should have occurred to no one follows from my granted position in advance within the field of psychoanalysis.

It raises those I have designated as suspiring for worse to the One.

As for the rest, I was fomenting no thought of the One, but on the basis of the fact of saying y a dl'Un, I was going to the full terms that are demonstrated by its use, to make psychoanalysis thereof.

This is already in the Parmenides, i.e. Plato's dialogue, by a curious vanguard. I recommended a reading of it to my audience, but did they do so? I mean: did they read it as I do? This is not irrelevant to the present report.

The date of the analytic discourse is indicative of applying, to a real like the arithmetic triangle, which is mathematical par excellence, that is, which is transmissible outside of meaning, the analysis whereby Frege generates the One from the empty set, born of its time – specifically, where it slides to the equivoque by the name of the number zero, to establish that zero and one makes two. Whereupon Cantor newly calls into question the entire series of integers and refers the denumerable to the first infinite, named $\aleph_0$, the first other One to transfer the cutting edge from the first: the same that, de facto, cuts it off from the twain.

This is precisely what Leibniz foresaw with his monad, but which, failing to extricate it from Being, he left in the Plotinian confusion that is favourable to the defence and illustriation of the master.

This is where analysts take an imperious turn for the worse when they cannot accustom themselves to being promoted as abjection at the place defined by the One rightfully occupying it, with the aggravating factor that this is the place of semblance, specifically where l'être lays down the lettre, we might say.

How might they accustom themselves to it being on the analysand's side that the One is admissible, albeit put to work there (cf. below)?

What they can bear still less is the steadfastness of the One in modern science, not that the universe is maintained therein, but rather that the constancy of energy forms a pivot to the point that even quantum theory's refusals of univocity do not disprove this one and only constancy, indeed that probability promotes the One as the closest element to Nature, which is comical.

Turning oneself into a being of abjection presupposes the analyst as otherwise rooted in a practice that stakes everything on another real: the very same that is at stake for us in the fact of so saying.

And another thing is the remark that abjection in scientific discourse should hold the rank of truth, no less. This, manifest from the start in the hysteria of Socrates, and in the effects of science, coming back to light of day sooner than anyone can imagine.

But what can be found for the taking in analysts' me-at-the-least, when this is the blow I sustain?

Why, wherefore your daughter is mute, did Freud manage to account? This is the complicity we've just been saying, that of hysteria with science. As for the rest, the question is not as to the discovery of the unconscious, which has its material preformed in the symbolic, but as to the creation of an apparatus the real of which touches the real, namely what I have articulated as the analytic discourse.

This creation could only be produced given a certain tradition of Scripture, the hinging of which is to be sounded out with what it sets down of creation.

A segregation results from this, which I am not against, though a formation that is addressed to man one and all, such is my preference, even if, in keeping with my formulae not-all woman does it include.

This not that a woman should be less gifted when it comes to there sustaining herself, quite the contrary, and precisely because she does not suspire for worse of the One, being of the Other, to take up the terms of the Parmenides.

Bluntly to tell the truth that is inscribed by dint of Freud's statements on sexuality, there is no such thing as sexual relation.

This formula makes sense in summing them up. For if sexual jouissance is injected so deeply into the relationships of him that assumes being from speech – for this is what, speaking, being is – is it not so that he has no quantifiable relation to sex as specifying a partner, I would say to indicate what is required by science (and which it applies to the animal realm).

It is only too conceivable how the universitarian idea obfuscates this by classifying it under pansexualism.

Whereas, while the theory of cognizance was for a long time no more than man's relations with woman imagined in metaphor, it is precisely in taking an opposite stance that the analytic discourse is situated. (Freud throws out Jung.)

That analysis should have the task of voicing the critique of the inconsistency of the ancient sayings of love is what results from the very notion of the unconscious inasmuch as it is borne out as knowledge.

What the disposed experience of analysis brings us is that the faintest bias in the text of whatever the analysand's said offers us a purchase thereupon that is more direct than myth, which is aggregated only from the generic in language.

This is a return to the state of civil status, certainly, but why not take this humble path?

If there is solidarity – and no more to advance – between the non-relation of sexes and the fact that a being be speaking, then it's hither wise as valid as the erring habits of consciousness, locating what is presumed to be the crowning achievement of life, which is itself supposed to be a reproductive idea, when sex binds itself unto death as well.

Thenceforth it is in the knots of the symbolic that the interval that is located, by way of a non-relation, is to be mapped in its orography, which, in forming a world for man might equally be called mur, a wall, and to proceed from l'(a)mur.

Hence the watchword I have been giving to analysts, not to neglect this linguistic discipline in broaching the said knots.

Yet this is not so that they should dodge, following the fashion that affects a semblance of knowing in the university discourse, that which in this field outlined as linguistics, is real about it.

The signifier One is not one signifier among others, and it surmounts that whereby it is but be-twain these signifiers that the subject is supposable, by my so saying.

But this is where I recognize that this here One is but knowledge superior unto the subject, that is, unconscious insofar as it manifests itself as ex-sisting – the knowledge, I say, of a real of the One-all-alone, all-alone right where relation would be said.

Save but zero of meaning should be begotten from the signifier whereby the Other is inscribed in its being unto the subject barred, S(Ⱥ), I write it.

This is why I have been calling the Ones of one of the lateral series of Pascal's triangle nads.[1] This One repeats, but is not totalized through this repetition: which is seized from the mere nothings of meaning, facts of non-sense, to be recognized in the dreams, the slips, and indeed the 'quips' of the subject so that he may venture that this unconscious is his own.

His own as knowledge, and the knowing of it as such affects without doubt.

But what? This is the question where one deceives oneself.

– Not 'my' subject (the one that I said just a moment past: that it constitutes in its semblance, I said its letter).

– Nor the soul, which is the imagining of imbeciles, at least they would have believe as much when one finds on reading them this soul with which man thinks, for Aristotle, the soul that is reconstructed by the likes of Uexküll, in the guise of an Innenwelt that is the trait-portrait of the Umwelt.

I say, ergo, that knowledge affects the body of the being that becomes Being only through spoken words, in parcelling out his jouissance, in thereby carving him up to the extent of producing the off-cuts from which I make the (a), to be read object a, or indeed abject, which is what will be said when I am dead, the time when finally I shall be tended to, or further fleshed out, th(a) first cause of his desire.

This body is not the nervous system, though this system does serve jouissance inasmuch as in the body it fits out the predation, or better still the jouissance of the Umwelt taken in the manner of prey – which of the Umwelt does not, therefore, figure the trait-per-trait, as they persist in dreaming it, a residue of a philosophical vigil, the translation of which into 'affect' marks the unanalysed.

[1] We should specify that the monad is, therefore, the One that knows itself all alone, aught of real of the voided relation; the nad is this empty relation insisting; there remains the inaccessible henad, the $\aleph_0$ of the sequence of integers, whereby two, which ushers it in, symbolizes in language the supposed subject of knowledge.

It is true therefore that work (dream-work, among other sorts) bypasses thinking, calculating, and even judging. It knows what it has to do. This is its definition: it supposes a 'subject', and this is Der Arbeiter.

What does think, calculate, and judge is jouissance, and jouissance being of the Other, requires that the Une, the One that makes a function of the subject, should simply be castrated, that is to say symbolized by the imaginary function that incarnates powerlessness, in other words by the phallus.

In psychoanalysis it is a matter of raising powerlessness (the same that makes the fantasy hear reason) to logical impossibility (the same that incarnates the real). That is to say, of completing the lot of signs in which the fatum hominum is played out. Here, it is enough to know how to count up to 4, the 4 where the three major numerical operations converge, 2 and 2, 2 times 2, 2 to the power of 2.

The One pro tanto, which I locate by way of non-relation, is not part of these 4, precisely in but forming the set of them. Let's not call it monad any more, but the One-fact-of-saying inasmuch as therefrom come to ex-sist those that in-sist in repetition, the founding of which requires three (I said so elsewhere), which goes very well towards setting the subject aside of these 4, by subtracting from him his unconscious.

This is what the year is leaving in suspense, in keeping with what is ordinary in thought which does not except itself for all that from jouissance.

Hence it becomes apparent that thought proceeds only along the path of ethics. This ethics still needs to fall in with the pas of psychoanalysis.

Does the One-Fact-of-Saying, in knowing itself One-all-alone, speak on its own? Pas de dialogue, I have said, none such dialogue, but this nonesuch of dialogue has its limit in interpretation – whereby is ensured, like for number, the real.

The result of this is that analysis upends the precept: bien faire et laisser dire, to the point that saying it well gives satis-fact-ion, since there is but more-thereof-to-say in response from the pas-assez, the nonesuch-ficient.

What the French lalingua so illustriates in the saying: com-bien for making a question of quantity.

Let's say that the interpretation of the sign renders meaning unto the effects of signification that the signifying battery of language substitutes for the relation it could never encipher.

But the sign in return produces jouissance through the cipher the signifiers permit: which forms the mathematician's d-es-ire, enciphering beyond jouis-sense.

The sign is obsession that cedes, makes an obcession (spelt with a c) to the jouissance that decides upon a practice.

I give my blessing to those who pass commentary in my regard, contending with the torment that sustains a worthy thought, namely: one that is not content to be beaten by tracks of the same name.

Make these lines the trace of hap-py chance, theirs without the knowledge thereof.

LIBRARY TO SEMINAR XIX

Jacques-Alain Miller

The bibliographical notes below follow those prepared by Jacques-Alain Miller for the 2011 Seuil edition of Book XIX (pp. 245–54), with the notable difference that references to French publications have been supplemented, wherever possible, with published English-language translations, while references to French translations have generally been replaced by original sources and/or renderings in English. – ARP

Antiquity

– For Lacan's references to Plato (first and foremost the Parmenides, but also the Meno, the Cratylus, the Theaetetus, and the Symposium), one may consult the bilingual Greek/French edition published by Belles Lettres; likewise for his references to Aristotle (the Prior Analytics, Physics, and Metaphysics). In English, the Complete Works of Aristotle were published as a two-volume set by Oxford University Press in translations revised by Jonathan Barnes, 1984 (corrected edition 1995).
– Euclid, quoted on page 126: Lacan owned a copy of the Dover reprint of The Thirteen Books of the Elements, translated by Sir Thomas L. Heath (Cambridge University Press, 1908).
– Archimedes, cited on page 123: concerning his application of the method of exhaustion, derived from Eudoxus of Cnidus, see his works 'On the Sphere and Cylinder', 'Measurement of a Circle', and 'Quadrature of the Parabola'. They were published in French translation by Belles Lettres in 1970 and 1971 as the first two volumes of his complete works; Heath's 1897 The Works of Archimedes; Edited in Modern Notation with Introductory Chapters pre-dates the identification and deciphering of the Archimedes palimpsest, and has thus been largely superseded by the scholarship of Reviel Netz and Nigel Wilson (The Archimedes Palimpsest, Vols I & II, Cambridge University Press, 2011 and Netz's translation The Works of Archimedes, Vols I & II, Cambridge University Press, 2004); for an excellent overview see Heath's A Manual of Greek Mathematics (Oxford University Press, 1931).

– Boetius de Dacia, cited on page 75: see Roman Jakobson's article 'Glosses on the Medieval Insight into the Science of Language' in the seventh volume of his Selected Writings (Mouton, 1985, pp. 192–3); one may also consult the article by Sten Ebbesen, 'Theories of Language in the Hellenistic Age and in the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries' in Language and Learning, edited by D. Frede and B. Inwood (Cambridge University Press, 2008, pp. 299–319).
– Apuleius, cited on page 90: several translations of The Golden Ass are available, the most recent being by Sarah Ruden (Yale University Press, 2011); on his logic, one may consult Apuleian Logic: The Nature, Sources, and Influence of Apuleius's Peri Hermeneias by Mark W. Sullivan (North-Holland, 1967).
– Secondary sources: Karl Ludwig Michelet, cited on page 18, is a German philosopher (1801–93); his Examen critique du livre d'Aristote intitulé Métaphysique, written in French and published by J. Albert Mercklein in Paris in 1836, can now be consulted on Google Books. The article by Jacques Brunschwig, cited on page 90, appeared in Cahiers pour l'analyse 10 (1969): 3–25. On the Pythagoreans, cited on page 177, and the incommensurability of the diagonal of the square,[1] see, for example, the article by Jean-Toussaint Desanti, 'Une crise de développement exemplaire: la "découverte" des nombres irrationnels', in Logique et connaissance scientifique (Encyclopédie de la Pléiade, 1967, pp. 439–64). On modality in Aristotle, Lacan was later to read Jaakko Hintikka's contribution, Time and Necessity: Studies in Aristotle's Theory of Modality (Oxford University Press, 1973).

Logic and Mathematics

– Pascal: the 1654 Traité sur le triangle arithmétique was translated in abridged form by Anna Savitsky in D. E. Smith (ed.), A Source Book in Mathematics (McGraw-Hill, 1929, pp. 67–79). A full translation was made in 2009 by Richard J. Pulskamp, whose brief introduction points to some textual differences between the 1880 Hachette edition and the 1954 Pléiade edition. The latter is favoured as the source text of his translation, available online at: <www.cs.xu.edu/math/Sources/Pascal/Sources/arith_triangle.pdf>.
– Cauchy and Fourier are cited on page 123 in connection with the history of infinitesimal calculus; on this subject, see the classic book by Carl B. Boyer, The History of the Calculus and Its Conceptual Development (Hafner, 1949); and also Margaret E. Baron, The Origins of Infinitesimal Calculus (Pergamon, 1969).

– Boole and De Morgan are mentioned on page 154 for their role in the emergence of mathematical logic; Lacan was a reader of the 'Kneale and Kneale', The Development of Logic (Oxford University Press, 1962); see also Józef M. Bocheński, A History of Formal Logic (Notre Dame Press, 1961).
– Frege: his 1879 Begriffsschrift was first Englished by Peter T. Geach ('Begriffsschrift, a Formalized Language of Pure Thought Modelled upon the Language of Arithmetic', in Translations from the Philosophical Writings of Gottlob Frege, Blackwell, 1952, second edition, 1960, pp. 1–20), followed by the 1967 translation by Stefan Bauer-Mengelberg ('Begriffsschrift, a Formula Language, Modeled upon that of Arithmetic, for Pure Thought', in J. van Heijenoort (ed.), From Frege to Gödel: A Source Book in Mathematical Logic, 1879–1931, Harvard University Press, pp. 1–82), and then the 1972 translation by Terrell Ward Bynum (in Conceptual Notation and Related Articles, Clarendon, pp. 101–203), while the Preface and Part I were also translated by Michael Beaney (in The Frege Reader, Blackwell, 1997, pp. 47–78); Frege's 1884 Grundlagen der Arithmetik was translated by John Langshaw Austin as The Foundations of Arithmetic (Blackwell, 1950, revised second edition 1952), with selections and summaries included in The Frege Reader (op. cit., pp. 84–129); Frege's 1892 article 'Über Sinn und Bedeutung' was translated by Max Black as 'On Sense and Reference' (in Translations from the Philosophical Writings of Gottlob Frege, op. cit., pp. 56–78), later modified (misleadingly) to 'On Sense and Meaning' (B. McGuiness (ed.), Collected Papers on Mathematics, Logic, and Philosophy, Blackwell, 1984, pp. 157–77), which in Beaney's translation bears the more prudent title, 'On Sinn and Bedeutung' (The Frege Reader, op. cit., pp. 151–71).
– Dedekind, page 171: see, for example, his 1872 pamphlet Stetigkeit und irrationale Zahlen and the 1888 article 'Was sind und was sollen die Zahlen?', which were translated by Wooster Woodruff Beman as 'Continuity and Irrational Numbers' and 'The Nature and Meaning of Numbers', in Essays on the Theory of Numbers (Open Court/Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner, 1901). Beman's translation was extensively revised by William Ewald in From Kant to Hilbert: A Source Book in the Foundations of Mathematics, Vol. II (Oxford University Press, 1996, pp. 765–79, 787–833). A French translation of the two essays, prefaced by Desanti and with an Introduction by Mohammed Allal Sinaceur, was published in 1979 as Analytica 12/13 (Navarin / Bibliothèque d'Ornicar).

– Peirce: Lacan was a reader of the Collected Papers of Charles Sanders Peirce, Vols. I–VI, edited by C. Hartshome and P. Weiss, 1931–35, and Vols. VII–VIII, edited by A. W. Burks, 1958 (Harvard University Press).
– Poincaré, page 74 and page 193: see 'L'expérience et la géometrie', the fifth chapter in the 1901 collection La science et l'hypothèse, recently translated as 'Space and Geometry' by Mélanie Frappier, Andrea Smith, and David J. Stump, in Science and Hypothesis (Bloomsbury Academic, 2017).
– Cantor: his complete works are available in German as Gesammelte Abhandlungen mathematischen und philosophischen Inhalts, edited by E. Zermelo (Springer, 1932). The two versions of 'Beiträge zur Begründung der transfiniten Mengenlehre' (1895, 1897) were translated by Philip E. B. Jourdain as Contributions to the Founding of the Theory of Transfinite Numbers (Open Court, 1915). Further key texts, and his correspondence with Dedekind, are included in Ewald's English-language translations in From Kant to Hilbert, Vol. II (op. cit., pp. 838–940). See also Joseph Warren Dauben's Georg Cantor: His Mathematics and Philosophy of the Infinite (Harvard University Press, 1979). For a study of Lacanian influence, see Nathalie Charraud's Infini et inconscient, essai sur Georg Cantor (Economica, 1994).
– Russell: Lacan was familiar at least with the following works: The Principles of Mathematics (Cambridge University Press, 1903); Principia Mathematica (with Alfred North Whitehead, Cambridge University Press, 1910, 1912, 1913); and An Inquiry into Meaning and Truth (Norton, 1940).
– Brouwer: Lacan alludes to Brouwer's theory of the 'creative subject' on page 152; see, for example, his text 'Consciousness, Philosophy and Mathematics', in Proceedings of the 10th International Congress of Philosophy (North-Holland, 1949, pp. 1243–9), and the study by Walter P. van Stigt, Brouwer's Intuitionism (North-Holland, 1990).
– Gödel, page 30 and page 156: Gödel's Collected Works, Vols I–V are published by Oxford University Press, 2001–12, under the editorship of S. Feferman; one may also consult the book by Raymond M. Smullyan, Gödel's Incompleteness Theorems (Oxford University Press, 1992); and, by the same author, the accessible The Lady, or the Tiger? And Other Logic Puzzles (Knopf, 1982), and Forever Undecided: A Puzzle Guide to Gödel (Knopf, 1987).
– Bourbaki, page 20: the first volumes of the (at present) twelve Books of the Éléments de mathématique treatise were published in French and English by Éditions Hermann. The 1970 volume on the Théorie des ensembles (Book I), comprising chapters previously published in 1939, 1954, 1956 and 1957, is slightly later than its English edition (Theory of Sets, Hermann, 1968). Likewise, the 1971 volume that comprises Chapters 1 to 4 of Topologie générale (Book III) was pre-dated by its English edition (General Topology, Hermann, 1966) and contains material first published between 1940 and 1942. Meanwhile, Éléments d'histoire des mathématiques groups together historical notes from the Books of the treatise; the first edition was published in 1960, followed by several further editions up to the 2007 Springer edition; the English-language translation by John Meldrum was first published by Springer in 1994 as Elements of the History of Mathematics.

– Thom: one may consult his 1972 book on Structural Stability and Morphogenesis: An Outline of a General Theory of Models, translated by David H. Fowler (Benjamin, 1975). A collection of papers dating from 1967 to 1981 was translated by W. M. Brookes and D. Rand as Mathematical Models of Morphogenesis (Ellis Horwood, 1983).

– The mention of Naive Set Theory on page 124 refers to the book by Paul Halmos (Springer, 1960).

– Cantor a tort, first mentioned on page 176, bears an author credit to Georges Antoniadès Metrios and a translation credit to Pierre Étienne Bessière (Sival-Presse, 1968). It is highly likely that both are pseudonyms.

The chapters one at a time

I The Small Difference

Lacan refers to his article in the Écrits, 'Propos directifs pour un Congrès sur la sexualité féminine'. On the Précieuses, Lacan had certainly read the classic study by René Bray, La Préciosité et les Précieux: De Thibaut de Champagne à Jean Giraudoux (Albin Michel, 1948); one can now read Myriam Dufour-Maître's Les Précieuses: Naissance des femmes de lettres en France au XVII^e siècle (Honoré Champion, 1999). Apollinaire's play Les Mamelles de Tiresias (1903), which is frequently cited by Lacan, was translated by Louis Simpson in 1961 as The Breasts of Tiresias (in M. B. Gale and J. F. Deeney (eds), The Routledge Drama Anthology and Sourcebook: From Modernism to Contemporary Performance, 2010, pp. 207–19), and by Maya Slater as The Mammaries of Tiresias (in Three Pre-Surrealist Plays, Oxford University Press, 1997, pp. 151–207). Regarding etymological dictionaries, Lacan owned the abridged two-volume set of Walther von Wartburg's Französisches etymologisches Wörterbuch (the full twenty-five volume work was only completed in 2002). The Damourette and Pichon, a constant touchstone for Lacan, is their treatise Des mots à la pensée: Essai de grammaire de la langue française, 1911–56, the eight volumes of which have been reprinted by Vrin.

II The Function Φx

If the question of the written was 'on the agenda', this was due in particular to Jacques Derrida (L'écriture et la différence had been published in 1967 and De la grammatologie in 1967). 'L'instance de la lettre dans l'inconscient' is in the Écrits. Anyone interested in logic in the Middle Ages will read with profit The Cambridge History of Later Medieval Philosophy: From the Rediscovery of Aristotle to the Disintegration of Scholasticism, 1100–1600, edited by N. Kretzmann, A. Kenny, and J. Pinborg (Cambridge University Press, 1988). I would also mention the works in French of Alain de Libera.

III From Anecdote to Logic

'The most recent steps in biology': Lacan is no doubt thinking of Crick and Watson's discovery of the structure of DNA and the results that led to Jacob, Lwoff, and Monod being awarded the Nobel Prize in 1965; he had read François Jacob's La Logique du vivant, une histoire de l'hérédité (Gallimard, 1970, translated by Betty E. Spillman as Logic of Life: A History of Heredity, Princeton University Press, 1973). August Weismann: we know that Freud refers to him in Beyond the Pleasure Principle; consult, for example, his Essays upon Heredity and Kindred Biological Problems, translated and edited by Sir Edward Bagnall Poulton, Selmar Schönland, and Sir Arthur Everett Shipley (Clarendon, 1891). The variations on 'I love her' are in Freud's text on President Schreber; there is a commentary by Lacan in his 'Discours de Rome' (in Autres écrits).

IV From Necessity to Inexistence

The pupil who 'came up with this, all on his own' is the psychoanalyst Octave Mannoni, cited for his 1963 article 'Je sais bien, mais quand même' (this phrase is translated by G. M. Goshgarian as 'I know well, but all the same' and by Wendy A. Hester as 'I know very well, but all the same'). 'La signification du phallus' is in the Écrits. Leopold Kronecker's anti-Cantorian comment is often quoted: 'Die ganzen Zahlen hat der liebe Gott gemacht, alles andere ist Menschenwerk'. The 'little book' on Arabic dactylonomy: I gave this book to Lacan, but have been unable to recall the title; one may consult Karl Menninger's classic book from 1934, translated by Paul Broneer from the revised 1958 edition as Number Words and Number Symbols: A Cultural History of Numbers, MIT Press, 1969, along with the references listed in my note on Al-Uqlidisi in Ornicar? 16, 1978. Leibniz's lucubration on identity can be found in New Essays on Human Understanding, IV, vii, 10.

V Topology of Speech (A Talk at Sainte-Anne)

The four discourses are set out in 'Radiophonie', in Autres écrits. 'Fonction et champ de la parole et du langage en psychanalyse' was reprinted in the Écrits. On archetypes, see Jung's 1912 book Symbols of Transformation: An Analysis of the Prelude to a Case of Schizophrenia, translated by R. F. C. Hull (Bollingen Foundation, 1956). Roman Jakobson: Lacan makes several mentions of the series of conférences that his friend was delivering concurrently at the Collège de France at the invitation of Lévi-Strauss. Van Gulik's Sexual Life in Ancient China: A Preliminary Survey of Chinese Sex and Society from ca. 1500 BC till 1644 AD was published in 1961 (E. J. Brill; revised edition, 2003). On André Gide, see Lacan's 'Jeunesse de Gide' in the Écrits. Jean Paul Richter's 1883 two-volume translation of Leonardo's Notebooks and Edward MacCurdy's more complete 1905 rendering have long stood as the reference editions in English. Lacan came up with 'lettre d'amur' in his third entretien at Sainte-Anne (see Talking to Brick Walls, Polity, 2017).[2] 'La métaphore du sujet' features in the appendices to the second edition of the Écrits. In 1958, Chaïm Perelman co-authored with Lucie Olbrechts-Tyteca The New Rhetoric: A Treatise on Argumentation, translated by John Wilkinson and Purcell Weaver, Notre-Dame, 1968.

VI I Ask You to Refuse Me My Offering

'Ne touchez pas à la hache' is the famed retort from General Armand de Montriveau in Balzac's La Duchesse de Langeais. The Antonella to whom Lacan appeals was then translating him into Italian; he calls her 'A' in his 'Préface à une thèse' (Autres écrits, p. 393). Wittgenstein's notorious aphorism is the last proposition in his Tractatus Logico-Philosophicus. Alexandre Kojève was Lacan's mentor and close friend, author of the famous Introduction to the Reading of Hegel, edited in 1947 by Raymond Queneau and translated by James H. Nichols Jr (Cornell University Press, 1969). On the potlatch, read the 1925 essay, The Gift, by Marcel Mauss (translated by Ian Cunnison, Cohen & West, 1954; then again by W. D. Halls, Norton, 1990; and more recently in an expanded edition by Jane I. Guyer, University of Chicago Press, 2016) and The Accursed Share by Georges Bataille (three volumes, 1946; translated by Robert Hurley in two volumes, Zone Books, 1988). Georges Théodule Guilbaud was a mathematician and a friend of Lacan's whom he frequently consulted; among his other achievements, Guilbaud introduced game theory into post-war France. Lacan develops the Borromean knot at great length from his twenty-second Seminar (RSI) onwards.

VII The Vanished Partner (A Talk at Sainte-Anne)

Simone de Beauvoir's The Second Sex was published in two volumes in 1949 (translated by Howard Madison Parshley, Vintage/Random House, 1953; and later by Constance Borde and Sheila Malovany-Chevalier, Cape, 2009). On Socrates, see in particular the eighth Seminar, on Transference.

VIII What is Involved in the Other

Hogarth: the S-shaped line is, according to him, the emblem of beauty; see his 1753 book The Analysis of Beauty and the note to Book XXIII of the Seminar (Polity, 2016, pp. 218–19). Lacan often asserted that he was the first to have pointed out the importance of Freud's nachträglichkeit (retroaction) and to have established its meaning (cf. in particular the case of the Wolf Man). Descartes: Lacan often commented on the cogito, and played at modifying it; see especially Seminars XII and XIV. 'La Chose freudienne' features in the Écrits, including Truth's prosopopeia. Lacan read the Phänomenologie des Geistes in German and in the French translation by his friend Jean Hyppolite (still in print by Aubier); there are several partial translations in English; for a full translation, see Sir James Black Baillie's Phenomenology of Mind (revised second edition, Allen & Unwin, 1931) and Arnold V. Miller's Phenomenology of Spirit (Oxford University Press, 1977). On the events that led to Lacan's 'excommunication' from the IPA (International Psycho-Analytic Association), see the bio-bibliographical information I supplied to On the Names-of-the-Father (Polity, 2013), the file in Television/A Challenge to the Psychoanalytic Establishment (Norton, 1990), and the opening lesson to Seminar XI, The Four Fundamental Concepts of Psychoanalysis. Lacan had been the target of an armed robbery in his consulting room; he was struck in the throat by one of his assailants, and this left him with a hoarse voice for several days afterwards; the identity of the aggressors was known; Lacan did not lodge a complaint.

IX In the Field of the Unian

John Stuart Mill came out with A System of Logic, Ratiocinative and Inductive, Being a Connected View of the Principles of Evidence, and the Methods of Scientific Investigation in 1843 (third revised edition, John W. Parker, 1851, reprinted in The Collected Works of John Stuart Mill, Vols. VII–VIII, University of Toronto Press, 1974). During this session, Lacan gets into a muddle over the number of subsets; I have given the formula that features in Claude Berge's 1968 book Principles of Combinatorics (edited by Richard Bellman as Vol. 72 of the Mathematics in Science and Engineering series, Academic Press, 1971).

X Yad'lun

Pliny the Elder: following the influential English rendering by Philemon Holland in 1601, the first full translation of the thirty-six Books of the Natural History was produced by John Bostock and Henry Thomas Riley in 1855. The Harris Rackham (Vols I–V, IX), William Henry Samuel Jones (Vols. VI–VIII), and D. E. Eichholz (Vol. X) translation was printed in the Loeb library (Harvard University Press, 1949–54); see also the selection by John F. Healy (Penguin, 1991).

XI An Issue of Ones (A Talk at Sainte-Anne)

'Brrom-brrom-wap-wap' comes from Lacan's first wife, Marie-Louise, née Blondin. By Berkeley, one may read A Treatise concerning the Principles of Human Knowledge (1710); and one may also consult Martial Gueroult's Berkeley: Quatre études sur la perception et sur Dieu (Aubier, 1956). Antonie van Leeuwenhoek and Jan Swammerdam, two Dutch scholars of the seventeenth century, were pioneers in the use of microscopy for biological observation; they are considered precursors of microbiology and cellular biology. On the biology of copulation, Lacan consulted in particular Charles Houillon's treatise on Sexualité (Hermann, 1967). Galileo's famous remark on infinity can be found in his 1638 book Discorsi e dimostrazioni matematiche intorno a due nuove scienze (translated by Henry Crew and Alfonso de Salvio as Dialogues concerning Two New Sciences, Macmillan, 1914; and later by Stillman Drake as Two New Sciences, University of Wisconsin, 1974).

XII Knowledge about Truth

Freud refers to Gustave Le Bon in his Massenpsychologie und Ich-Analyse. The einziger Zug features in Chapter VII on 'Identification'. Lacan refers to the mutilation of the hermai in his Seminar on Transference and in his écrit, 'Proposition du 9 octobre 1967 sur le psychanalyste de l'École' (Autres écrits). It may be presumed that the mention of Nietzsche refers to Der Antichrist (first translated, with some censorship, by Henry Louis Mencken as The Antichrist, Knopf, 1918, then by Walter A. Kaufmann in The Portable Nietzsche, Viking Press, 1954, and then by R. J. Hollingdale as The Anti-Christ, Penguin, 1968). Aristotle looks at tragedy in his Poetics (numerous editions available). It may be presumed that in referring to Surrealism, Lacan is thinking of André Breton's 1937 Amour fou (translated by Mary Ann Caws as Mad Love, Bison, 1988); for Stendhal, the reference is surely De l'amour (translated by Philip Sidney Woolf and Cecil N. Sidney Woolf as On Love, Mayflower, 1915, then by Gilbert and Suzanne Sale as Love, Penguin, 1975, and more recently by Sophie Lewis as On Love, Hesperus, 2009); for Baudelaire, Lacan must be thinking of the 1846 Choix de maximes consolantes sur l'amour (translated by Rainer J. Hanshe in My Heart Laid Bare, Contra Mundum, 2017, pp. 1–12); L'Astrée, the novel by Honoré d'Urfé (1607–27), was translated in 1657 by John Davies under the title Astrea, and Part I was translated, under the same title, by Steven Rendall in 1995 (Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, SUNY). The reference to the miner rubbing down his wife can be found in 'Subversion du sujet et dialectique du désir', in the Écrits.[3] The 'instructive' remark by Gödel is in his 1944 article, 'Russell's Mathematical Logic', in Collected Works, Vol. II, op. cit., pp. 119–41.[4]

XIII The Founding of Sexual Difference

Russell's remark, which was often quoted by Lacan, is from the 1901 paper 'Recent Work on the Principles of Mathematics' (later published as 'Mathematics and the Metaphysicians', in Mysticism and Logic, Allen & Unwin, 1917): 'Mathematics may be defined as the subject in which we never know what we are talking about, nor whether what we are saying is true'; he wrote a three-volume autobiography (Allen & Unwin, 1951–69).

XIV Theory of the Four Formulae (A Talk at Sainte-Anne)

As I have indicated, the first three of the seven entretiens that Lacan initially delivered under the heading Le savoir du psychanalyste have been set apart in the book Talking to Brick Walls (Polity, 2017). The psychoanalyst mentioned for his use of set theory went by the name of Ignacio Matte Blanco; his book The Unconscious as Infinite Sets: An Essay in Bi-logic was published in London by Duckworth in 1975 (reprinted by Karnac, 1998). Lacan had earlier pointed out how, soon after his report on 'Fonction et champ . . .', the International Journal had published some considerations on language by his former analyst, Rudolph Loewenstein. The word Verwerfung features in the Schreber case; see the index of Freud's German terms in the Écrits. On imaginary numbers, an appellation that we owe to Descartes (Book III of La Géométrie, 1637), see Dominique Flament, Histoire des nombres complexes: Entre algèbre et géométrie (CNRS, 2003). Paul-Jean Toulet is a poet of whom Lacan was fond in his youth; his complete works were published by Éditions Robert Laffont in 1986; Lacan refers to Contrerimes, XXVI (Œuvres complètes, p. 12): Comme les dieux gavant leur panse, / Les Prétendants aussi. / Télémaque en est tout ranci : / Il pense à la dépense. The Legenda aurea by Jacobus da Varagine (c. 1260) was Englished by William Caxton in 1483 as The Golden Legende, later modernized by Frederick Startridge Ellis (Kelmscott, 1892); a more recent translation by William Granger Ryan was published in 1993 by Princeton University Press (two volumes). Lacan refers to his graph from 'Subversion du sujet . . .' in the Écrits.

XV The Desire to Sleep

The article 'L'Agonie du signe' is by Jean Paris, published in the eleventh issue of Change (themed L'Atelier de l'écriture, May 1972). The Seminar of 1954–1955 is Seminar I on Freud's technical writings, in which there is a commentary on the dream of Irma's injection.[5] The thesis that Lacan stigmatizes is Didier Anzieu's L'Auto-Analyse de Freud, which had been published in 1959 (translated by Peter Graham as Freud's Self-Analysis, International Universities Press, 1986). Henri Poincaré recounted to the French Société de Psychologie the circumstances of his invention of Fuchsian functions during a sleepless night ('L'Invention mathématique', 1908, translated by George Bruce Halsted as 'Mathematical Creation', in The Foundations of Science, The Science Press, 1913); the anecdote was taken up by the mathematician Jacques Hadamard in his Essay on The Psychology of Invention in the Mathematical Field (Princeton University Press, 1945). Lacan had been giving some lectures in Milan at the invitation of his Italian pupils.

XVI Bodies Captured by Discourse

The sentence on the blackboard (which had also been written up at the start of the previous session) appears in slightly modified form near the beginning of the article in which Lacan finalizes and extends the elaborations of . . . or Worse, namely 'L'étourdit', collected in Autres écrits; the four quantifying formulae are there designated as the formulae 'of sexuation'. Umberto Eco remained Lacan's friend; he went to listen to a lecture Lacan gave at the Italian Institute in Paris in the late 1970s: Eco evokes meeting Lacan in Foucault's Pendulum (translated by William Weaver, 1989).[6] The painting by Hieronymus Bosch is The Conjurer, in the municipal museum of Saint-Germain-en-Laye; it is attributed to his workshop.[7] On Marx, see in particular 'Radiophonie', in Autres écrits. The 1955–1956 Seminar, the third in the series, was published in 1981, shortly after Lacan's death, under the title Les Psychoses; the Latin sentence was from Cicero (see 'L'étourdit'). Peirce's quadrants are commented on and employed in Seminar IX, L'identification; they serve to demonstrate the universal and the particular in the affirmative and the negative. Lucio Fontana (1899–1968) founded 'Spatialism': this school sought to reveal the third dimension of pictorial space by making scratches, perforations, and incisions in the canvas; in Rome, Lacan had seen works from the series Concetto spaziale, Attese.[8]

NB: All characters in Chinese have been revised for this English edition.

JAM

Hieronymus Bosch and workshop, The Conjurer, *c.*1502, oil on wood, 53 cm × 65 cm, Musée Municipal, St.-Germain-en-Laye;
Photo: The Yorck Project / Wikimedia Commons/Public Domain

TRANSLATOR'S NOTES

Chapter I The Small Difference

1 Grammarians classify pire strictly as an adjective. The corresponding adverb is pis, and the comparative form plus mal. However, since pis has become increasingly outmoded, the erroneous adverbial use of pire has been on the rise. When in the following paragraph Lacan qualifies the adverb as disjoint, he may have in mind the 'disjunct adverb' (usually termed a modalisateur in French).

2 As Bertrand Russell notes in his 1908 article on 'Mathematical Logic as Based on the Theory of Types' (in J. van Heijenoort (ed.), From Frege to Gödel: A Source Book in Mathematical Logic, 1879–1931, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1967, p. 157n), the term variable apparente had been coined five years previously by Giuseppe Peano in the fourth volume of Formulaire de mathématiques. The term has since been largely superseded by David Hilbert's term 'bound variable', though some have contested their equation (e.g., Montgomery Furth in his Introduction to Frege, G., The Basic Laws of Arithmetic: Exposition of the System, translated by M. Furth, University of California Press, 1964, pp. xxxii–xxxiii).

3 Here and throughout the present edition, the quantifying tout is rendered as 'all'. While this usage conforms to a long-standing tradition of Aristotelian term logic in English, it may be remarked that Robin Smith asserted (drawing on Peter T. Geach in Logic Matters, Oxford: Blackwell, 1972, p. 69) that translating ὑπάρχειν παντί as 'belongs to all' is an 'unnecessary barbarism', with the plural form, 'belongs to every', being more advisable ('Preface' to Prior Analytics, Indianapolis: Hackett, 1989, p. ix). This opinion is counter to that of W. and M. Kneale in their 1962 book The Development of Logic (Oxford University Press) who assert: 'in some modern versions of Aristotle's doctrine the difficulties of his account of opposition are unnecessarily aggravated by use of examples and formulae in the plural' (p. 61). Recent translators and commentators have tended to maintain the use of 'all', foremost among them Gisela Striker in her Aristotle's Prior Analytics, Book I, Oxford University Press, 2009; see also M. Malink's note on 'Every and all' from his chapter on 'The Orthodox dictum Semantics' in Aristotle's Modal Syllogistic, Harvard University Press, 2013, pp. 55–6. Lacan employs extensively the four French declensions: tout (masculine singular), toute (feminine singular), tous (masculine plural), and toutes (feminine plural), which in this edition have on most occasions been reproduced alongside the uninflected 'all'. It should be noted, however, that the distinction between toute and toutes is inaudible in spoken French, and thus in the absence of an article or other quantifying grammatical feature there is transcriptive uncertainty in some instances.

Lucio Fontana, Concetto spaziale, 1962, copper 38¼ × 77⅝ inches (97.2 × 196.5 cm)
Private Collection, courtesy of Sperone Westwater, New York

4 In § 11 on 'Die Allgemeinheit' from the Begriffsschrift, Frege writes of inserting eine Höhlung in the Inhaltsstriche, which Geach translates as a 'concavity in the content-stroke' (Translations from the Philosophical Writings of Gottlob Frege, second edition, Oxford: Blackwell, 1960, p. 16). Stefan Bauer-Mengelberg's 1967 translation (in van Heijenoort, J. (ed.), From Frege to Gödel, op. cit., p. 24) follows suit, as does Michael Beaney's 1997 translation (in The Frege Reader, Oxford: Blackwell, p. 69).

5 Originally coined by Molière in Le Médecin malgré lui (Act I, Scene 6), the phrase il y a fagots et fagots has passed into common idiomatic use in French to mean 'every alike is not the same'. The French fagot corresponds to its English-language cognate, signifying a bundle of twigs or small branches.

6 The French terms are la canaillerie and la bêtise, but the allusion is most probably to the distinction drawn in Seminar VII where Lacan reproduces the English vocabulary, referencing the tradition that reaches from Chaucer through to Elizabethan theatre. There, Lacan translates 'knave/knavery' as canaille/canaillerie, while 'fool' is rendered variously as sot, innocent, and demeuré.

7 The term was first coined at the end of the lesson of 19 May 1971. The Seuil edition transcribes as hommoinzin (Le séminaire livre XVIII, D'un discours qui ne serait pas du semblant, Paris: Seuil, 2006, p. 144). In 'L'étourdit' (Autres écrits, Seuil: Paris, 2001, p. 479) the spelling is hommoinsun. In the lesson of 9 June 1971, three possible forms are stipulated: au moins un ('at least one'); hommoinzin, punning on homme or homo; and a(u moins un), highlighting the function of the object a (Livre XVIII, ibid., p. 153). Here in this opening lesson, Lacan pronounces the term in a way that suggests a terminal 'e' indicative of feminine declension (to accord with the feminine erreur).

8 Seriner is to repeat something incessantly, or to drum something into someone, as one might train a canary to sing. In their entry on serin, Bloch and von Wartburg trace the verb to 1812. Further to the avian signification, a serin in French is also a 'dimwit' or 'silly billy' (since 1821).

9 Damourette and Pichon list these forms of post-verbal negation, of which the latter two are rather antiquated, as examples of the negation that forecloses, in contrast to the 'discordential' negation represented by the pre-verbal ne. The special quality of these words is that they can be associated with ne to function as adverbs, producing a negative signification. (When the respective meanings of the latter three terms are rendered approximately in English as 'not a jot', 'not a drop', and 'not a speck', this special quality is lost, since the negation 'not' has been appended to the noun as it could be in any other negative construction.)

Cf. Des mots à la pensée: Essai de grammaire de la langue française, Vol. I (1911–1927), d'Artrey, chapter 7.

Chapter II The Function Φ*x*

1 Hi-han is the French onomatopoeia for a donkey's bray, equivalent to 'hee-haw' in English. An appât is 'bait' or a 'lure'. Hi-han appât, or hihanappat as Lacan will write it in the second paragraph of 'Joyce le Symptôme' (Autres écrits, op. cit., p. 565), is loosely homophonic with the informal Y en a pas, 'there is / are none'.
2 Lacan says, au niveau du mythe d'Œdipe, 'at the level of the Oedipus myth'. The present edition respects the alteration introduced in the Seuil edition.

Chapter III From Anecdote to Logic

1 Several French authors had used the title Traité de logique for their tracts on logic: Philibert Damiron in 1836 (third volume of his Cours de philosophie); Joseph Duval-Jouve in 1843; Edmond Goblot in 1918; Jules Tricot in 1928 (Traité de logique formelle); and Charles Serrus in 1945.
2 August Weismann used the Latinate soma, but not germen which was chiefly an intervention of French translators and commentators to refer to Keimplasma, 'germ-plasm' (occasionally 'germinative plasma' in English), the substance of Keimzellen, 'germ cells'.
3 Frege refers to the blackletter 𝔞 that he uses to denote the bound variable in the Höhlung as a deutschen Buchstaben. Like much of the symbolic apparatus of the Begriffsschrift, the convention was not retained by the more influential authors who adopted and expanded its notational principles.
4 As in the previous chapter, Lacan's reference to le mythe de l'Œdipe is altered in the Seuil edition to Totem et Tabou.
5 The opening of this lesson was disturbed by a tirade from a member of the public.

Chapter IV From Necessity to Inexistence

1 Here, and seven paragraphs below, nécessité de discours might also be rendered as: 'necessitated by discourse'.
2 In modern usage, the French adjective grotesque extends wider than its English cognate to encompass the ludicrous, the ridiculous, and the preposterous.
3 The ambiguity is of course stronger in French (un désir d'enfant), since in English one would speak rather in terms of 'a desire for a child' and 'a child's desire'. Cf. the bilingual title of Wladimir Granoff's 1955 article in French, 'Desire for Children, Children's Desire: Un désir d'enfant', in La psychanalyse 2: 75–110, and Lacan's mention of the same in Book VIII of the Seminar (Paris: Seuil, revised edition 2001, p. 147).

4 Frege quotes Leibniz from the 1840 Johann Eduard Erdmann edition of Book IV of the Nouveaux Essais sur l'Entendement Humain (Ch. vii, § 10, p. 363), in Godhofredi Guillelmi Leibnitii Opera philosophica. Whereas Leibniz, in his definitions, spells out each number in roman letters, Frege uses arabic numerals (Frege, G., The Foundations of Arithmetic, translated by J. L. Austin, London: Blackwell & Mott, 1953 revised edition, § 6, p. 7).

5 On the Englishing of Frege's coinage Gleichzahlig, see Austin's footnote to § 68 of The Foundations (ibid., p. 79).

6 Austin translates 'Unter den Begriff "gleich 0 aber nicht gleich 0" fällt [. . .] kein Gegenstand' (§ 77), as 'under the concept "identical with 0 but not identical with 0" [. . .] no object falls' (ibid., p. 90).

7 Lacan has arranged the arithmetical triangle (see page 27) into an upper triangular matrix, as did Pascal himself. In this arrangement, the column 1, 3, 3, 1 corresponds to the subsets of the elements of a triad, i.e. 1 figure, 3 (monadic) vertices, 3 (dyadic) edges, and 1 (triadic) face. Having established the number of edges, it is then possible to read the horizontal row 1, 3, 6, 10, 15 . . . as the triangular numbers, i.e. the number of objects that can be arranged into a triangle, thus: a minimal triangle of 3 discrete objects is configured of a base of 2 and an apex of 1; then, a larger triangle of 6 is configured, with a base of 3 added to the previous 3; followed by a triangle of 10, with a base of 4 added to the previous 6; and so on. The next column, 1, 4, 6, 4, 1, corresponds to the subsets of a tetrad, i.e. 1 figure, 4 (monadic) vertices, 6 (dyadic) edges, 4 (triadic) faces, and 1 tetrad. Having established the number of faces, it is then possible to read the row 1, 4, 10, 20 . . . as the tetrahedral numbers, i.e. the number of objects that can be arranged into a tetrahedron, thus: a minimal tetrahedral of 4 discrete objects is configured of a base of 3 and an apex of 1; then, a larger tetrahedron of 10 is configured, with a base of 6 added to the previous 4; and so on. Note that the additional 'base' level of each new tetrahedral is derived from the triangular number that stands one position to the left in the row immediately above, just as the additional 'base' level of each new triangle is derived from the linear number that stands one space to the left in the row immediately above. The arithmetical triangle can be used to generate infinitely larger figurate numbers, beginning at the next level with the pentatope numbers.

8 At no point in the Seminar does Lacan enumerate the figurate numbers. However, the stenographer's typescript inserts the opening sequence of dyadic numbers, then the opening sequence of pentatope numbers, then the opening sequence of tetrahedral numbers, and finally the opening sequence of triadic numbers, in an apparent attempt to parse this and the previous paragraphs. The Seuil edition reproduces these sequences on pp. 59–60.

Chapter V Topology of Speech (A Talk at Sainte-Anne)

1 Isidore of Seville groups such terms in the category of 'medial (medius) nouns', and also writes of 'mongrel' (nothus) terms with corrupted (i.e.

inter-lingual) suffixes. See entry vii.13 in Book I of The Etymologies of Isidore of Seville, translated by S. A. Barney, W. J. Lewis, J. A. Beach, and O. Berghof, Cambridge University Press, 2006, p. 43.

2 The French reads: . . . parce que je ne pédale normalement. The verb pédaler carries the same primary signification as the English 'to pedal'. The noun pédale is sometimes used, informally and vulgarly, to label a male homosexual, and Lacan appears to be playing on this meaning here. The sentence that follows could be understood as reasserting the primary sense of the verb.

3 The French verb causer also means 'to talk' or 'to converse'. Thus, nous sommes causés par notre propre bla-bla-bla could be rendered as 'we are spoken by our own blather'.

4 In his previous talk at Sainte-Anne, on 6 January, Lacan gave himself over to some extemporized punning on (a)mur, a condensation of mur ('wall'), amour ('love'), and the object a (see Talking to Brick Walls, Cambridge: Polity, 2017, p. 98). The opening comments from the present session, included in the appendix to Talking to Brick Walls, explore the theme of 'the love letter/the letter on the wall' in relation to the story of the writing on the wall at Belshazzar's feast (ibid., pp. 108–9).

Chapter VI I Ask You to Refuse Me My Offering

1 Lacan offers no commentary on these characters. Reading right to left, they transliterate to Pinyin as: qǐng (please/invite/ask) jù shōu (refuse/reject) wǒ (I/me) zèng (offer/give) / gài (ancient form: because/probably/indeed) fēi (fusion of negative particle and copula: not be) yě (emphasis: thus/indeed not). The text is therefore a partial equivalent to je te demande de me refuser ce que je t'offre, parce que c'est pas ça; partial in that any analogues of te and ce que have been omitted. Although any source remains unidentified, the zōngpái script and the Old Chinese signification of 蓋 suggest a citation from an ancient text. The characters are missing from the Seuil edition (cf. Jacques-Alain Miller's response to a query on this matter in Lacan Quotidien 6 (25 August 2011): 6–7).

2 The French word conférence would in similar contexts translate fairly straightforwardly into English as 'lecture', but Lacan's ensuing comments seem to comprehend the more formal and antiquated use that links directly to the etymological root of conferring, conversing, consulting, and deliberating (from the Latin conferre). This signification coincides largely with the English 'conference'.

3 The Dictionnaire universel d'histoire et de géographie includes, as one would expect, an entry on Anicius Manlius Severinus Boëthius.

4 The French ache as in 'h' is homophonic with hache as in 'axe', thus the full sentence is homophonic with: 'Don't touch the axe'. For the bibliographic reference, see p. 227.

5 According to the rules of accordance for the passé composé in French, the past participle respects the gendered attribute of the complément d'objet direct, the pronoun that is directly attached to the verb. Thus, in this case, assuming the addressee denoted by t' to be female, the close of the declaration should read: . . . combien je t'ai aimée. The full sentence could be rendered as: 'you shall never know how much I loved you'.

6 Lacan uses a lower-case d for destinateur and a capital D for destinataire. Jakobson's vocabulary is sometimes rendered in English, including by Jakobson himself, using Addresser and Addressee.

7 Lacan expressly conflates the D of Demand with the D for destinataire in the triangle diagram. It should also be borne in mind that the French demande, especially when preceded, as here, by the indefinite article, also translates as 'request'. Thus, the form rendered here as 'I ask you . . .' is, in French, je te demande . . .

8 Up to this point, Lacan's audience would in all likelihood have understood Je te demande de me refuser ce que je t'offre as 'I ask you to reject what I'm offering you', i.e. with the relative pronoun ce que standing in for a noun, and offre functioning in the present indicative tense. Here, Lacan reiterates that he entertains a different meaning, with ce que being essentially reducible to the conjunction que, and offre functioning as what he calls a substantif verbal. In the present translation, an analogous ambiguity is rendered by means of the alternation between 'offering' as a noun and 'offering' as a gerund. This has led to the suppression of Lacan's remark, in this same sentence, that the verbal substantive is 'purported to be a lesser substantive, but is nevertheless quite something'. This remark comes in echo of the earlier comment concerning the dubious classificatory distinction between 'concrete substantives' and others.

9 Je te bouffe could also mean something like 'I'm biting your head off' or 'I'm eating you alive'.

10 Again, ce que tu désires que je te demande might initially suggest 'what you want me to ask you'.

Chapter VII The Vanished Partner (A Talk at Sainte-Anne)

1 First coined in the early twentieth century, the term partouze (also spelt partouse) refers to group sex, in a similar colloquial register to 'gang bang' or 'orgy'. While the term resembles partout, 'everywhere', it is derived from partie, as in a partie de cartes (a game or a round of cards) and the argotic suffix -ouse, which is used to form nouns.

2 The aitch added to Autre introduces an aspect of haughtiness or elevation. With a French pronunciation, Hun is identical to Un ('One') prefixed by a voiced aitch. Lacan had previously used Hun in the written text 'Lituraterre' of the year before, in his coinage Hun-en-peluce. Cf. 'Lituraterre' in Hurly-Burly 9: 34.

3 Lacan is turning sa femme, 'his wife', into a verb. The s followed by the apostrophe indicates a reflexive form, reminiscent of s'affamer, 'to starve oneself', or perhaps even s'affirmer, 'to affirm oneself'.

4 Lacan says, les aventures mythiques d'Œdipe, 'the mythical adventures of Oedipus'. The Seuil edition alters to les aventures mythiques du Père primitif, which is respected in the present edition. See Chapter II, endnote 2, and Chapter III, endnote 4.

5 Type désespéré could also be a 'hopeless guy'.

6 In the Baxter–Sagart system, the Old Chinese pronunciation is notated /*tˤa/; in the Zhengzhang system, /*ta:/.
7 Lacan says nous continuons à nous entretenir, which is at once an allusion to the entretien format of his presentations at Sainte-Anne and a jocular acknowledgement of their aspect of 'getting in shape' as far as formal logic is concerned.

Chapter VIII What is Involved in the Other

1 This remark features at the start of what is most commonly classified as the fifth argument or 'hypothesis', not the seventh. Lacan is drawing on the Auguste Diès translation ('. . . si le non-Un n'est pas?' in the 1923 Budé edition of Plato's Œuvres complètes, Vol. VIII). For εἰ μὴ ἓν μὴ ἔστιν (160b6), F. M. Cornford takes issue with the Diès rendering, and tries 'if a not-one (no thing) does not exist' (Plato and Parmenides, Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1939, p. 219); but is in turn challenged by R. E. Allen (Plato's Parmenides, Yale University Press, 1997, revised edition, pp. 329–30), who offers, 'if not unity is not' (p. 55). R. S. Brumbaugh gives 'if it is not the case that the one is not' (Plato on the One, Yale University Press, 1961, p. 165); while S. Scolnicov gives: 'if the not-one is not' (Plato's Parmenides, University of California Press, 2001, p. 148). See also the formalization by S. C. Rickless in Plato's Forms in Transition, Cambridge University Press, 2006, pp. 212–13, D5A1; and the comparison of the Diès and Cornford renderings by D. O'Brien in 'Einai copulatif et existentiel dans le Parménide de Platon', in Revue des Études Grecques, Vol. 118, 2005, §X, pp. 236–7.
2 The Seuil edition inserts parmi les réalistes to resolve an anacoluthon in the typescript. Lacan says only: C'est en ça que je me classe . . .
3 The French face and fasse are homophones. Fasse is the present subjunctive of faire in the third-person singular.
4 The pun is stronger in French: l'ontologie est une honte. For a more intricate extension of the same pun, see p. 426 of 'Radiophonie' in Autres écrits, op. cit.
5 There is likely a paranomasia here exploiting the signification of un savon as 'a telling-off' or 'a reprimand'.
6 Again, the Seuil edition, which is here respected, resolves an apparent anacoluthon. Lacan says: Ce qui veut dire qu'on ne peut pas écrire que ce qui y fait obstacle, à savoir la fonction phallique, ne soit pas vrai. ['This means that you cannot write that what forms an obstacle here, namely the phallic function, is untrue.']
7 Lacan plays on the proximity between Autre and entre to transform entreposer ('to store' or 'to stock') into Autreposer. In this coinage, one can also hear Autre-poser, 'to Alter-posit', or 'to posit Otherwise'.

Chapter IX In the Field of the Unian

1 The written form Yad'lun is an attempt to capture the concentrated pronunciation of Y a de l'Un, itself an informal contraction of Il y a de l'Un. Thus, not only does the content of the expression indicate the prominence of the One, but its very form presents as a unitary element. Compare the orthography here with that on p. 215 of the written report in the appendix.

2 Lacan is again drawing on the Diès translation, which here gives s'il est Un (op. cit. p. 72). For εἰ ἓν ἔστιν (137c4), Cornford prefers 'if there is a One' (op. cit., p. 116). O'Brien concludes that a systematic comparison of all the occurrences formulated in the second part of the Parmenides confirms Cornford's translation of the verb in an existential sense, and disqualifies the Diès reading as a copulative verb (op. cit., p. 245). See also the discussion by C. C. Meinwald in Plato's Parmenides, Oxford University Press, 1991, pp. 40–5. Brumbaugh gives 'if one is' (op. cit., p. 55); Scolnicov gives 'if the one is' (op. cit. pp. 78, 80); as does Rickless (op. cit., pp. 106–11, 114 (D1A1)). Allen, meanwhile, gives 'if Unity is' (op. cit., p. 17). A further likely source for Lacan's discussion is F. Regnault's 1968 article from the Cahiers pour l'analyse, recently translated by K. Peden and P. Hallward as 'Dialectic of Epistemologies', in Concept and Form, Vol. I, Selections from the Cahiers pour l'analyse, Verso, 2012, pp. 119–50.

3 Whereas in English it has become customary to distinguish orthographically between Aristoteles (of The Four Hundred and of The Thirty Tyrants) and Aristotle (of Stageira), French uses the single proper name Aristote for both instances of Ἀριστοτέλης. Some commentators in English have, however, preferred 'Aristotle' for the youth in the Parmenides, notably Meinwald (op. cit.) and Rickless (op. cit.).

4 For ἀδολεσχίας (135d4), Cornford gives 'idle talk' (op. cit., p. 103), as do Allen (op. cit., pp. 15, 207) and Scolnicov (op. cit., p. 74). Cf. Brumbaugh, op. cit., p. 22.

5 L'essence-maître and l'essence-esclave are Diès's renderings of ὃ ἔστι δεσπότης and ὃ ἔστι δοῦλος (133d6–133e1). Cornford gives 'the essential Master' and 'the essential Slave' (op. cit., p. 96); Allen gives 'what it is to be a master' and 'what it is to be a slave'; Scolnicov gives 'that which is master' and 'that which is slave' (op. cit., p. 70); Rickless gives 'what a master is' and 'what a slave is' (op. cit., p. 87).

6 Probably an allusion to Deuteronomy 15:12–18, though perhaps also to Genesis 37:27–8, and/or to Exodus 21:2–11, 20–1. Compare, however, Leviticus 25:39–55.

7 The Seuil edition introduces a modification here by inserting the general formula for computing the number of 2-element subsets in an n-element set (n-choose-2) in place of Lacan's formula that places $n(n-1)$ as the numerator and 2 as the denominator. Lacan's slip, saying 'seven times eight is forty-two', has also been emended (see the note on p. 229).

8 The stenographer's typescript, which is the source text for the Seuil edition, gives que l'Un ne sache être comme être, but no such ne is audible on the audio recording. Cf. Parmenides, 160c7–d1: πρῶτον μὲν ἄρα γνωστόν τι λέγει, ἔπειτα ἕτερον τῶν ἄλλων, ὅταν εἴπῃ ἕν, εἴτε τὸ εἶναι αὐτῷ προσθεὶς εἴτε τὸ μὴ εἶναι: οὐδὲν γὰρ ἧττον γιγνώσκεται, τί τὸ λεγόμενον μὴ εἶναι, καὶ ὅτι διάφορον τῶν ἄλλων.

9 Cf. Parmenides, 160b5, passim.

10 For τὸ ἐξαίφνης (156d3), Cornford gives 'the instant' (op. cit., p. 200), as do Brumbaugh (op. cit., p. 148), Allen (op. cit., p. 49), Scolnicov (op. cit., p. 137), and Rickless (op. cit., p. 193).

Chapter X Yad'lun

1 This mention of the ahistorical character of the Parmenides may indicate that, despite the reservations expressed in the previous lesson, Lacan nevertheless held the youth Ἀριστοτέλης to be the same as Aristotle the philosopher. Alternatively, this may be an allusion to the long-held notion (from Athenaeus of Naucratis down to Eduard Zeller) that the meeting between Parmenides and Socrates must be a 'poetic fiction'. Compare, however, T. L. Heath, Aristarchus of Samos, the Ancient Copernicus, Cambridge University Press, 1913, pp. 62–3, footnote 4.

2 The translation si l'un est un was first given for εἰ ἓν ἔσται τὸ ἕν (137d3) by Victor Cousin (Œuvres de Platon, Vol. XII, Paris: Rey, 1846, p. 28). Diès gives 'si l'Un doit être un' (op. cit., p. 23), which is endorsed by Regnault ('Dialectique d'épistémologies', Cahiers pour l'analyse 9: 53). Cornford gives 'if the One is to be one' (op. cit., p. 116); Scolnicov gives 'if the one is to be one' (op. cit., p. 80); and Allen gives 'if unity is to be one' (op. cit., p. 17). Cf. Rickless (op. cit., p. 108).

3 For οὐδαμοῦ ἂν εἴη (138a2) and ἐστίν που τὸ ἕν (138b5), Cornford gives 'it cannot be anywhere' and 'the One is not anywhere' (op. cit., p. 119). Brumbaugh gives 'the one [...] will be nowhere' and 'the one is not anywhere' (op. cit., pp. 62, 64); Allen gives 'it would be nowhere' and 'unity is nowhere' (op. cit., p. 18); Scolnicov gives 'it would be nowhere' and 'the one is not anywhere' (op. cit., p. 82). See also Rickless (op. cit., pp. 117–18, DIA6).

4 For ἂν περιέχοιτο ὑπ' ἐκείνου ἐν ᾧ ἐνείη (138a4), Cornford gives 'it would be encompassed all round by that in which it was contained' (op. cit., p. 119). Brumbaugh gives 'it would be encircled by that in which it was' (op. cit., p. 62); Allen gives 'it would be contained in a circle by what it was in' (op. cit., p. 18, and footnote 65 on p. 231, which takes issue with Cornford); and Scolnicov gives 'it would somehow be encompassed round by that in which it would be' (op. cit., p. 82).

5 For ἄπειρον ἄρα τὸ ἕν (137d7), Cornford gives 'it is without limits' (op. cit., p. 118). Brumbaugh gives 'the one is unlimited' (op. cit., p. 59); Allen gives 'unity is unlimited' (op. cit., p. 17); and Scolnicov gives 'the one is unlimited' (op. cit., p. 81) and 'the one is undelimited' (pp. 81–2). See also Rickless (op. cit., pp. 115–16, DIA4).

6 W. B. Ewald translates 'das Uneigentlich-unendliches' (Grundlagen einer allgemeinen Mannichfaltigkeitslehre, Leipzig: Teubner, 1883, p. 166) as 'the improper infinite' ('Foundations of a General Theory of Manifolds', in From Kant to Hilbert: A Source Book in the Foundations of Mathematics, Vol. II, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996, p. 882). G. Chaitkin prefers 'non-genuine-Infinite' ('On the Theory of the Transfinite; Correspondence of Georg Cantor and Cardinal J. B. Franzelin (1885–1886)', in Fidelio 3(3): 101, 103).

7 In 'Beiträge zur Begründung der transfiniten Mengenlehre', Cantor uses the terms '"Teil" oder "Teilmenge"' (1895 version of 'Beiträge zur Begründung der transfiniten Mengenlehre', § 1, in Gesammelte Abhandlungen, Berlin: Springer, 1932, p. 282), which P. E. B. Jourdain renders as '"part" or "partial aggregate"' (Contributions to the Founding of the Theory of Transfinite Numbers, London: Open Court, 1915, p. 86). As Lacan notes in the following chapter, the former vocabulary of 'aggregates' and 'parts' has since been superseded by that of 'sets' and 'subsets'. His pertinacious use of 'part' may be intended to evoke the Greek μέρος, used in Euclid's Elements (VII, g′–d′), and in the Parmenides (153d7–8); a coincidence noted by Diès and, previously, by Sir Thomas Heath (A History of Greek Mathematics, Vol. I, Oxford: Clarendon, 1921, p. 294).

Chapter XI An Issue of Ones (A Talk at Sainte-Anne)

1 The allusion is to the verb phrase faire avec les moyens du bord, which may be rendered as 'to make do with what is to hand' or '. . . with what is lying around'. When voicing his nonce word bord-homme, Lacan does not make a liaison 'd' at the end of bord ('rim' or 'frontier'), thus producing a phone that resembles the first two syllables of borroméen.

2 The neologism is not Lacan's own. The spelling in the Seuil edition, hénologie, matches the orthography that has come to dominate since Leo S. J. Sweeney first set down 'henology' in 1961 ('Basic Principles in Plotinus' Philosophy', in Gregorianum 42:510). However, Étienne Gilson had previously coined énologie in 1948 (L'être et l'essence, Paris: Vrin, p. 42).

3 Lacan's s'éventailler is a neologism in French. An éventail is a 'fan'. The closest verb form is tailler ('to trim', 'to prune', 'to chisel', etc.).

4 An Auvergnate is an inhabitant of the Auvergne. Cf. Alfred Delvau's jocular Dictionnaire érotique moderne (Brussels, 1864): 'AUVERGNATE. Qui appartient au troisième sexe – puisqu'elle n'est pas homme et ne veut pas être femme.'

5 Conveniently, the English verb 'to found' carries both the sense of 'to establish' and 'to melt'. See also Chapter XIII, endnote 1.

6 For 'Unter einer "Menge" verstehen wir jede Zusammenfassung M von bestimmten wohlunterschiedenen Objekten m unsrer Anschauung oder unseres Denkens [. . .] zu einem Ganzen' ('Beiträge zur Begründung der transfiniten Mengenlehre', op. cit., §1, p. 282), P. E. B. Jourdain gives: 'By an "aggregate" we are to understand any collection into a whole M of definite and separate objects m of our intuition or our thought' (Contributions to the Founding of the Theory of Transfinite Numbers, op. cit., p. 85).

7 That is, the pentahedroid, or 5-cell (C_5), this being the object that corresponds to the pentatope numbers in the arithmetical triangle (see Ch. IV, endnote 7, above). On the audio recording (the apparent source for the stenographer's typescript), there is a hiatus just before this sentence, which may account for the sudden skip from the columns for cardinals 3 and 4 to the column for cardinal 5.

8 Lacan uses distinct and défini for Cantor's bestimmten wohlunterschiedenen (see endnote 6 to this chapter).

Chapter XII Knowledge about Truth

1 Lacan says: Voilà comment de toujours on aurait appelé ça. L'est-ce? point d'interrogation. Even in stipulating the question mark, the juxtaposition of Ça and Es – the French translation and the German source of the term that James Strachey translated as the Id – is particularly striking.
2 This is a probable reference to the Mouvement de libération des femmes, which held its first public meeting in 1970. It grew out of the Mouvement démocratique féminin. It is unlikely that Lacan's term modèles-modèles is an allusion to fashion models (more commonly mannequins in French).
3 Though the term 'creative subject' abounds in the mathematical literature, 'creating subject' is a more loyal translation of L. E. J. Brouwer's scheppende subject.
4 Lacan likely intends bc instead of ba, since the four partitions of the three-element set {a,b,c} are: {ab/c}, {a/bc}, {ac/b}, {abc}. These could be arranged as follows:

3 {a,b,c}

3 {ab/c}, {a/bc}, {ac/b}

1 {abc} — 4

Chapter XIII The Founding of Sexual Difference

1 See Chapter XI, endnote 5.
2 La bourgeoise carries the same indecorous and disparaging tonality as 'her indoors' or 'the missus', but with the further connotation of 'she who rules the roost'.
3 'Il court, il court, le furet' ['He runs, he runs, the ferret'] is the title of a children's song (transcribed in 1870 by Jean-Baptiste Weckerlin), sung during 'Pass the parcel' and other party games. The title refrain, or the tune of the refrain, is often used independently of the song to insinuate that someone is being made to hunt for something, or is being given the runaround. Cf. Lacan's allusion to the jeu du furet, the 'hunt-the-ring' parlour game, in Talking to Brick Walls, op. cit., p. 99.
4 Similar use of such reflexive forms as se penser, se dire and, below, s'articuler is often translated into English as a passive construction ('to be thought', 'to be said', etc.) on the grounds that the grammatical subject does not hold grammatical agency. Here, however, there is a firm attribution of grammatical agency to the Ça and to the One.
5 As above, the signifier \dø\ might equally be transcribed: d'eux.

6 According to some transcripts, this sentence had been written up on the blackboard at the start of the lesson.

Chapter XIV Theory of the Four Formulae (A Talk at Sainte-Anne)

1 Lacan is punning on the expression séparer le bon grain de l'ivrai, 'to sort the wheat from the chaff'.
2 The French pronunciation of saints is homophonic with seins, 'breasts'.
3 Concerning the English terms that correspond to canaillerie and bêtise, see Chapter I, endnote 6.
4 Another pun, this time on the two senses of fini: both 'finished' and 'finite'.
5 On the audio recording, this sentence is interrupted midway by the first of several barrages of bangers being let off outside the chapel. This is the disturbance to which Lacan alludes at the end of the talk (p. 184) and at the start of the following chapter (p. 189).
6 C'est un repère perhaps contains a pun on père, 'father'.
7 Lacan says l'homme with a definite article, but femme with no article. What is here rendered as 'man' might also be understood as 'mankind'.
8 This may be an allusion to the Parmenides (139c 8). Although Diès translates αὐτῷ as 'par lui-même', Alexandre Kojève coins 'l'Un-tout-seul' specifically in reference to this passage (Essai d'une historie raisonnée de la philosophie païenne, Vol. I, Paris: Gallimard, 1968, p. 212). See also Lacan's footnote to his 'Report', on page 218 below.
9 Here and in the following paragraph, Lacan's reference to l'Œdipe is altered in the Seuil edition to Totem et Tabou, as it was in Chapters II, III, and VII.
10 The term femme virile is used in French when the term 'mannish woman' might be used in English.
11 Here Lacan is punning on the homophonic coincidence in French between the stem vir- and conjugations of the verb virer, 'to veer'. There is no shared etymology. Parer à virer is a command used in a nautical context: 'prepare to go about!'
12 As above, mythe d'Œdipe is altered in the Seuil edition to mythe de Totem et Tabou.
13 This diagram is a considerably modified version of the one recorded in the stenographer's original typescript, reproduced with slight alteration on page 207 of the Seuil edition. The typescript carries a warning that the accuracy of the diagram as there recorded is uncertain.

Chapter XV The Desire to Sleep

1 For immixtion des sujets (Le séminaire de Jacques Lacan, livre II, Paris: Seuil, pp. 192, 228; Écrits, Paris: Seuil, 1966, p. 16), S. Tomaselli gives 'inmixing (sic) of subjects' (The Seminar of Jacques Lacan, Book II, Cambridge University Press, 1988, pp. 160, 194) as does B. Fink (Écrits in English, New York: Norton, 2006, p. 10). See, too, R. Grigg's footnote on page 193 of The Seminar of Jacques Lacan, Book III, Norton/Routledge, 1993.

2 The exclamation from the man in the audience is Une pollution! The indefinite article indicates that he is denoting a pollution nocturne, a 'nocturnal emission', in jocular response to the preceding discussion on sleep. In the present translation, the signifier 'pollution' is favoured due to Lacan's ensuing response.

Chapter XVI Bodies Captured by Discourse

1 Lacan here employs one of his favourite locutions, Ce n'est pas [. . .] ce qu'un vain peuple pense, which derives from Voltaire's Œdipe, Act IV Scene 1: 'Nos prêtres ne sont pas ce qu'un vain peuple pense'. The line was rendered by Thomas Francklin in 1761 as 'These priests are not what the vile rabble think them'.

2 Mémorisé is pronounced syllable by syllable in a way that suggests mes mots risée, 'my words, a laughingstock'.

3 Cf. R. Grigg's note on astudé on page 9 of his translation of Book XVII (Norton, 2007). The rendering 'astudied' appears on page 105 of the same. The prefixed 'a' may function both as a privative and, crucially, as object a, the student holding the position of the a in Lacan's formalization of the university discourse. The verbal pun is on étudié, which means 'studied' in the sense of 'well thought out' or 'carefully considered', and enseigné, 'taught'. There is a further overtone of astreinte, 'obligation' or 'constraint', as Lacan observes in his intervention of 19 April 1970 (Lettres de l'École Freudienne 8: 211).

4 Respecting the orthography adopted in the Seuil edition, à-former could be rendered as 'for training'. Note, however, that the homophonic a-formés is also plausible: 'a-formed' or 'a-shaped'.

5 En corps ('in body') is homophonic with encore, 'again', 'still' or 'more'.

6 For the correct date, see the previous chapter (p. 192) and the 'Library to Seminar XIX' (p. 231).

7 For βέλτιον γὰρ ἴσως μὴ λέγειν τὴν ψυχὴν ἐλεεῖν ἢ μανθάνειν ἢ διανοεῖσθαι, ἀλλὰ τὸν ἄνθρωπον τῇ ψυχῇ (De anima, I, 4, 408b 13–15), R. D. Hicks gives 'Doubtless it would be better not to say that the soul pities or learns or thinks, but that the man does so with the soul (De anima, Cambridge University Press, 1907, p. 33); more paraphrastically, Walter Stanley Hett gives 'Probably it is better not to say that the soul pities, or learns, or thinks, but to say rather that the soul is the instrument whereby man does these things' ('On The Soul' in Aristotle in Twenty-Three Volumes, Vol. VIII, Loeb, 1953, p. 47); D.W. Hamlyn gives, 'For it is surely better not to say that the soul pities, learns, or thinks, but that the man does these with his soul' (Aristotle's De Anima, Book I, Oxford: Clarendon, 1968); Ronald Polansky gives, somewhat equivocally, 'It is better perhaps not to say the soul pities or learns or thinks, but the human being due to the soul' (Aristotle's De Anima: A Critical Commentary, Cambridge University Press, 2007, p. 113); while more recently Christopher Shields has given the limpid rendering, 'For it is perhaps better not to say that the soul pities or thinks, but that the human being does these things with the soul' (De anima, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2016, p. 14). In his Commentary, Shields (p. 144), unpacks the two possible readings of τῇ ψυχῇ as i. 'with the soul' or ii. 'in virtue of his having a soul' / 'by means of having a soul', further noting that Jonathan Barnes prefers the latter (cf. 1972, 'Aristotle's Concept of Mind' in Proceedings of the Aristotelian Society, 72:101–114) which he rejects in favour of the former (referring the reader to his 1988 article, 'Soul as Subject in Aristotle's De anima' in Classical Quarterly 38: 140–9). Lacan first uses the paraphrastic formula 'l'homme pense avec son âme' in the opening lesson of Seminar III.

Appendices: Library to Seminar XIX (Jacques-Alain Miller)

1 Reading l'incommensurabilité de la diagonale du carré for l'incommunicabilité de la diagonale du carré (p. 246 of the Seuil edition).
2 Lacan punned on l'(a)mur and a-murs-ement at the end of the entretien of 6 January 1972 (Talking to Brick Walls, op. cit., p. 98). 'Lettre d'amur' is from the opening section of this same entretien (3 February 1972), which is included as an appendix to Talking to Brick Walls (ibid., pp. 108–9). See above, Chapter V, endnote 4.
3 Miller inverts the husband and wife: in Lacan's example, 'sa femme le frictionne' (Écrits, p. 827).
4 While Gödel's 1944 paper contains some discussion of the theory of integers and transfinite orders (cf. pp. 134–6), the remark that more closely matches Lacan's comment is the third note defining technical terms in the 1947 paper 'What is Cantor's Continuum Problem?' (Collected Works, Vol. II, op. cit., pp. 186–7; revised in the 1964 reprint, pp. 264–5).
5 The Seminar of 1954–5, which includes the commentary on the dream of Irma's injection, is Séminaire II (sessions of 9 and 16 March), translated by Sylvana Tomaselli as The Ego in Freud's Theory and in the Technique of Psychoanalysis (Cambridge University Press, 1988).
6 Eco's character 'Dr Wagner' seems to be loosely based on Lacan.
7 Lacan mistakenly attributes the painting to Brueghel. This is emended in the Seuil edition (p. 223), which includes a reproduction of the 1502 panel (reversed right to left).
8 Judging by Lacan's description, he had also seen works from the Concetto spaziale, New York series (1962), which are executed on copper plates. The Seuil edition includes a reproduction of a 1968 canvas from the Concetto spaziale, Attese series.

Index

abacus 115
abjection, abject 210, 216, 218 Abraham (Binding of Isaac) 179–80 absence 9, 104, 182
  see also jouissance, jouissabsence active and passive 94, 164, 165 affect 204, 218
Alcibiades 148
Aleph (ℵ) 115, 117, 155, 156–7
  Aleph-Nought ($\aleph_0$) 115, 125, 140, 141, 149, 156–7, 216, 218n see also transfinite algebra 61, 62
all (πᾶν, tout, tous, toutes) 5–6, 12, 25, 32, 44, 82, 83, 90, 93–4, 101, 116, 146, 168, 184–5, 190, 223–234n
  One as all 116
  see also proposition, universal affirmative; quantifiers, universal quantifier Allen, R. E.
  Plato's Parmenides 239n, 240n, 241n
Althusser, Louis 95
(a)mur see letter, lettre d'amur analytic discourse see discourse, of the analyst ananke (ἀνάγκη) 38 animals 5–6, 19, 21, 31, 38–9, 42, 63, 81–3, 91, 94, 122, 179, 193, 217 see also ethology animistic model 82
Anzieu, Didier
  L'Autoanalyse de Freud 192, 231
Aphrodite Urania 109
Apollinaire
  Les Mamelles de Tiresias 9, 225
Apuleius 90, 222
  The Golden Ass 90, 222
archetype 55, 235
Archimedes 123, 221–2 argument 4, 6, 32–4, 44, 45, 86, 120–1, 165–6
  'argument-function' 33, 85
  argumentum ad absurdum 196
Aristophanes 109, 158–9
Aristoteles 111–12, 240n, 241n
Aristotle 22, 32, 33, 35, 98, 111, 162, 222, 240n, 241n
  De anima 211, 218, 245n
  Metaphysics 17–20, 23, 92, 120, 136–7, 221
  Poetics 151, 230
  Physics 117, 221
  Prior Analytics 5, 12, 13, 16, 23–4, 32, 33, 35–6, 85, 90, 116, 120, 183, 185, 221, 233 see also prosdiorismoi arithmetic 29–30, 43, 115 arithmetical triangle 27, 46–8, 52–3, 91, 116, 126–7, 141–2, 155, 215, 218, 236n, 242n art 59–60 assertion 5–6, 13, 120
Athenaeus of Naucratis 241n
Atlas (Air France magazine) 191
Austin, John Langshaw
  The Foundations of Arithmetic (Frege) 223, 236n authenticity (echt) 18–19 automatism 38, 39–40
Auvergnate 134, 242n

Averroism 67
Axiom of Extensionality 125

bacteria 41
Baillie, Sir James Black Phenomenology of Mind (Hegel) 228
Balzac, Honoré de La Duchesse de Langeais 227
Barnes, Jonathan
  'Aristotle's Concept of Mind' 245n
  Complete Works of Aristotle 221
Baron, Margaret E.
  The Origins of Infinitesimal Calculus 223
Bataille, Georges
  La Part maudite 228
Baudelaire, Charles 152
  Choix de maximes consolantes sur l'amour 230
Bauer-Mengelberg, Stefan
  Begriffsschrift (Frege) 223, 234n
Beaney, Michael
  Begriffsschrift (Frege) 223, 234n
  'On Sinn and Bedeutung' 223 Beauvoir, Simone de
  Le Deuxième Sexe 80, 228
Bedeutung see denotation; reference
Being 39, 81, 89–90, 96, 100, 103, 122, 133, 199, 216, 217, 218 désêtre, deserted Being 210 and existence 12, 89
  not-being 117
  and the One 20, 116, 119, 162, 180, 198 see also life, living being; speaking being belief 40
Beman, Wooster Woodruff Essays on the Theory of Numbers (Dedekind) 223
Berge, Claude
  Principles of Combinatorics 229
Berkeley, Bishop (George) 97, 134
  A Treatise Concerning the Principles of Human Knowledge 229
Bessière, Pierre Étienne
  Cantor a tort (Metrios) 176, 181–2, 225n
Bible 89
  Deuteronomy 240n
  Ecclesiastes 148
  Exodus 240n
  Genesis 216, 240n biology 19, 31, 41, 122, 226, 229 bipartition 109, 142, 156, 157
Black, Max
  'On Sense and Reference' (Frege) 223
Bloch, Oscar
  Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue française (with von Wartburg) 10, 110, 234
Blondin, Marie-Louise 229
Bocheński, Józef Maria Formale Logik 223 body 31, 108–9, 130, 193, 199, 201–2, 203, 204, 207, 210, 211, 218 and jouissance 21, 32, 130, 193, 201, 209, 218 Boëthius, Anicius Manlius Saverinus 67, 237n
Boetius de Dacia 67, 222
Boole, George 154, 223
Borde, Constance
  The Second Sex (Beauvoir; with Malovany-Chevalier) 228
Borromean rings ('knot') 75–6, 78, 79, 228, 242n Borromeo, House of 75
Bosch, Hieronymus (workshop of)
  The Conjurer 199, 232
Bostock, John
  Natural History (Pliny; with Riley) 229
Bouillet, Marie-Nicolas
  Dictionnaire universel d'histoire et de géographie 67, 237
Bourbaki, Nicolas
  Éléments de mathématique 20–1, 224–5 Éléments d'histoire des mathématiques 225 bourgeoise 159, 163, 243n
Boyer, Carl Benjamin
  The History of Calculus and Its Conceptual Development 223
Bray, René
  La Préciosité et les Précieux 225
Breton, André
  L'Amour fou 230

Breugel, Pieter 246
bricolage 39
Broneer, Paul
  Number Words and Number Symbols (Menninger) 227
Brookes, W. M.
  Mathematical Models of Morphogenesis (Thom; with Rand) 225 brother, fraternity 114, 210–11
Brouwer, L. E. J.
  'Consciousness, Philosophy and Mathematics' 224
  see also creative/creating subject Brownian motion 160
Brumbaugh, Robert S.
  Plato on the One 239n, 240n, 241n
Brunschwig, Jacques
  'La proposition particulière et les preuves de non-concluance chez Aristote' 90, 222
Buddhism 148
Bynum, Terrell Ward
  Conceptual Notation and Related Articles (Frege) 223

Cahiers pour l'analyse 90, 102–3, 222, 240n Cantor, Georg 124, 125, 138, 141, 154, 157, 176–7, 181, 215–16, 224, 241n, 242n cardinality see number, cardinal number castration 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28, 30–2, 64, 148, 179–80, 183–4, 185, 219 castration complex 8 and woman 34–5, 86, 88, 93
  see also function, phallic
Cauchy, Augustin-Louis 123, 222
Caws, Mary Ann
  Mad Love (Breton) 230
Caxton, William
  The Golden Legende (Jacobus da Varagine; with Ellis) 231 Chaitkin, Gabriele
  'On the Theory of the Transfinite' (Cantor and Franzelin) 241n Change journal 190, 231
Charraud, Nathalie
  Infini et inconscient 224
Chaucer, Geoffrey 234n
Christian religion 103, 148, 164 chromosome 31, 166 cinema 151 classes (logic) 92, 93, 166, 167 code 70–1 cognizance 28–9, 199–200, 217 see also nous combinatorics 41, 79, 115–6 commensurability and incommensurability (maths) 177, 222, 246n concavity see hollow concept and number 44–7, 236n conjunction 56, 86–7, 91 contingent, contingency 13, 36, 89, 185–6 opposite of impossible 36 contradiction 120, 183, 185, 196 principle of 36, 38
copulation 81, 82, 109, 229
Cornford, Francis Macdonald
  Plato and the Parmenides 239n, 240n, 241n cosmology 206–7
Cousin, Victor
  Œuvres de Platon 241n creative/creating subject (scheppende subject) 152, 224, 243n Crew, Henry Dialogues Concerning Two New Sciences (Galileo; with de Salvio) 229
Crick, Francis 226
Cunnison, Ian
  The Gift (Mauss) 228

da Vinci, Leonardo 59–60
  Notebooks 60, 227
Damiron, Philibert
  Cours de philosophie 235n
Damourette, Jacques
  Des mots à la pensée, Essai de la grammaire de la langue française (with Pichon) 14, 110, 225, 234n
Dauben, Joseph Warren
  Georg Cantor, His Mathematics and Philosophy of the Infinite 224
Davies, John Astrea (d'Urfé) 230

death 31–2, 41, 42, 76, 175, 183, 217 struggle to the death 114
Delvau, Alfred
  Dictionnaire érotique moderne 242n
De Morgan, Augustus 154, 223
Dedekind, Richard 171, 223–4 defence 151
défteros (δεύτερος) 80 demand 70, 72–3, 75, 76, 77, 238n demonstration 6, 30, 34, 39, 41, 100, 103, 151, 152, 181 monstration and 154
denotation (Bedeutung) 5, 33–4, 42, 43, 45, 56, denumerability 139–40, 156, 176, 181, 216 non-denumerable 124, 138, 139–40, 141, 180
Derrida, Jacques
  L'écriture et la différence 226
  De la grammatologie 226
Desanti, Jean-Toussaint
  'Une crise de développement exemplaire' 222
  Les nombres: que sont-ils et à quoi servent-ils? (Dedekind) 223
Descartes, René 38, 99, 162, 228, 231 désêtre see Being, désêtre desire 58, 59, 151, 184, 192–3, 209–10, 218
  'desire = 0' 209–10
  'desire of a child' (désir d'enfant) 43 and discourse 58, 206
  and libido 178
detumescence 41
Deuteronomy see Bible deux/d'eux see twain, two Diagonal Method 124, 181 diagram of the two mirrors ('optical model') 89, 147 dialectic 29, 92, 101, 107, 113, 116 dialogue
  'life-and-death dialogue' 31 pas de dialogue 219
  Platonic 111–12, 119
Dictionnaire universel d'histoire et de géographie see Bouillet, Marie-Nicolas
Diès, Auguste
  Parménide (Plato) 239n, 240n, 241n, 242n difference 102, 125, 144–5, 156, 167–8 no difference 46
  see also One, One of difference; small difference Diotima 109
discordance 14
discourse 4, 6, 11, 14, 22, 38, 40–2, 59, 60, 61, 62, 82, 98, 101–2, 103, 113, 129–30, 133, 135, 149, 152, 160, 201–4, 206, 207, 210, 211, 216, 217, 235n common 4, 208 of the analyst 11, 27, 28, 32, 38, 41, 42, 52, 53–4, 55, 57–8, 62–3, 64, 77, 85, 92, 98, 101, 102, 108, 110, 118, 119–20, 121–2, 129, 131–2, 142, 145, 153–4, 160, 169, 174–5, 191, 194, 195, 197, 199, 204, 205, 207–10, 215 of the master 39, 58, 98, 101, 113–14, 132–3, 148–9, 199, 200, 203–4, 207 the four discourses 52, 53, 62, 227 and logic 29–30, 38, 41, 42, 61, 194
  and meaning 29, 38, 54, 64, 98, 101, 132, 160
  naïve 29
  scientific 62, 84, 122, 173, 182, 194
  sexual 9
  and social bond 30, 52, 62, 131, 132, 160 tetradic structure (quadripode) 38, 51–3, 56, 64, 84, 193, 200, 205 university 57, 98, 119, 132, 194–5, 203, 245n disjunction 86, 87–8, 91–2, 99
DNA (deoxyribonucleic acid) 41, 226 doltishness (bêtise) 17–19, 22, 23, 102 Dōu (都) 93
doxa (δοχα) 57–8
Drake, Stillman
  Two New Sciences (Galileo) 229 dreams 64, 191–3, 209–10, 218 dream-work 219 drive (Trieb, pulsion) 152 death drive 108

Dufour-Maître, Myriam
Les Précieuses 225
Duval-Jouve, Joseph
Traité de logique 235n
dyad 27, 47, 108, 111, 127, 202–3

Ebbesen, Sten
'Theories of language in the Hellenistic age and in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries' 222
Ecclesiastes see Bible Eco, Umberto 198–9, 232
Il pendolo di Foucault (Dr Wagner) 232, 246n
La struttura assente 198–9
École pratique des Hautes Études 215
Eichholz, D. E.
Natural History Vol. X (Pliny) 229
eidos (εἶδος) 113
El Shaddai 191
Ellis, Frederick Startridge
The Golden Legende (Jacobus da Varagine; with Caxton) 231 empiricism 44
empty set see sets Enlightenment 22
enunciation 66, 120, 151
Epicureans 59
equinumerosity (Gleichzahlig) 45, 46, 83, 236n see also one-to-one correspondence Eros 83, 91, 108–9, 136
eroticism 62, 83 essence 12, 91, 94, 113–14, 127, 132
and existence 12, 101, 176
male and female 81, 84, 91 ethology 82, 152
Euclid
Elements 126–7, 221, 242n
Eudoxus of Cnidus 221
Ewald, William Bragg
From Kant to Hilbert Vol. II 223, 224, 241n exception 25, 26, 92, 93, 180 without exception 93–4, 104 existence 6, 12–13, 25, 33, 35, 40, 44, 72, 82, 91, 93, 98, 100–1, 104, 121, 158, 177–8, 180, 183, 185, 194
and Being 89–90, 117
and essence 12, 101, 176 ex-sist 115, 117, 218, 219 and the fact of saying 14, 35, 178, 182 of God 25, 96, 178–9
and the One 116–17, 123, 165, 176
There exists 12–13, 24–6, 33–5, 44, 63, 86, 88, 92, 100, 119, 120, 121, 135, 146, 158, 168, 178, 182–3, 189
There exists not 26, 35, 44, 86, 88, 89, 119, 135, 180, 183, 196 see also quantifiers, existential quantifier exponentiation, exponential function 125, 141, 150, 156
Exodus see Bible

Faladé, Solange 185
fantasy 97, 121, 122, 152, 205–6, 210, 219 father 25, 34–5, 59, 179, 180, 182, 184, 189–90, 211, 244n and God 25
not castrated 25 primal father 91
see also Name-of-the-Father feeblemindedness (débilité mentale) 113, 114, 115 femininity 8, 92, 169
see also jouissance, feminine (other) jouissance; woman Fink, Bruce 244n
Flament, Dominique
Histoire des nombres complexes 231
Fontana, Lucio 206, 232
Concetto spaziale, Attese 232, 246n Concetto spaziale, New York 206, 246n fool, foolishness 6–7, 174–5, 234n foreclosure and discordance 13–14, 234n Verwerfung 172, 231 founding (fondre/fonder) 136, 158, 184, 185, 189, 242n Fourier, Joseph 123, 222
Fowler, David Herbert
Structural Stability and Morphogenesis (Thom) 225
Fraenkel, Abraham A.
Abstract Set Theory 129–30

Francklin, Thomas
Œdipe (Voltaire) 245n
Frappier, Mélanie
Science and Hypothesis (Poincaré; with Smith and Stump) 224 fraternity see brother free association 112, 113 freedom 131, 173, 174 freethinking 174
Frege, Gottlob 41
Begriffsschrift 6, 223, 234n, 235n
Grundlagen der Arithmetik 41–8, 61, 90, 114–15, 154, 215, 223, 236n
'Über Sinn und Bedeutung' 42, 223
French Revolution 174
Freud, Sigmund 27, 31, 36, 38, 40, 41, 42, 55, 57, 91, 108, 136, 146, 147, 169, 172, 179, 192–3, 200–1, 202, 208, 209, 210, 216, 217, 226, 228, 231
'Das Tabu der Virginität' 180
Das Unbehagen in der Kultur 136, 148
Der Mann Moses und die monotheistische Religion 191
'Die Frage der Laienanalyse' 173
Die Traumdeutung ('Dream of Irma's Injection') 192, 209 Die Zukunft einer Illusion 136
Massenpsychologie und Ich-Analyse ('unary trait') 108, 146–7, 230
'Preface to Aichhorn's Verwahrloste Jugend' ('unmöglichen Berufen') 169
'Psychoanalytische Bemerkungen über einen autobiographisch beschriebenen Fall von Paranoia' 36, 226 Totem und Tabu 25, 34, 179, 183–4, 235n, 244n Fuchsian functions see function function, f(x) 4, 6, 12, 14, 19, 21, 23, 32, 44, 61, 63, 71, 79, 121, 159, 175, 177 Fuchsian functions 193, 231 of the not-all 12, 24, 178, 181, 182 of the One 94, 132, 137, 145 phallic (Φx) 12, 14, 20–2, 23, 24, 25–6 , 32, 33–6, 43, 55–6, 84–9, 87–8, 91, 92, 93, 100, 104, 120, 135, 158, 159, 168, 178, 179, 180, 182, 196, 239n propositional 32, 71, 85
Furth, Montgomery
'Introduction' to The Basic Laws of Arithmetic (Frege) 233n

Galilei, Galileo
Discorsi e dimostrazioni matematiche intorno a due nuove scienze 138, 229
Galilean turning point 121 gametes 19, 134–6
Geach, Peter Thomas
Begriffsschrift (Frege) 223, 234n
Logic Matters 233n gender 28, 157, genitive 43, 55, 58
Gide, André 57, 58, 59, 227
Gilson, Étienne
L'être et l'essence 242n
Goblot, Edmond
Traité de logique 235n
God 25, 40, 43, 59, 95
and existence 25, 96, 178–9
God's jouissance 59
Gödel, Kurt 30, 156, 224
'Russell's Mathematical Logic' 230
'What is Cantor's Continuum Problem?' 246n Goshgarian, G. M.
'I Know Well, but All the Same' (Mannoni) 226
Graham, Peter Freud's Self-Analysis (Anzieu) 231 grammar 13, 36, 42, 63, 70–1, 76, 78–9, 135, 162
Granoff, Wladimir
'Desire for children, children's desire: un désir d'enfant' 235n graph of desire 89, 160, 182, 231
Grigg, Russell, 244n, 245n ground 203, 211
Guaraldi, Antonella 68, 227
Gueroult, Martial
Berkeley, Quatre études sur la perception et sur Dieu 229

Guilbaud, Georges Théodule 75, 228 gullies (ravinements) 60
Guyer, Jane I.
The Gift (Mauss) 228

Hadamard, Jacques Salomon
Essay on the Psychology of Invention in the Mathematical Field 231 Halls, Wilfred Douglas
The Gift (Mauss) 228
Halmos, Paul
Naive Set Theory 124, 225
Halsted, George Bruce
The Foundations of Science (Poincaré) 231
Hamlyn, David Walter
Aristotle's De Anima 245n
Hanshe, Rainer J.
My Heart Laid Bare (Baudelaire) 230
háteros (ἄτερος) 80
Healy, John F.
Natural History, A Selection (Pliny) 229 Heath, Sir Thomas Little Aristarchus of Samos 241n
A History of Greek Mathematics 242n
A Manual of Greek Mathematics 222
The Thirteen Books of the Elements (Euclid) 221
The Works of Archimedes 221
Hegel, Georg F. W. 58, 101, Phänomenologie des Geistes 101, 102, 113, 114
henad 218n
henology 132, 242n hermaphroditism 28
Hester, Wendy A.
'I Know Very Well, but All the Same' (Mannoni) 226 heteros (ἕτερος) 80, 89
heterosexuality 80–1, 109
Hette, Walter Stanley
'On the Soul' (Aristotle) 245n
Hicks, Robert Drew
De anima (Aristotle) 245n
Hilbert, David 233n
Hintikka, Jaakko
Time and Necessity 222
Hogarth, William
The Analysis of Beauty ('line of beauty') 98, 228
Holland, Philemon
The Historie of the World (Pliny) 229
Hollingdale, R. J.
The Anti-Christ (Nietzsche) 230
hollow (Höhlung) 6, 32, 234n hommoinzun 7, 234n
hommoinzune 7, 8
Homo sapiens 7 homosexuality 109
female homosexuality 9 male homosexuality 57, 237n Houillon, Charles Sexualité 229
Hull, R. F. C.
Symbols of Transformation (Jung) 227 Hun 84, 238n hunting, predation 164–5, 180 hupokeímenon (ὑποκείμενον) 98, 149
Hurley, Robert
The Accursed Share (Bataille) 228 hygiene 199–200
hyle (ὕλη) 81
Hyppolite, Jean Phénoménologie de l'esprit (Hegel) 228 hysteria 7, 104, 198
of Socrates 84, 216

ideal ego 147
idealism 64, 97, 134, see also Berkeley identification 7, 92, 108, 147, 165, 230 identity 44, 45–6, 115, 227, 236n see also Leibniz ideology 131, 132, 135 imaginary 83, 152, 177, 219
imaginary identification 147 triad of symbolic, imaginary, and real 29
Imbert, Claude
Les Fondements de l'arithmétique (Frege) 43 immixing of subjects 192, 244n implication 86, 91–2, 154–5 impossible, impossibility 9, 12, 13–14, 30, 31, 75, 100, 119 impossible, impossibility (cont.)

of analyst's function 169, 203 of the denumerable 124, 181 opposite of contingent 36 and real 9, 30, 60–1, 75, 90, 94, 100, 122, 152, 177, 185, 197, 219 and transgression 101–2 individual (τόδε τι) 103, 108, 120–1, 136–7, 165–6 see also Aristotle, Metaphysics induction, inductiveness 66, 138, 140–1 inexistence 39–41, 44–8, 116–17 non-existence 88 infinite (numerical) 125, 129, 216, 229 actual 156
improper 125, 241n
see also sets, finite and infinite sets infinitesimal calculus 123, 223 Innenwelt see Umwelt and Innenwelt instrument (ὄργανον) 5, 9 inter-diction 19, 22
International Journal of Psycho-Analysis 172, 231 International Psycho-Analytic Association (IPA) 171, 173, 192, 228 Interpretant 208, 210
interpretation 54, 99, 134, 163, 192, 207–9, 211, 219
Isidore of Seville
The Etymologies of Isidore of Seville 236n–237n
Islam ('Mohammedan' religion) 148

Jacob, François 226
La Logique du vivant 226
Jakobson, Roman 55, 62, 65–6, 67, 71, 79, 190, 227, 238n
'Glosses on the Medieval Insight into the Science of Language' 222
Jones, William Henry Samuel Natural History Vols. VI–VIII (Pliny) 229
jouissance 34, 40, 41, 53, 56, 59, 130–1, 134, 152, 193, 205, 219 of the body 21, 32, 130, 193, 201, 209, 218 feminine (other) jouissance 88, 104 jouis-centre 183
jouissabsence 104
and knowledge 148
and the Other 96
phallic 56, 88
sexual 5, 21, 32, 34, 41–2, 56, 88, 96, 152
surplus 53, 131, 145, 151, 169, 193, 202, 203, 205, 209
Jourdain, Philip Edward Bertrand
Contributions to the Founding of the Theory of Transfinite Numbers (Cantor) 224, 241n–242n Judaism, Judaic tradition 114, 179, 190, 240n judgement 8, 147, 172, 219
Jung, Carl Gustav 30, 55, 217
Symbole der Wandlung 227 jurisprudence 204, 207, 211 justice 211

Kant, Immanuel
Critique of Practical Reason 17
Kaufmann, Walter A.
The Antichrist (Nietzsche) 230
Kenny, Anthony
The Cambridge History of Later Medieval Philosophy (with Kretzmann and Pinborg) 226 knave, knavery 6–7, 174–5, 234n
Kneale, Martha and William
The Development of Logic 223, 241n knowledge 97, 130, 131
analyst's 63, 64
as S_2 61, 62, 64, 114, 132, 204 and truth 152, 153, 154, 169, 171, 173, 175
and unconscious 64
Kojève, Alexandre 72
Essai d'une histoire raisonnée de la philosophie païenne 244n
Introduction à la lecture de Hegel 227
Kretzmann, Norman
The Cambridge History of Later Medieval Philosophy (with Kenny and Pinborg) 226
Kronecker, Leopold 43, 226

La Bruyère, Jean de 133
labour 39

Lacan, Jacques
'Allocution sur l'enseignement' 38
'La Chose freudienne' 99–100, 228
'D'une question préliminaire à tout traitement possible de la psychose' 201 Écrits 22, 149, 195
'L'étourdit' 232, 234n
'Fonction et champ de la parole et du langage' 53, 174, 227, 231
'L'instance de la lettre' 16, 190, 226
'Jeunesse de Gide' 227
'Joyce le symptôme [II]' 235n
'Kant avec Sade' 17–18
'Lituraterre' 238n
'La métaphore du sujet' 64, 227
On the Names-of-the-Father 59, 88–9, 191, 179, 191, 228
'Préface à une thèse' 227
'Propos directifs pour un Congrès' 17, 225
'Proposition du 9 octobre 1967' 230
'La psychanalyse. Raison d'un échec' 170
'Radiophonie' 227, 232, 239n
'Rome Report' 150–1
Seminar I, Freud's Papers on Technique 231
Seminar II, The Ego in Freud's Theory and in the Technique of Psychoanalysis 192, 209, 231, 244n, 246n
Seminar III, The Psychoses (lesson of 11 April 1956) 201, 203, 205, 209, 232
Seminar VII, The Ethics of Psychoanalysis 234n
Seminar VIII, Transference 109, 148, 228, 230, 231, 235n
Seminar XI, The Four Fundamental Concepts of Psychoanalysis 228
Seminar XVII, The Other Side of Psychoanalysis 52, 245n
Seminar XVIII, D'un discours qui ne serait pas du semblant 201, 234n
'La signification du phallus' 42–3, 226
'Subversion du sujet et dialectique du désir' 153, 230, 231 Television / A Challenge to the Psychoanalytic Establishment 228 lalingua (la langue) 96, 97, 219 language 11, 61, 82, 90, object language 4
and the real 11–12, 60
and unconscious 54, 78, 179
Lascaux caves 180
law 43
Law of Talion 43
Le Bon, Gustave
Psychologie des foules 146, 230
Leeuwenhoek, Antonie van 134, 229
Leibniz, Gottfried Wilhelm von
New Essays on Human Understanding 44–5, 216, 227, 236n letter 16, 20–2, 216
lettre d'amur 60, 66, 76, 129, 217, 227, 246n
Lévi-Strauss, Claude 54, 227
Lewis, Sophie
On Love (Stendhal) 230
Libera, Alain de 226
libido 91, 178
life, living being 31, 41, 42, 61, 63, 120, 121, 136, 165, 217 line of beauty see Hogarth, William, The Analysis of Beauty linguistic analysis 68–9
linguistics 54–5, 172, 185, 217
Littré dictionary 110
Loewenstein, Rudolph 231 logic 4, 5, 6, 7, 11–13, 14, 16, 23, 27–9, 36, 38, 40, 61, 87, 90, 103, 110, 120–1, 135, 162, 181, 194, 207, 208, 222–3, 235n
and discourse 29–30, 38, 41, 42, 61, 194
impasses of 29
logical necessity 38, 41, 42, 43–4, 48, 92
and mathematics 24, 60, 67, 71, 85–6, 93, 154, 195 modal 13, 35–6 and myth 190
a 'new' logic 11
predicate logic 23–4, propositional logic 26, 32, 86
see also proposition of sets 93, 195, 207

logic (cont.)
and truth 13, 154–5, 162
and the unconscious 27, 30, 36, 38 love 9, 31, 41, 69, 104, 109, 133–4, 135, 152–3, 230 ancient sayings of 217
universal 139
see also letter, lettre d'amur
Lwoff, André Michel 226

MacCurdy, Edward
The Notebooks of Leonardo da Vinci 227
Malink, Marko
Aristotle's Modal Syllogistic 233n
Malovany-Chevalier, Sheila
The Second Sex (Beauvoir; with Borde) 228 man 5, 8, 19, 22–4, 28, 32, 34–5, 44, 56, 83, 87, 88, 93, 101–2, 120, 157, 163–5, 167–8, 176, 178–80, 185, 198, 199, 216, 217, 244n man one and all (tout homme) 179, 216
Mannoni, Octave
'Je sais bien, mais quand même' 40, 226
Marchand, Valérie 75 marriage 10
Marx, Karl 39, 101, 200, 232 master discourse see discourse, of the master master-signifier (S_1) 61, 62, 98, 114, 120, 131, 145, 204
masturbation 5–6
mathematics 13, 16, 19, 21, 22, 61, 79, 90, 118–19, 123, 138, 161, 176, 177, 196, 222–5
and logic 24, 60, 67, 71, 85–6, 93, 154, 195 mathematical real 158, 160–1, 163 matheme 17, 126, 131, 175
Matte Blanco, Ignacio 171–2, 231
The Unconscious as Infinite Sets 231
Mauss, Marcel Essai sur le don 227–8 meaning (Sinn, sens) 18, 33, 42–3, 57, 59, 62, 63, 64, 71, 75–6, 135, 149, 160–1, 163, 166, 168, 200, 218, 219 and body 203
and discourse 29, 38, 54, 64, 98, 101, 132, 160
and existence 178
and truth 161, 163
medical tradition 172–3 Medusa's head 210 message 41, 70–1
Meinwald, Constance C.
Plato's Parmenides 240n meiosis 136
Meldrum, John
Elements of the History of Mathematics (Bourbaki) 225
Mencken, Henry Louis
The Antichrist (Nietzsche) 230
Menninger, Karl W.
Zahlwort und Ziffer 227
metalanguage 4, 30, 45, 182, metaphor 7
metaphysics 18, 111, 137
metechein (μετέχειν) 114
Metrios, Georges Antoniadès
Cantor a tort 176, 181–2, 225n
Michaux, Henri
Entre centre et absence 104 Michelangelo
'Slave' sculptures 198
Michelet, Jules 18
Michelet, Karl Ludwig
Examen critique du livre d'Aristote intitulé Métaphysique 18, 222 midsay see saying, fact of Mill, John Stuart
A System of Logic, Ratiocinative and Inductive 115, 229
Miller, Arnold V.
Phenomenology of Spirit (Hegel) 228
Miller, Jacques-Alain
'Algorithmes de la psychanalyse' 227
'On nous écrit de Janina' 237n modality see logic, modal 'Mohammedan' religion see Islam Molière
Le médecin malgré lui 234n
monad 27, 46–7, 52, 126–7, 141, 143, 216, 218n, 219
Monod, Jacques 226
Mouvement de libération des femmes (MLF) 148, 243 myth, mythology 25, 34, 54, 88, 91, 135–6, 159, 163, 179–80, 189–90, 217 historical myth 114 mytheme 54

nachträglichkeit 98, 149, 154, 228 nad 127, 141, 142, 218, 218n see also sets, empty set Name-of-the-Father 59, 92, 191 see also father narcissism 147 natural numbers see number, integers natural selection 63, 166–7, Nature, naturalness 7–8, 59, 134, 216 natural existence 121–2 necessary, necessity 13, 29, 37–42, 82, 129, 142, 146, 161, 179, 181–2, 183–4, 185–6, 202, 205, 235n logical necessity 38, 41, 42, 43–4, 48, 92
of at-least-one 35, 91, 184 negation 13–14, 24, 32, 36, 86–7, 91, 96, 100, 101, 102, 120, 155, 179, 182, 183, 189, 196, 234n nervous system 165, 218
Netz, Reviel
The Archimedes Palimpsest (with Wilson) 221–2
The Works of Archimedes 222
neurosis 130, 151, 209, 210
Nichols Jr, James H.
Introduction to the Reading of Hegel (Kojève) 227
Nietzsche, Friedrich 148
Der Antichrist 230
nominalism 134
norm, normality 28, 57–8, 83, 131, 171 not all (μή πᾶν, pas tout; μὴ πάντες, pas tous; pas toute; pas toutes) 5–6, 7, 11, 12, 23, 24, 25, 33–6, 39, 44, 86, 87, 88, 89, 92, 94, 104, 135, 146, 148, 149, 178, 181, 182, 185, 190 nothingness 40, 45–6 nought, zero 40, 45–6, 48, 61, 88, 89, 90–1, 108, 114–5, 138, 141, 150, 155, 215, 218
'desire = 0' 209–10 nous (νοῦς) 28, 81, 134 see also cognizance number 13, 40–1, 90
cardinal, cardinality 125–6, 137–9, 140, 141, 142–3, 155, 242n complex 177, 231
and concept 44–7, 236n figurate (dyadic, triangular, tetrahedral, pentatope) 236n imaginary 177, 231
integers (whole numbers) 40, 43, 44, 46–8, 66–7, 114, 117, 124, 129, 137–8, 140–2, 156–7, 162, 177, 181, 215–16, 218n, 246n irrational 123 predecessor 45–6 as real 13, 25, 32, 163, 181, 182, 205
real 25, 152, 162
successor 46–7, 138, 150, 156–7

O'Brien, Denis
'Einai copulatif et existentiel dans le Parménide de Platon' 239n, 240n object a 58–9, 71, 75, 76, 148, 157, 160, 171, 183, 185, 200, 206, 209, 210–11, 218, 234n, 237n, 245n guises of 76, 129
and semblance 160, 175, 194
Oedipus myth 35, 88, 184, 235n, 238n, 244n
Olbrechts-Tyteca, Lucie
La nouvelle rhétorique (with Perelman) 64, 227
Olympic rings 76
One, Oneness (ἓν) 60, 106, 108–17, 118–26, 131, 132
and Being 20, 116, 119, 162, 180, 198
and cognizance 28 at-least-one 7, 25, 34–5, 88, 91, 92, 93, 104, 120, 121, 178, 179, 184, 234n
number 1 44, 46, 88, 90–1, 124
One all alone (Un tout seul) 162, 179, 218, 219, 244n
One Being (Un Être) 180
One-fact-of-saying (l'Un-dire) 219
One of difference 167–8
One-to-boot (Un-en-plus) 156

One, Oneness (ἕν) (cont.)
and the real 121, 124, 218
see also master-signifier; Yad'lun one-to-one correspondence (correspondance biunivoque) 82, 126, 137, 138, 157, 166 ontology 100, 132, 163, 198–9, 239n organ 5–6, 8–9, 42, 63, 84, 134 organic reality 41–2, 120 organon (ὄργανον) see instrument orography 217
Other (A) 59, 83–4, 89, 91, 92, 96, 98, 101, 103–4, 107, 198
and God 95–6,
Hautre 84
overdetermination (Überdeterminierung) 200–1

Paris, Jean
'L'agonie du signe' 190, 231
Parmenides 112, 241n
see also Plato, Parmenides
Parshley, Howard Madison
The Second Sex (Beauvoir) 228 part (of a set) see sets, subsets partition (maths) 140–1, 142, 155–6, 243n partouze 83
Pascal, Blaise
Traité sur le triangle arithmétique 126–7, 141, 222, 236n Pascal's triangle see arithmetical triangle Pass 170–1 paternal metaphor 89
Peano, Giuseppe
Formulaire de mathématiques 233n
Peirce, Charles Sanders 175, 195, 203, 206, 207–9, 211, 223–4, 232 pentahedroid (5-cell, C_5) 144, 242n
Perelman, Chaïm
La nouvelle rhétorique (with Olbrechts-Tyteca) 64, 227 phallus (Φ) 35, 43, 55–6, 63, 99, 219
as Bedeutung 56 signification of 42–3, 55–6 as signified 9, 10
see also function, phallic; jouissance, phallic philosophy 22, 58, 84, 92, 99, 120, 132–3, 134, 158, 203
Picasso, Pablo 149
Pichon, Édouard
Des mots à la pensée, Essai de la grammaire de la langue française (with Damourette) 14, 110, 225, 234n
Pinborg, Jan
The Cambridge History of Later Medieval Philosophy (with Kenny and Kretzmann) 226 Place du Panthéon (Law Faculty, Paris I–II) 51, 55, 131, 137, 144, 174, 175, 186, 215
Plato 33, 108, 119, 221
Cratylus 69, 221
Menon 57–8, 221
Parmenides 17, 30, 94, 96, 101, 102, 107, 109, 110–13, 116–17, 119, 162–3, 175, 198, 215, 217, 221, 239n, 240n, 241n, 242n
Symposium 109, 148, 158–9, 221
Theaetetus 123, 177, 221 Theory of Forms 96, 120, 137, 144, 202–3 see also eidos
Pliny the Elder Naturalis Historia 122, 229
Plotinus 216 poetry 71
Poincaré, Henri
'L'expérience et la géometrie' 74, 224
'L'Invention mathématique' 193, 231
Polansky, Ronald Aristotle's De Anima 245n pollution 25, 193–4, 244n possible, possibility 13, 34–6 opposite of necessary 35 and the universal 24, 33, 180, 185–6 potlatch 75, 126, 227
Poulton, Sir Edward Bagnall Essays upon Heredity and Kindred Biological Problems (Weismann; with Schönland and Shipley) 226 powerlessness (impuissance) 13, 219 Précieuses 9, 225
predation see hunting proposition 4, 24, 26, 32, 42, 71, 85, 87, 183 particular affirmative 12, 32, 90, 116, 183, 203, 232 particular negative 32, 34, 183, 203, 232 universal affirmative 32, 83, 87, 183, 203, 232 universal negative 32, 183, 203, 232 see also function, propositional prosdiorismoi (προσδιορισμοί) 5, 12, 32–3, 43–4 see also quantifiers psychoanalysis 6, 7, 10, 11, 19, 27, 28, 38, 57, 64, 83, 91, 99, 100, 108, 130, 131, 133, 134, 153, 169, 172, 173, 178, 179, 189, 191, 204, 206, 207, 209, 211, 215, 217, 219

didactic 154, 170–1, 175
French 174
see also discourse, of the analyst Pulskamp, Richard J.
'The Arithmetic Triangle' (Pascal) 222
Pythagorean theorem 123
Pythagoreans 177, 222

quadripode see discourse, tetradic structure quantifiers 5, 24, 26, 33, 90, 183 existential quantifier ($\exists x$) 24, 26, 33, 35, 89, 92, 100, 121, 135, 178, 179, 183, 184, 196 universal quantifier ($\forall x$) 12, 22, 24, 33, 35, 178, 183 see also proposition; prosdiorismoi Queneau, Raymond
Introduction à la lecture de Hegel (Kojève) 227 racism 211

Rackham, Harris
Natural History Vols. I–V, IX (Pliny) 229
Rand, D.
Mathematical Models of Morphogenesis (Thom; with Brookes) 225
real 6, 7, 8, 9, 14, 19, 28, 101, 103, 112, 113, 120, 122–2, 134, 137, 194, 205, 216, 217 as impossible 9, 30, 35, 60–1, 75, 90, 94, 100, 122, 152, 177, 185, 197, 219 and language 11–12, 61, 90 mathematical 13, 29, 84, 158, 160–1, 163, 177, 215 and number 13, 25, 32, 181, 182, 205
and the One 121, 124, 218
triad of symbolic, imaginary, and real 29
and truth 13, 176
Recanati, François 195, 197–8 reference (Bedeutung) 5, 33, 42, 56, see also denotation Regnault, François
'Dialectique d'épistemologies' 240n, 241n
Rendall, Steven Astrea Part I (d'Urfé) 230 repetition 32, 40–1, 47–8, 82, 99, 131, 142, 144–5, 146–7, 218, 219 Representamen 207–9 repression (Verdrängung, refoulement) 19, 172 return of the repressed 16
Richter, Jean Paul
The Notebooks of Leonardo Da Vinci 227
Rickless, Samuel C.
Plato's Forms in Transition 239n, 240n, 241n
Riley, Henry Thomas Natural History (Pliny; with Bostock) 229
Robert dictionary 110
Ruden, Sarah
The Golden Ass (Apuleius) 222
Russell, Bertrand 161, 177, 224, 230
An Inquiry into Meaning and Truth 224
'Mathematical Logic as Based on the Theory of Types' 233n Principia Mathematica (with Whitehead) 224
The Principles of Mathematics 224
'Recent Work on the Principles of Mathematics' / 'Mathematics and the Metaphysicians' 161, 230
Ryan, William Granger
The Golden Legend (Jacobus da Varagine) 231

Sade, Marquis de 20
Sainte-Anne hospital 17, 51, 66, 88–9, 125, 149, 165, 171, 173, 189, 215, 227, 237n, 239n
Sale, Gilbert and Suzanne Love (Stendhal) 230
Salvio, Alfonso de Dialogues Concerning Two New Sciences (Galileo; with Crew) 229 sameness 125
Saussure, Ferdinand de 62
Savitsky, Anna
'Pascal on the Arithmetic Triangle' 222 savoir-faire 152, 211 saying, fact of (le dire) 4, 14, 32, 35, 55, 99–100, 113, 158, 162, 168, 178, 202, 205, 206, 208, 209, 210–11, 215, 216
and existence 14, 35
midsay (midire) 5, 64, 152, 162, 171, 202
One-fact-of-saying (l'Un-dire) 219
Schönland, Selmar
Essays upon Heredity and Kindred Biological Problems (Weismann; with Poulton and Shipley) 226
Schreber, Daniel Paul 184, 201, 226 science, scientific discourse 19, 31, 61–2, 84, 121–2, 173, 182, 194, 211, 216, 217 scientific research 68
Scilicet 170, 195, 201
Scolnicov, Samuel Plato's Parmenides 239n, 240n, 241n segregation 216
semantics 13, 79, 185 semblance 7, 41, 53, 56, 58, 82, 84, 132, 133, 151, 153–4, 159, 160, 169, 175, 193, 194–5, 202, 203, 205, 206–7, 209, 216, 217, 218 seriousness 55, 66, 68–9, 83, 192 Serrus, Charles
Traité de logique 235n
set theory (Mengenlehre) 119, 122–7, 129, 136, 137–8, 140, 144, 145, 149, 157, 161, 166, 167, 175, 176, 177, 178, 195, 207 sets (Mengen, aggregates) 46–7, 93, 115–16, 124–7, 136, 137–44, 155–6, 168, 181–2, 219, 240n, 242n empty set (∅) 93, 116, 124, 126, 127, 137, 138–9, 141–2, 143, 144, 182, 215 finite and infinite sets 129, 138, 140–1, 176 singleton (unit set) 124 subsets (parts) 46–7, 115–16, 127, 138, 140, 143–4, 155–6, 168, 236n, 240n, 242n, 243n sex 31, 55 sex ratio 6, 166
sexual bipolarity 31
sexual intercourse, relations, encounters 17, 83, 159 sexual relation (rapport) and non-relation 4, 5–6, 10, 11, 12, 14, 17, 19, 20, 21, 33, 56, 80, 81–5, 87, 88, 89, 90, 96, 99, 103, 104, 108–9, 119, 133–5, 152, 153, 159–60, 162, 164, 166–7, 168, 178, 180, 181, 192, 217, 218, 219 sexual reproduction 31
sexuation 21, 24, 210, 232 Shields, Christopher
De anima (Aristotle) 245n
'Soul as Subject in Aristotle's De anima' 245n–246n
Shipley, Sir Arthur Everett Essays upon Heredity and Kindred Biological Problems (Weismann; with Poulton and Schönland) 226 signifiance 19, 38, 79
signification 71, 132, 190, 201, 205 effect of signification 190–1, 219
signifier 4, 9, 19, 21–2, 24–6, 67, 69, 128, 129–30, 135, 141, 152, 154, 181, 190, 193, 200, 202, 206, 219 additional signifier (supplément de signifiant) 134 and denotation 33 of inexistence 46 and the letter 16, 145
'man' and 'woman' 21, 23 and One 91, 120, 136, 157, 185, 218 and signification 201 and signified 62
two horizons 128, 132

signifier of the barred Other, S(Ⱥ) 89, 96, 182, 198, 218
Simpson, Louis
The Breasts of Tiresias (Apollinaire) 225 Sinaceur, Mohammed Allal 223 singleton see sets Slater, Maya
The Mammaries of Tiresias (Apollinaire) 225 slip (of the tongue) 68, 218 small difference 5–8
Smith, Andrea
Science and Hypothesis (Poincaré; with Frappier and Stump) 224
Smith, Robin
'Preface' to Prior Analytics (Aristotle) 233n Smullyan, Raymond M.
Forever Undecided 224
Gödel's Incompleteness Theorems 224
The Lady, or the Tiger? 224 social bond 30, 52, 62, 131, 132, 160, 205 see also discourse, and social bond Socrates 84, 148, 216, 228, 241n some (τί) 5, 12, 13, 32, 33, 34, 90, 116, 120 see also proposition, particular affirmative Sophism 29–30 soul 82, 148, 211, 218, 245n speaking being 7, 14, 21, 32, 38, 58, 80, 81–2, 89, 113, 152, 154, 217 speech (parole) 45, 53, 54, 55–6, 60, 61, 63, 70, 80, 89, 97, 119, 124, 163, 182, 205, 217 spermatozoa 19, 135
Spillman, Betty E.
Logic of Life (Jacob) 226 split (Spaltung) 194, 206, 210, 211 square root square root of 2 ($\sqrt{2}$) 177 square root of minus 1 ($\sqrt{-1}$) 177
Stendhal 152
De l'amour 230
Stoics 22, 59, 62, 154
Strachey, James 243n strike action 159
Striker, Gisela
Aristotle's Prior Analytics 233n
Stump, David J.
Science and Hypothesis (Poincaré; with Frappier and Smith) 224 subject supposed to know 149, 151, 172 supposed subject of knowledge 218n
see also hupokeímenon substance 4, 40, 71, 112, 144, 194
substantive 71, 238n Sufis 148
Sullivan, Mark W.
Apuleian Logic 222 supposition 39, 40, 44, 54, 67, 94, 130, 149, 151, 157, 181, 218, 219 suppositiones 67
see also hupokeímenon
surplus jouissance see jouissance surplus value 101
surrealism 9, 152–3, 230 Swammerdam, Jan 134, 229
syllogistic 24, 85
see also Aristotle, Prior Analytics the symbolic 34, 45, 89, 90, 103, 122, 147, 148, 152, 216, 217
triad of symbolic, imaginary, and real 29
symbolization 125, 218n, 219 symptom 39–40
Sweeney, Leo S. J.
'Basic Principles in Plotinus' Philosophy' 242n tantra 148

Telemachus 177, 231
tetrad 27, 47, 73, 75, 76, 139, 143–4, 236n double tetrad 74
tetrahedron 47, 52–3, 140, 143, 236n Thanatos 108, 136 theology 23, 206 theory 6 analytic theory 144
see also set theory
Theory of Forms see Plato, Theory of Forms Theresa see Tiresias Thiers, Adolphe 164
Thom, René 61, 63, 79, 165, 225n
Tiresias 9, 88

Tomaselli, Sylvana 244n, 246n
topology 22, 52–3, 61–2, 79, 80, 85, 200
Toulet, Paul-Jean Contrerimes 177, 231
transference 109, 148, 149, 172, 192, 210
transfinite 123, 140–1, 246n see also Aleph transgression 102, 103 transsexualism 9
triad 27, 47, 127, 236n
Tricot, Jules
  Traité de logique formelle 235n trigonometric series 123, 137 truth 4–5, 6, 29–30, 34, 40, 53, 55, 56, 58, 64, 86, 87, 99–100, 102, 147, 152, 162, 168, 169, 171, 175–6, 193, 202, 203, 204, 205, 210, 216, 228
  and knowledge 152, 153, 154, 169, 171, 173, 175
  and logic 13, 154–5, 162
  and meaning 161, 163
  and the Other 182
  and the real 13, 176
  and the symptom 39–40 truth value 30, 32–3, 154, 175
  and the unconscious 7
twain, two 61, 80, 89, 109, 135, 136, 162, 216, 218 deux/d'eux 136, 158–9, 162, 184, 185, 243n dual, duo 134
  'nought and one makes two' 61, 89, 115, 155–6 number 2 115, 155–6, 219
type 6

Uexküll, Jakob von 218
Ulysses 10
Umwelt and Innenwelt 218 unary trait (einziger Zug) 108, 146–7, 230 unconscious 5, 7, 8, 22, 27, 39, 172, 184, 192, 210, 216, 218, 219 and castration 22, 179 formations of 160
  and knowledge 64, 217
  and language 54, 78, 179
  and logic 27, 30, 36, 38
  and truth 7
Unian (Unien) 108, 110, 117, 162, 189
unicorn 121, 122 to unigate (unier) 189–90, 191, 211
universal 6, 30, 33, 82, 83, 88, 89–90, 91–4, 104, 144, 167, 180, 181, 185, 203, 211 see also all; quantifiers, universal quantifier university discourse see discourse Urfé, Honoré d' L'Astrée 153, 230

value 8
  judgement of 147
  sexual 27–8, 32, 35–6
  truth 30, 32–3, 154, 175
van Gulik, Robert Hans Sexual Life in Ancient China 56, 227
van Stigt, Walter P.
  Brouwer's Intuitionism 224
Varagine, Jacobus da Legenda aurea 181, 231 variable 34, 86, 233n apparent 4, 22, 233n Vatican 174
verb 4, 69–71, 75–6, 79
  substantif verbal 238n Verwerfung see foreclosure virgin, virgo 180–1 virility 180–1 virtue 82, 164
Voltaire
  Œdipe 245n

Wartburg, Walther von Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue française (with Bloch) 10, 110, 234n
  Französisches etymologisches Wörterbuch 225
Watson, James Dewey 226
Weaver, Purcell
  The New Rhetoric (Olbrechts-Tyteca and Perelman; with Wilkinson)
Weckerlin, Jean-Baptiste 243n
Weismann, August 31, 235n Essays upon Heredity and Kindred Biological Problems 226

Whitehead, Alfred North
Principia Mathematica (with Russell) 224
Wilkinson, John
The New Rhetoric (Olbrechts-Tyteca and Perelman; with Weaver)
Wilson, Nigel
The Archimedes Palimpsest (with Netz) 221–2
Wittgenstein, Ludwig
Tractatus Logico-Philosophicus 72, 227
Woolf, Cecil N. Sidney and Philip Sidney On Love 230 woman, womanhood 9, 12, 23, 25, 28, 34–6, 44, 56, 83, 86, 87, 88, 89, 93–4, 101, 104, 134, 146–7, 153, 157, 163–5, 176, 179, 180, 182, 183, 184, 185, 190, 216–17
worse (pire) 3–5, 233n
'. . . or worse' 67, 88, 131, 146, 159–60, 163
s' . . . oupire 215 writing 15, 119
the written (l'écrit) 15–17, 18, 99

y en a (pas) 17, 110, 115, 118, 162, 235n Yad'lun 109–10, 115, 118, 119, 121, 122, 127, 131, 135, 136, 146, 162, 165, 168, 170, 171, 175–6, 198, 239n
y a dl'Un 215
Yīn and Yáng (陰 and 陽) 81, 84, 85
Yoruba (Kwa language) 185

Zeller, Eduard Gottlob 241n zero see nought
Zeus 88, 109

ON FEMININE SEXUALITY,

THE LIMITS OF LOVE AND KNOWLEDGE, 1972–1973

ENCORE

THE SEMINAR OF JACQUES LACAN

Book XX

Edited by

Jacques-Alain Miller

Translated with Notes by

Bruce Fink

THE SEMINAR OF JACQUES LACAN

Edited by Jacques-Alain Miller

On Feminine Sexuality
The Limits of Love and Knowledge

BOOK XX

Encore 1972–1973

TRANSLATED WITH NOTES BY

Bruce Fink

W · W · NORTON & COMPANY

NEW YORK LONDON

Copyright © 1975 by Editions du Seuil
English translation copyright © 1998 by W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
First published as a Norton paperback 1999

Originally published in French as LE SEMINAIRE, LIVRE XX, ENCORE, 1972–1973 by Editions du Seuil, Paris, 1975

Norton gratefully acknowledges financial assistance provided by the French Ministry of Culture for the translation of this book.

All rights reserved
Printed in the United States of America

For information about permission to reproduce selections from this book, write to Permissions, W. W. Norton & Company, Inc., 500 Fifth Avenue, New York, NY 10110

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data

Lacan, Jacques, 1901–
[Encore 1972–1972. English]
On feminine sexuality : the limits of love and knowledge / Jacques Lacan ; translated with notes by Bruce Fink.
p. cm. — (The Seminar of Jacques Lacan ; bk. 20) Includes bibliographical references and index.
ISBN 0-393-04573-0
1. Sex (Psychology) 2. Psychoanalysis. 3. Lacan, Jacques, 1901– Jacques Lacan. English ; bk. 20.
BF175.5.S48L3313 1998
150.19'5—dc21 9743225
CIP

ISBN 0-393-31916-4 pbk.

W. W. Norton & Company, Inc, 500 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10110
www.wwnorton.com

W. W. Norton & Company Ltd., 10 Coptic Street, London WC1A 1PU

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 0

CONTENTS

		page
	Preface by Bruce Fink	vii
I	On jouissance	1
II	To Jakobson	14
III	The function of the written	26
IV	Love and the signifier	38
V	Aristotle and Freud: the other satisfaction	51
VI	God and ~~Woman~~'s jouissance	64
VII	A love letter	78
VIII	Knowledge and truth	90
IX	On the Baroque	104
X	Rings of string	118
XI	The rat in the maze	137
	Index	147

PREFACE

This translation is long overdue. Published in French in 1975, this groundbreaking Seminar – including some of Lacan's most sophisticated work on love, desire, and jouissance – could well have appeared in English around the same time as the early Écrits: A Selection (1977) and The Four Fundamental Concepts of Psychoanalysis (Seminar XI, 1978). In its absence, Lacan, instead of presenting himself to the English-speaking world, has been believed by many to be faithfully presented to us by certain of his one-time students – such as Julia Kristeva and Luce Irigaray, though their views diverge substantially from his on many points – and by a spate of American, Australian, and British critics who have, in my view, grossly misrepresented him.

This translation, long-awaited by the public and by me – I always wanted copies to distribute to students and colleagues, though I never expected to be given the opportunity to translate it myself until the day Jacques-Alain Miller and Norton proposed it to me – is thus offered up in the hope of rekindling debate on the basis of something closer to what Lacan actually said, and quieting the kinds of banal reductions of Lacan's views to pat phrases derived from commentaries on commentaries on commentaries that currently pass for serious academic discourse.

I have not deliberately tried to vindicate my own previously published interpretation of Lacan's view of sexual difference in this translation, attempting instead to remain open to being surprised by his formulations (and, indeed, I was surprised!). Nevertheless, Lacan's French is – as anyone who has made a serious attempt to grapple with it is aware – so polyvalent and ambiguous that some frame must be imposed to make any sense of it whatsoever. As is true in the case of an analyst listening to the discourse proffered by an analysand, there is no escaping a theoretical frame of sorts – for without some frame one hears nothing or simply falls back on the ready-made frame provided by pop psychology – and the challenge to the analyst and translator alike is to keep the frame flexible enough to hear what is new, and to keep oneself flexible enough to adjust part or all of the frame accordingly.

The frame I rely on here is, as I hope will be apparent to the reader, the larger context of Lacan's work, including the complete Écrits (the 925 pages of which I am currently translating and retranslating for Norton), virtually all of Lacan's seminars, and other of Lacan's writings and lectures as well. I have striven to make sense of what Lacan says here in the context of what he said before and afterward. His work obviously fits into a historical, philosophical, literary, and psychiatric context as well, all the elements of which no one person could ever hope to master. Russell Grigg (the translator of Seminar III, The Psychoses, who is currently translating Seminar XVII) and Héloïse Fink were very helpful in providing such references. Readers of this translation are encouraged to write to me care of the publisher regarding specialized vocabulary and specific works and authors alluded to that I may have overlooked. Adequate translation of Lacan's work is a long-term project to which many people in many fields should contribute.

A word here about my translation "strategy": I have sought to keep the translation itself as "clean" and flowing as possible, and this has led me to relegate some complex phraseology and discussion of alternative readings to the footnotes. It seems to me that the impact of certain passages is easily defused by the inclusion of too many slashes, parenthetical remarks, and unusual typography (of which Lacan himself provides enough). I have endeavored throughout to make the English translation have as powerful an effect on the English reader as the French does on the French, and this can only be obtained by occasionally nailing down meanings more tightly than might be hoped for the purposes of extensive commentary. On such occasions I have dropped footnotes detailing what may well have been lopped off.

I am grateful to Russell Grigg who, in his thorough reading of Chapter I of this translation, reminded me once again of just how many alternative readings are possible. Héloïse Fink provided invaluable assistance by checking the entire French and English texts line by line and spending countless hours patiently pouring over Lacan's quirky grammar and endless ambiguities with me. I alone am responsible for the inaccuracies that inevitably remain.

Certain readers may need to be reminded that this was not a text at all originally, but rather a series of largely improvised talks given from notes. The French editor of the Seminar, Jacques-Alain Miller, had to work from a stenographer's faulty transcription of those talks, and was obliged to invent spellings for certain of Lacan's neologisms and condensations and new ways of punctuating for Lacan's idiosyncratic speech. All of the paragraph breaks here follow the French text, and much of the punctuation here is modeled on that adopted by Miller and approved of by Lacan.

Few texts in the Lacanian opus are as difficult to render into English as this one, given Lacan's myriad word plays and his ever more polyvalent, evocative style. I can only hope – as I have said elsewhere – that my translation here "compensates" the reader for the inevitable loss in plurivocity with another satisfaction.

Bruce Fink

I

On jouissance

It so happened that I did not publish The Ethics of Psychoanalysis.[1] At the time, it was a form of politeness on my part – after you, be my guest, be my worst. . . .[2] With the passage of time, I learned that I could say a little more about it. And then I realized that what constituted my course was a sort of "I don't want to know anything about it."

That is no doubt why, with the passage of time, I am still (encore) here, and you are too. I never cease to be amazed by it. . . .[3]

What has worked in my favor for a while is that there is also on your part, in the great mass of you who are here, an "I don't want to know anything about it." But – the all important question – is it the same one?

Is your "I don't want to know anything about it" regarding a certain knowledge that is transmitted to you bit by bit what is at work in me? I don't think so, and it is precisely because you suppose that I begin from a different place than you in this "I don't want to know anything about it" that you find yourselves attached (liés) to me. Such that, while it is true that with respect to you I can only be here in the position of an analysand due to my "I don't want to know anything about it," it'll be quite some time before you reach the same point.

That is why it is only when yours seems adequate to you that you can, if you are one of my analysands, normally detach yourself from your analysis. The conclusion I draw from this is that, contrary to what people have been saying, there is no contradiction between my position as an analyst and what I do here.

[1] Lacan's 1959–1960 seminar, entitled L'éthique de la psychanalyse, has since been edited by Jacques-Alain Miller, published in French (Paris: Seuil, 1986), and translated into English by Dennis Porter as The Ethics of Psychoanalysis (New York: Norton, 1992). (N.B.: All the footnotes provided in this translation of Seminar XX are the translator's notes.)

[2] Lacan is playing here on several terms and registers at once: in je vous en prie, je vous en pire, prie ("beg," as in "I beg of you") and pire ("worse") are anagrams; en pire is pronounced in the same way as empire (to worsen or deteriorate); and Lacan's seminar the year before this one (Seminar XIX, 1971–1972, unpublished) was entitled . . . ou pire (. . . or Worse).

[3] Lacan manages to work the term encore into this sentence as well. Less idiomatically put, it could be translated: "I am still (encore) always astonished by it. . . ."

1

Last year I entitled what I thought I could say to you, . . . ou pire (. . . or Worse), and then, Ça s'oupire.[4] That has nothing to do with "I" or "you" – je ne t'oupire pas, ni tu ne m'oupires. Our path, that of analytic discourse, progresses only due to this narrow limit, this cutting edge of the knife, which is such that elsewhere it can only get worse (s'oupirer).

That is the discourse that underpins (supporte)[5] my work, and to begin it anew this year, I am first of all going to assume that you are in bed, a bed employed to its fullest, there being two of you in it.

To someone, a jurist, who had been kind enough to inquire about my discourse, I felt I could respond – in order to give him a sense of its foundation, namely, that language[6] is not the speaking being – that I did not feel out of place having to speak in a law school, since it is the school in which the existence of codes makes it clear that language consists therein and is separate, having been constituted over the ages, whereas speaking beings, known as men, are something else altogether. Thus, to begin by assuming that you are in bed requires that I apologize to him.

I won't leave this bed today, and I will remind the jurist that law basically talks about what I am going to talk to you about – jouissance.

Law does not ignore the bed. Take, for example, the fine common law on which the practice of concubinage, which means to sleep together, is based. What I am going to do is begin with what remains veiled in law,

[4] Soupirer means "to sigh," but the apostrophe Lacan adds creates a neologism here, a reflexive: "or-sighs itself," "or-is-sighed," "or-worsens itself." Lacan tells us in the next sentence that this invented verb does not work with "I" or "you," at least in part because the s of soupirer disappears when conjugated as Lacan conjugates it and the reflexivity drops out: "I do not or-worsen you nor do you or-worsen me."

[5] The verb Lacan uses here, supporter, recurs constantly in this seminar (and elsewhere in his work as well) and requires a word of explanation. In ordinary French, it most commonly means to bear, stand, or put up with, and is primarily used negatively (e.g., Je ne le supporte pas, "I can't stand him"). Even in the present context in the text, this possible sense cannot be entirely ruled out: while psychoanalytic discourse is "behind" Lacan, supporting, backing, bolstering, underpinning, sustaining, carrying, or corroborating what he says, it could also be understood as "putting up with" Lacan. While supporter has often been translated as "to prop up" or "propping," I have generally preferred to employ locutions using the verb "to base" and the noun "basis."

[6] Throughout this seminar, I always translate langage as language; when I translate langue as language, I always include the French in brackets.

namely, what we do in that bed – squeeze each other tight (s'étreindre). I begin with the limit, a limit with which one must indeed begin if one is to be serious, in other words, to establish the series of that which approaches it.

A word here to shed light on the relationship between law (droit) and jouissance. "Usufruct" – that's a legal notion, isn't it? – brings together in one word what I already mentioned in my seminar on ethics, namely, the difference between utility[7] and jouissance. What purpose does utility serve? That has never been well defined owing to the prodigious respect speaking beings have, due to language, for means. "Usufruct" means that you can enjoy (jouir de)[8] your means, but must not waste them. When you have the usufruct of an inheritance, you can enjoy the inheritance (en jouir) as long as you don't use up too much of it. That is clearly the essence of law – to divide up, distribute, or reattribute everything that counts as jouissance.

What is jouissance? Here it amounts to no more than a negative instance (instance).[9] Jouissance is what serves no purpose (ne sert à rien).

I am pointing here to the reservation implied by the field of the right-to-jouissance. Right (droit) is not duty. Nothing forces anyone to enjoy (jouir) except the superego. The superego is the imperative of jouissance – Enjoy!

Here we see the turning point investigated by analytic discourse. Along this pathway, during the "after you" period of time I let go by, I tried to show that analysis does not allow us to remain at the level of what I began with, respectfully of course – namely, Aristotle's ethics. A kind of slippage occurred in the course of time that did not constitute progress but rather a skirting of the problem, slipping from Aristotle's view of being to Bentham's utilitarianism, in other words, to the theory of fictions,[10] demonstrating the use value – that is, the instrumental status – of language. It is from that standpoint that I return to question the status of being,[11] from the sovereign 11 good as an object of contemplation, on the basis of which people formerly believed they could edify an ethics.

Thus, I am leaving you to your own devices on this bed. I am going out,

[7] Lacan's term here, l'utile, literally means "the useful."

[8] It should be kept in mind that jouir de means to enjoy, take advantage of, benefit from, get off on, and so on. Jouir also means "to come" in the sexual sense: "to reach orgasm."

[9] Lacan's instance, like Freud's Instanz, is often translated as "agency." However, instance also implies a power or authority (as when we speak of a Court of the First Instance), and an insistent, urgent force, activity, or intervention; it also conveys a note of instantaneousness. "Agency" in no way conveys the insistence so important to Lacan's use of the term.

[10] See Bentham's Theory of Fictions (Paterson: Littlefield, Adams & Co., 1959); Lacan discusses Bentham in Seminar VII on pages 12, 187, and 228–229.

[11] The French here, ce qu'il en est de l'être, is very imprecise, and could be translated as the nature of being, the status of being, or how being stands. Lacan repeatedly uses the locution ce qu'il en est de in this seminar in talking about being.

and once again I will write on the door so that, as you exit, you may perhaps recall the dreams you will have pursued on this bed. I will write the following sentence: "Jouissance of the Other," of the Other with a capital O, "of the body of the Other who symbolizes the Other, is not the sign of love."[12]

2

I write that, but I don't write after it "the end," "amen," or "so be it."

Love, of course, constitutes a sign (fait signe)[13] and is always mutual.

I put forward that idea a long time ago, very gently, by saying that feelings are always mutual. I did so in order to be asked, "Then what, then what, of love, of love – is it always mutual?" "But of course, but of course!" That is why the unconscious was invented – so that we would realize that man's desire is the Other's desire, and that love, while it is a passion that involves ignorance of desire,[14] nevertheless leaves desire its whole import. When we look a bit more closely, we see the ravages wreaked by this.

Jouissance – jouissance of the Other's body – remains a question, because the answer it may constitute is not necessary. We can take this further still: it is not a sufficient answer either, because love demands love. It never stops (ne cesse pas) demanding it. It demands it . . . encore. "Encore" is the proper name of the gap (faille) in the Other from which the demand for love stems.

Where then does what is able, in a way that is neither necessary nor sufficient, to answer with jouissance of the Other's body stem from?

It's not love. It is what last year, inspired in a sense by the chapel at Sainte-Anne Hospital that got on my nerves, I let myself go so far as to call l'amur.[15]

L'amur is what appears in the form of bizarre signs on the body. They are [12] The French here is open to a number of different readings: La jouissance de l'Autre[. . .], du corps de l'Autre qui le symbolise, n'est pas le signe de l'amour. In the first part of the sentence, jouissance de l'Autre can mean either the Other's jouissance or one's jouissance/enjoyment of the Other; in the second part of the sentence, there seems, at first glance, to be a typographical error, as Lacan sometimes talks about the other (autre) who symbolizes or incarnates the Other (Autre) for someone. An alternative reading would be: "The Other's jouissance," that of the Other with a capital O, "[the jouissance] of the body of the Other who symbolizes the Other, is not the sign of love."

[13] Fait signe also means gives a sign, signals (something to someone), and plays the part of a sign.

[14] Ignorance is, according to Lacan (and others, including Plato), the strongest of the three passions: ignorance, love, and hate. On the three passions, see, for example, "Direction of the Treatment," Écrits, 627. An alternative reading of le désir de l'homme, c'est le désir de l'Autre earlier in the sentence would be "man's desire is for the Other's desire."

[15] A combination of mur ("wall") and amour ("love"). This term was introduced by Lacan on January 6, 1972. Amure (pronounced like Lacan's amur) is an old sailor's term for tack.

the sexual characteristics that come from beyond, from that place we believed we could eye under the microscope in the form of the germ cell[16] – regarding which I would point out that we can't say that it's life since it also bears death, the death of the body, by repeating it. That is where the en-corps comes from.[17] It is thus false to say that there is a separation of the soma from the germ because, since it harbors this germ, the body bears its traces. There are traces on l'amur.

But they are only traces. The body's being (l'être du corps) is of course sexed (sexué),[18] but it is secondary, as they say. And as experience shows, the body's jouissance, insofar as that body symbolizes the Other, does not 12 depend on those traces.

That can be gathered from the simplest consideration of things.

Then what is involved in love? Is love – as psychoanalysis claims with an audacity that is all the more incredible as all of its experience runs counter to that very notion, and as it demonstrates the contrary – is love about making one (faire un)? Is Eros a tension toward the One?

People have been talking about nothing but the One for a long time. "There's such a thing as One" (Y a d' l'Un).[19] I based my discourse last year on that statement, certainly not in order to contribute to this earliest of confusions, for desire merely leads us to aim at the gap (faille) where it can be demonstrated that the One is based only on (tenir de) the essence of the signifier. I investigated Frege at the beginning [of last year's seminar][20] [16] The French germen ("germ" or "germ cell," i.e., the sexual reproductive cell) is contrasted with soma, the body of an organism.

[17] En-corps is pronounced like encore, but literally means "in-body."

[18] L'être du corps could also be translated as the being of the body, being qua body, the body qua being, and so on. Sexué means having a sex, a sexual organ, or being differentiated into male and female, i.e., sexually differentiated. The English word "sexed," used here to translate sexué(e), has the current disadvantage of being associated with the expressions "over-sexed" and "under-sexed," thereby suggesting something quantitative about the sexual drives that is not intended in the French. Note the close relation between sexué and sexuation (translated in this seminar as "sexuation"). Sexué and asexué are also translated as "sexual" and "asexual," respectively, in certain contexts (e.g., sexual or asexual reproduction).

In the next sentence, "the body's jouissance" could also be translated as "jouissance of the body."

[19] Y a d' l'Un is by no means an immediately comprehensible expression, even to the French ear, but the first sense seems to be "There's such a thing as One" (or "the One") or "There's something like One" (or "the One"); in neither case is the emphasis on the "thing" or on quantity. "The One happens," we might even say. A detailed discussion of Seminar XIX would be required to justify the translation I've provided here, but at least two things should be briefly pointed out: Y a d' l'Un must be juxtaposed with Il n'y a pas de rapport sexuel, there's no such thing as a sexual relationship (see Seminar XIX, May 17, 1972); and Lacan is not saying "there's some One" (in the sense of some quantity of One) since he is talking about the One of "pure difference" (see Seminar XIX, June 1, 1972).

[20] See Seminar XIX, December 8, 1971. Lacan discusses Frege in a number of earlier seminars as well, for example, in Seminar XV, March 13, 1968.

in the attempt to demonstrate the gap (béance) there is between this One and something that is related to (tenir à) being and, behind being, to jouissance.

I can tell you a little tale, that of a parakeet that was in love with Picasso. How could one tell? From the way the parakeet nibbled the collar of his shirt and the flaps of his jacket. Indeed, the parakeet was in love with what is essential to man, namely, his attire (accoutrement). The parakeet was like Descartes, to whom men were merely clothes (habits) . . . walking about (en . . . pro-ménade). Clothes promise debauchery (ça promet la ménade), when one takes them off. But this is only a myth, a myth that converges with the bed I mentioned earlier. To enjoy a body (jouir d'un corps) when there are no more clothes leaves intact the question of what makes the One, that is, the question of identification. The parakeet identified with Picasso clothed (habillé).

The same goes for everything involving love. The habit loves the monk,[21] as they are but one thereby. In other words, what lies under the habit, what we call the body, is perhaps but the remainder (reste)[22] I call object a.

What holds the image together is a remainder. Analysis demonstrates that love, in its essence, is narcissistic, and reveals that the substance of what is supposedly object-like (objectal)[23] – what a bunch of bull – is in fact that which constitutes a remainder in desire, namely, its cause, and sustains desire through its lack of satisfaction (insatisfaction), and even its impossibility.

Love is impotent, though mutual, because it is not aware that it is but the desire to be One, which leads us to the impossibility of establishing the relationship between "them-two" (la relation d'eux).[24] The relationship between them-two what? – them-two sexes.

3

Assuredly, what appears on bodies in the enigmatic form of sexual characteristics – which are merely secondary – makes sexed beings (êtres sexués). No doubt.[25] But being is the jouissance of the body as such, that is, as 13 asexual (asexué), because what is known as sexual jouissance is marked

[21] The French expression, sometimes attributed to Rabelais, l'habit ne fait pas le moine (literally, "the habit does not make the monk," figuratively, "don't judge a book by its cover" or "appearances can be deceiving"), is adapted here by Lacan: l'habit aime le moine, "the habit loves the monk."

[22] Reste can take on many meanings in French: "a remainder" in a division problem, "a leftover," "scrap," "residue," etc.

[23] This is a term from French object relations theory.

[24] Deux, "two," and d'eux, "of or between them," are homonyms in French.

[25] Sans doute is not as strong in French as the English "no doubt," which is generally a synonym for "indubitably." Sans doute is often better understood to mean perhaps.

and dominated by the impossibility of establishing as such, anywhere in the enunciable, the sole One that interests us, the One of the relation "sexual relationship" (rapport sexuel).[26]

That is what analytic discourse demonstrates in that, to one of these beings qua sexed, to man insofar as he is endowed with the organ said to be phallic – I said, "said to be" – the corporal sex (sexe corporel)[27] or sexual organ (sexe) of woman – I said, "of woman," whereas in fact woman does not exist,[28] woman is not whole (pas toute) – woman's sexual organ is of no interest (ne lui dit rien) except via the body's jouissance.

Analytic discourse demonstrates – allow me to put it this way – that the phallus is the conscientious objection made by one of the two sexed beings to the service to be rendered to the other.

Don't talk to me about women's secondary sexual characteristics because, barring some sort of radical change, it is those of the mother that take precedence in her. Nothing distinguishes woman as a sexed being other than her sexual organ (sexe).

Analytic experience attests precisely to the fact that everything revolves around phallic jouissance, in that woman is defined by a position that I have indicated as "not whole" (pas-tout) with respect to phallic jouissance.[29]

I will go a little further. Phallic jouissance is the obstacle owing to which man does not come (n'arrive pas),[30] I would say, to enjoy woman's body, precisely because what he enjoys is the jouissance of the organ.

That is why the superego, which I qualified earlier as based on the (imperative) "Enjoy!", is a correlate of castration, the latter being the sign with which an avowal dresses itself up (se pare), the avowal that jouissance of the Other, of the body of the Other, is promoted only on the basis of [26] Rapport also means "ratio," "proportion," "formula," "relation," "connection," etc.

[27] Sexe in French can mean either "sex," in the sense of male or female, or "sexual organ."

[28] Lacan discusses this in detail in Chapters VI and VII; note here simply that, while in French, the emphasis goes on the singular feminine article, la of "la femme n'existe pas," in English, saying "the woman does not exist" is virtually nonsensical. Lacan is asserting here that Woman with a capital W, Woman as singular in essence, does not exist; Woman as an all-encompassing idea (a Platonic form) is an illusion. There is a multiplicity of women, but no essence of "Womanhood" or "Womanliness." Pas toute, and pas-tout further on, can, in certain instances, be rendered as "not all," but Lacan is not—in my view—primarily concerned here with quantity (all or some). Indeed, he prefers the French term quanteurs to quantificateurs (for both of which English has only "quantifiers") for the operators presented in Chapters VI and VII.

[29] Lacan uses a spatial metaphor here, à l'endroit de la jouissance phallique, which evokes a place. Hence one could literally translate this as "woman is defined by a position that I have indicated as 'not whole' in the place of phallic jouissance." Curiously enough, he says pas-tout here instead of pas-toute.

[30] While the ostensible meaning here is that "man does not manage to enjoy woman's body," arriver is a slang term for "to come" in the sexual sense.

infinity (de l'infinitude).[31] I will say which infinity – that, no more and no less, based on Zeno's paradox.

Achilles and the tortoise, such is the schema of coming (le schème du jouir) for one pole (côté) of sexed beings.[32] When Achilles has taken his step, gotten it on with Briseis, the latter, like the tortoise,[33] has advanced a bit, because she is "not whole," not wholly his. Some remains. And Achilles must take a second step, and so on and so forth. It is thus that, in our time, but only in our time, we have managed to define numbers – true or, better still, real numbers. Because what Zeno hadn't seen is that the tortoise does not escape the destiny that weighs upon Achilles – its step too gets shorter and shorter and it never arrives at the limit either. It is on that basis that a number, any number whatsoever, can be defined, if it is real. A number has a limit and it is to that extent that it is infinite. It is quite clear that Achilles can only pass the tortoise – he cannot catch up with it. He only catches up with it at infinity (infinitude).

14 Here then is the statement (le dit)[34] of the status of jouissance insofar as it is sexual. For one pole,[35] jouissance is marked by the hole that leaves it no other path than that of phallic jouissance. For the other pole, can something be attained that would tell us how that which up until now has only been a fault (faille)[36] or gap in jouissance could be realized?

Oddly enough, that is what can only be suggested by very strange glimpses. "Strange" is a word that can be broken down in French – étrange, être-ange[37] – and that is something that the alternative of being as dumb as the parakeet I mentioned earlier should keep us from falling into. Nevertheless, let us examine more closely what inspires in us the idea that, in the [32] As the context shows, it is the male "pole" of sexed beings that is in question here. I have preferred "pole" here to "side" in translating côté to emphasize that Lacan is referring to the two poles of sexual differentiation: male and female.

[31] The French here could also be understood as "is promoted (or promotes itself) from infinity" or "from (the vantage point of) the infinite."

[33] It should be kept in mind here that, in French, the noun tortue ("turtle" or "tortoise") is feminine. Regarding Briseis, Achilles' captive mistress, see Homer's Iliad, Book I, verse 184 and Book XIX, verses 282–300.

[34] Le dit is a very important term in this seminar, and I have resorted to several different ways of translating it in the various contexts in which it appears: "what is said," "the said," "the statement," "the spoken," and so on. It is juxtaposed with le dire, another crucial term here, that emphasizes saying, speaking, or enunciating. The French is provided in brackets, except when I translate it as "what is said."

[35] D'un côté is often translated, "On the one hand"; here, however, Lacan is referring back to the two "poles" of sexed beings.

[36] Faille does not have the moral connotation of "fault" in English, conveying instead the geological meanings of fault – a slip or shift between different land masses or tectonic plates, a point at which things have broken apart. Faille also means "lack," "gap," "defect," "break," and "flaw."

[37] Être-ange: "angel-being" or "to be an angel."

jouissance of bodies, sexual jouissance has the privilege of being specified by an impasse.

In this space of jouissance, to take something that is limited or closed constitutes a locus, and to speak of it constitutes a topology. In a text soon to be published that is at the cutting edge of my discourse last year, I believe I demonstrate the strict equivalence between topology and structure.[38] If we take that as our guide, what distinguishes anonymity from what we talk about as jouissance – namely, what is regulated by law – is a geometry. A geometry implies the heterogeneity of locus, namely that there is a locus of the Other. Regarding this locus of the Other, of one sex as Other, as absolute Other, what does the most recent development in topology allow us to posit?

I will posit here the term "compactness." Nothing is more compact than a fault, assuming that the intersection of everything that is enclosed therein is accepted as existing over an infinite number of sets, the result being that the intersection implies this infinite number. That is the very definition of compactness.

The intersection I am talking about is the same one I put forward earlier as being that which covers or poses an obstacle to the supposed sexual relationship.

Only "supposed," since I state that analytic discourse is premised solely on the statement that there is no such thing, that it is impossible to found (poser) a sexual relationship. Therein lies analytic discourse's step forward and it is thereby that it determines the real status of all the other discourses.

Named here is the point that covers the impossibility of the sexual relationship as such. Jouissance, qua sexual, is phallic – in other words, it is not related to the Other as such.

Let us follow here the complement of the hypothesis of compactness.

A formulation is given to us by the topology I qualified as the most recent that takes as its point of departure a logic constructed on the investigation of numbers and that leads to the institution of a locus, which is not that of a homogeneous space. Let us take the same limited, closed, supposedly instituted space – the equivalent of what I earlier posited as an intersection extending to infinity. If we assume it to be covered with open sets, in other words, sets that exclude their own limits – the limit is that which is defined as greater than one point and less than another, but in no case equal either to the point of departure or the point of arrival, to sketch it for you quickly – it can be shown that it is equivalent to say that the set of these open spaces always allows of a subcovering of open spaces, constituting a finity (finitude), namely, that the series of elements constitutes a finite series.

[38] Lacan is referring here to his article, "L'Étourdit," published in Scilicet 4 (1973), pp. 5–52.

You may note that I did not say that they are countable. And yet that is what the term "finite" implies. In the end, we count them one by one. But before we can count them, we must find an order in them and we cannot immediately assume that that order is findable.

What is implied, in any case, by the demonstrable finity of the open spaces that can cover the space that is limited and closed in the case of sexual jouissance? What is implied is that the said spaces can be taken one by one (un par un) – and since I am talking about the other pole, let us put this in the feminine – une par une.

That is the case in the space of sexual jouissance, which thereby proves to be compact. The sexed being of these not-whole women does not involve the body but what results from a logical exigency in speech. Indeed, logic, the coherence inscribed in the fact that language exists and that it is outside the bodies that are moved by it – in short, the Other who[39] is incarnated, so to speak, as sexed being – requires this one by one (une par une).

And that is what is strange and, indeed, fascinating, that's the word for it: this requirement of the One, as the Parmenides strangely already allowed us to predict, stems from the Other. Where there is being, infinity is required.

I will come back to the status of the Other's locus. But right now I'm going to illustrate it for you, to give you an image of it.

You know how much fun analysts have had with Don Juan, whom they have described in every possible way, including as a homosexual, which really takes the cake. But center him on what I just illustrated for you, this space of sexual jouissance covered by open sets that constitute a finity and that can, in the end, be counted. Don't you see that what is essential in the feminine myth of Don Juan is that he has them one by one (une par une)?

That is what the other sex (l'autre sexe),[40] the masculine sex, is for women. In that sense, the image of Don Juan is of capital importance.

From the moment there are names, one can make a list of women and count them. If there are mille e tre of them, it's clear that one can take them one by one – that is what is essential. That is entirely different from the One of universal fusion. If woman were not not-whole – if, in her body, she were not not-whole as sexed being – none of that would hold true.

[39] It should be kept in mind that French uses the same word, qui, for people and things (or abstract entities), whereas English requires us to use either "who" or "that."

[40] In English we would normally speak of the opposite sex, but given the importance in Lacan's work of the other and the Other, I usually prefer the less idiomatic "other sex" for men and "Other sex" for women.

4

16

The facts I am talking to you about are facts of discourse from which we solicit an exit in analysis – in the name of what? Of letting go of the other discourses.

Through analytic discourse, the subject manifests himself in his gap, namely, in that which causes his desire. Were that not the case, I could not summarize it with a topology that does not involve the same mainspring, the same discourse, but rather a different one, one that is so much purer and that makes so much clearer the fact that there is no genesis except on the basis of discourse. Doesn't the fact that that topology converges with our own experience, to the extent that it allows us to articulate it, justify what, in what I put forward, is lent support and or-worsened (se s'oupire) by the fact that it never resorts to any substance, never refers to any being, and breaks with everything smacking of philosophy?[41]

Everything that has been said about being assumes that one can refuse the predicate and say "man is," for example, without saying what. The status of being is closely related to this lopping off of the predicate. Thus, nothing can be said of it except through dead-end detours and demonstrations of logical impossibility, whereby no predicate suffices. As for being (Ce qui est de l'être), a being that would be posited as absolute, it is never anything but the fracture, break, or interruption of the formulation "sexed being," insofar as sexed being is involved (intéressé) in jouissance.

November 21, 1972

COMPLEMENT

Beginning of the next class: STUPIDITY (LA BÊTISE).[42]

It seems that in his first "seminar," as it is called, of the year Lacan spoke – I won't beat around the bush – of nothing less than love.

The news has traveled. It even came back to me from – not very far away, of course – a little town in Europe to which it had been sent as a message.

[41] The French here, d'être en rupture avec quoi que se soit qui s'enonce comme philosophie, literally means "breaks with anything whatsoever that is enunciated qua philosophy."

[42] La bêtise is the term Lacan uses to translate the term Freud instructs little Hans' father to employ to characterize Hans' fear of horses, Dummheit (Gesammelte Werke VII, p. 263), translated into English as "nonsense" (in The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud [New York: Norton, 1955], abbreviated hereafter as SE, followed by volume and page numbers), though it could equally well be rendered in Hans' case as "foolishness" or "funny business" (SE X, p. 28).

As it was from my couch that it came back to me, I cannot believe that the 17 person who told it to me truly believed it, given that she[43] knows quite well that what I say of love is assuredly that one cannot speak about it. "Talk to me of love" – what a lark![44] I spoke of the love letter (la lettre d'amour), of the declaration of love – not the same thing as the word of love (la parole d'amour).

I think it is clear, even if you didn't formulate it to yourselves, that in that first seminar I spoke of stupidity.

At stake is the stupidity that conditions what I named my seminar after this year and that is pronounced "encore." You see the risk involved. I am only telling you that to show you what constitutes the weight of my presence here – it's that you enjoy it. My sole presence – at least I dare believe it – my sole presence in my discourse, my sole presence is my stupidity.[45] I should know that I have better things to do than to be here (être là).[46] That is why I might prefer that my presence not be guaranteed to you in each and every case.

Nevertheless, it is clear that I cannot withdraw, simply say "encore," and expect it to go on without me (que ça dure). It's stupidity because I myself obviously collaborate in it. I can only situate myself in the field of this "encore." Backing up from analytic discourse to what conditions it – namely, the truth, the only truth that can be indisputable because it is not, that there's no such thing as a sexual relationship – perhaps doesn't allow one in any way to judge what is and what is not stupidity. And yet it's impossible, given our experience, not to question something regarding analytic discourse: doesn't this discourse hang together (se tient) by basing itself on the dimension of stupidity?

Why not wonder about the status of this dimension, which is obviously quite present? After all, there was no need for analytic discourse – therein lies the subtlety – for the fact that there's no such thing as a sexual relationship to be announced as truth.

Don't think I hesitate to get my feet wet. Were I to speak of Saint Paul today, it would hardly be the first time. That's not what scares me, even if I compromise myself by discussing people whose status and lineage are not, strictly speaking, the kind I keep company with. Nevertheless, the fact that it was the consequence of the Message that men are at one pole (côté) and women at the other has had certain repercussions throughout the ages.

[43] The elle could just as easily be a "he" here, since it refers back to personne, a feminine noun.

[44] Parlez-moi d'amour is the title of a well-known French song from the late eighteenth or early nineteenth century.

[45] Présence seule, which I have translated here as "sole presence," could also be rendered as "presence alone."

[46] Être-là is the French for Dasein.

That hasn't stopped the world from reproducing to the extent of your present numbers. Stupidity is still going strong in any case.

That is not quite the way analytic discourse is established, which I formulated to you as a with S_2 below it,[47] and as what that questions on the side of the subject – in order to produce what, if not stupidity? But, after all, in the name of what would I say that, if it continues, it's stupidity? How is one to get away from stupidity?

It is nevertheless true that there is a status to be granted to this new 18 discourse and to its approach to stupidity. Surely it comes closer, since in other discourses stupidity is what one flees. Discourses always aim at the least stupidity, at sublime stupidity, for "sublime" means the highest point of what lies below.

Where, in analytic discourse, is the sublimity of stupidity? That is what justifies both my giving a rest to my participation in stupidity insofar as it envelopes us here, and my calling on a person who can, on this point, provide me with a response (réplique) based on that which, in other fields, intersects what I say. It is what I had the good fortune to hear, already at the end of last year, from the same person we shall hear from today. He is someone who comes to listen to me here and who is thus sufficiently informed regarding analytic discourse. Right from the beginning of this year, I intend to have him contribute, at his own risk, a response based on what, in a discourse – namely, philosophical discourse – goes its own way, paving it on the basis of a certain status with respect to the least stupidity. I give the floor to François Recanati, whom you already know.

François Recanati's exposé can be found in Scilicet, the journal of the École freudienne de Paris.[48]

December 12, 1972

[47] Lacan is referring here to the formula for the analyst's discourse (or analytic discourse) he first elaborates in Seminar XVII:

$$\frac{a}{S_2} \rightarrow \frac{$}{S_1}$$

The lower right-hand corner is where the product of a discourse appears. Lacan is suggesting here that the S_1 produced by analytic discourse is equivalent to stupidity or nonsense (la bêtise). The "side of the subject," mentioned in this sentence, is the right-hand side of the formula. The formula is provided again in the next lecture of the present seminar.

[48] Scilicet 4 (1973), pp. 55–73. Recanati had already spoken at Lacan's seminar (Seminar XIX, . . . ou pire) on June 14, 1972.

19

II

To Jakobson

LINGUISTRICKS.
THE SIGN THAT ONE IS CHANGING DISCOURSES.
SIGNIFIERNESS BY THE BUCKETFUL.
THE STUPIDITY OF THE SIGNIFIER.
THE ENJOYING SUBSTANCE.

It seems to me that it is difficult not to speak stupidly about language. That is nevertheless what you, Jakobson, manage to do.

Once again, in the talks that Jakobson gave the past few days at the Collège de France,[1] I had the chance to admire him enough to pay homage to him now.

Stupidity nevertheless has to be nourished. Is everything we nourish thereby stupid? No. But it has been demonstrated that to nourish oneself is part and parcel of stupidity. Need I say more to the people present in this room where one is, ultimately, at a restaurant and where one imagines that one is being nourished because one is not at the university cafeteria? One is nourished by the imaginative dimension.

I trust you remember what analytic discourse teaches us about the old bond with the wet nurse, a mother as well, as if by chance, and behind that the infernal business of her desire and everything that follows from it. That is what is at stake in nourishment – some sort of stupidity, but one that analytic discourse puts in its rightful place (assoit dans son droit).

1

One day, I realized that it was difficult not to look into linguistics once the unconscious was discovered.

On the basis of that, I did something that seems to me to be the only true objection I can formulate to what you may have heard the other day from 20 Jakobson's mouth, namely, that all that is language (tout ce qui est du langage) falls within the ambit of linguistics – that is, in the final analysis, within the ambit of the linguist.

Not that I don't agree with him about it quite fully when it comes to poetry, regarding which he put forward this argument. But if one considers everything that, given the definition of language, follows regarding the foundation of the subject – so thoroughly renewed and subverted by Freud that it is on that basis that everything he claimed to be unconscious can be grounded – then one must, in order to leave Jakobson his own turf (domaine réservé),[2] forge another word. I will call it linguistricks (linguisterie).[3]

[1] The most prestigious French academic institution, located in Paris.

That leaves something in my work for the linguist to latch onto, and is not without explaining why I am so often subjected to more than one admonition from so many linguists – certainly not from Jakobson, but that's because he is kindly disposed toward me. In other words, he loves me – that's the way I express it in an intimate context.

The fact that I say (Mon dire)[4] that the unconscious is structured like a language is not part and parcel of the field of linguistics. That is a glimpse of what you will see commented upon in a text that will come out in the next issue of my well-known aperiodical (Scilicet) and that is entitled "L'Étourdit," that's d, i, t at the end[5] – a glimpse of the sentence I wrote on the board several times last year without ever elaborating on it: "The fact that one says remains forgotten behind what is said in what is heard."[6]

Yet, it is in the consequences of what is said that the act of saying is

[2] Literally, "private hunting grounds," "game reserve," "private terrain," or "private domain."

[3] From linguistique (linguistics). The ending Lacan adds here, linguisterie, gives one the impression that it is a kind of specious or fake linguistics. François Raffoul suggested "linguistrickery," which I have shortened to "linguistricks." One could, of course, also see linguisterie as a condensation of various other words: tricherie, strie, and even hystérie.

[4] Dire, as a noun, normally refers to one's words, what one says. Here, however, it is not simply a dictum or a statement that is in question but the act of saying itself. As Lacan says in Seminar XIX, it is "qu'on dise comme fait" (June 21, 1972). This sentence could thus be formulated differently: "My saying that the unconscious is structured like a language is not part and parcel of the field of linguistics." Hereafter, I generally translate le dire as "the act (or fact) of saying"; when translated otherwise, the French is provided in brackets. The plural, dires, does not seem to be used by Lacan in this sense and I have generally translated it as "statements."

[5] L'Étourdi (without the final t, a homonym of L'Étourdit) is the title of a well-known play by Molière; the full title is L'Étourdi ou les contretemps. Someone who is étourdi(e) is scatterbrained, dizzy, thoughtless, heedless, walks around in a daze, has no idea what is going on, etc. The English translation of Molière's play is aptly entitled The Blunderer. By adding a t to the end of the word, Lacan creates a condensation involving étourdi and dit (as a noun, dit means "story" or "tale"; more literally, it means "what is said," "the said," or "statement"; as the past participle of the verb dire, to say, it means "said"). The construction also suggests that the étourdi is said to be étourdi, and perhaps only said to be étourdi without really being it. The decomposition of the word suggested by the condensation could also include et (and), tour (trick, tower, or tour), and dit, and no doubt other words as well.

[6] The French here does not literally include the words "the fact," relying instead on a subjunctive: Qu'on dise reste oublié derrière ce qui se dit dans ce qui s'entend ("That one may say remains forgotten . . ."). Note also the two reflexives and entendre, which means both "to hear" and "to understand."

judged. But what one does with what is said remains open. For one can do all kinds of things with it, like one does with furniture when, for example, one is undergoing a siege or a bombardment.

There's a text by Rimbaud that I brought up last year called "À une raison" that is scanned by a reply that ends each verse – "A new love" (Un nouvel amour).[7] Since I am supposed to have spoken last time about love, why not take it up again at this level, with the idea once again of indicating the distance between linguistics and linguistricks?

In Rimbaud's text, love is the sign, indicated as such, that one is changing reasons, and that is why the poet addresses that reason. One changes reasons – in other words, one changes discourses.

I will remind you here of the four discourses I distinguished. There are four of them only on the basis of the psychoanalytic discourse that I articulate using four places – each place founded on some effect of the signifier – and that I situate as the last discourse in this deployment. This is not in any sense to be viewed as a series of historical emergences – the fact that one may have appeared longer ago than the others is not what is important here. Well, I would say now that there is some emergence of psychoanalytic discourse whenever there is a movement from one discourse to another.

To apply these categories, which are structured only on the basis of the existence of psychoanalytic discourse, one must pay careful attention to the 21 putting to the test of the truth that there is some emergence of analytic discourse with each shift from one discourse to another. I am not saying anything else when I say that love is the sign that one is changing discourses.

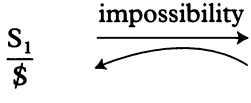
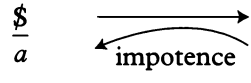
Master's Discourse[8]

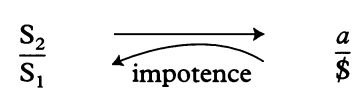


is clarified by regression from the:

Hysteric's Discourse



University Discourse



is clarified by its "progress" in the:

Analyst's Discourse

[7] The very short poem entitled "À une raison" can be found in Arthur Rimbaud, Oeuvres complètes (Paris: Gallimard, 1972), p. 130.

[8] Note that, on at least one occasion, Lacan says that le discours du maître can also be understood as the discourse on the master (Seminar XIX, February 3, 1972).

The places are those of:		The terms are:
		S_1, the master signifier agent	other	S_2, knowledge
———	———	$, the subject
truth	production	a, surplus jouissance

Last time I said that jouissance of the Other is not the sign of love. And here I am saying that love is a sign. Does love consist in the fact that what appears is but the sign?

It is here that the Port-Royal logic, evoked the other day in François Recanati's exposé, could lend us a hand. That logic proposes that the sign – and one always marvels at such statements (dires) that take on weight sometimes long after being pronounced – is what is defined by the disjunction of two substances that have no part in common, namely, by what we nowadays call intersection. That will lead us to some answers a bit later.

What is not a sign of love is jouissance of the Other, jouissance of the Other sex and, as I said, of the body that symbolizes it.

A change of discourses – things budge, things traverse you, things traverse us, things are traversed (ça se traverse), and no one notices the change (personne n'accuse le coup). I can say until I'm blue in the face that the notion of discourse should be taken as a social link (lien social), founded on language, and thus seems not unrelated to what is specified in linguistics as grammar, and yet nothing seems to change.

Perhaps that poses a question that no one raises, that of the status of the notion of information whose success has been so lightning fast that one can say that the whole of science manages to get infiltrated by it. We're at the 22 level of the gene's molecular information and of the winding of nucleoproteins around strands of DNA, that are themselves wrapped around each other, all of that being tied together by hormonal links – that is, messages that are sent, recorded, etc. Let us note that the success of this formula finds its indisputable source in a linguistics that is not only immanent but explicitly formulated. In any case, this action extends right to the very foundations of scientific thought, being articulated as negative entropy.

Is that what I, from another locus, that of my linguistricks, gather (recueille) when I make use of the function of the signifier?

2

What is the signifier?

The signifier – as promoted in the rites of a linguistic tradition that is not specifically Saussurian, but goes back as far as the Stoics and is reflected in Saint Augustine's work – must be structured in topological terms. Indeed, the signifier is first of all that which has a meaning effect (effet de signifié),[9] and it is important not to elide the fact that between signifier and meaning effect there is something barred that must be crossed over.[10]

This way of topologizing language's status (ce qu'il en est du langage) is illustrated most admirably by phonology, insofar as phonology incarnates the signifier in phonemes. But the signifier cannot in any way be limited to this phonemic prop. Once again – what is a signifier (qu'est-ce qu'un signifiant)?

I must already stop, having posed the question in this form.

"A" (Un), placed before the term, is usually the indeterminate article.[11] It already assumes that the signifier can be collectivized, that we can make a collection thereof and speak thereof as something that is totalized. Now the linguist would surely have trouble, it seems to me, grounding this collection, grounding it on a "the" (le), because there is no predicate that permits that.

As Jakobson pointed out, yesterday as a matter of fact, it is not individual words that can ground the signifier. Words have no other place in which to form a collection than the dictionary, where they can be listed. In order to make you see this, I could speak of sentences, which are clearly signifying units as well, that people sometimes try to collect by selecting sentences that are typical of one language. But instead I will evoke proverbs, in which a certain short article by Paulhan that recently came my way got me more interested.

Paulhan, in the kind of ambiguous dialogue that grabs the attention of the foreigner with a certain limited linguistic competence, noticed that the 23 proverb had a particular weight and played a specific role among the Madagascans. The fact that he discovered it on that occasion does not stop me from going further. Indeed, one can note, in the margins of the proverbial function, that "signifierness" (signifiance)[12] is something that fans out (s'év-

[9] The French here, un effet de signifié, can also be translated as "an effect as signified" or "the signified qua effect."

[10] Lacan is referring here to his algorithm (a reversal of Saussure's), where "S" designates the signifier and "s" designates the signified (i.e., meaning), and the line between the two serves as a bar between the realms of the signifier and the signified. See Écrits, 515.

$$\frac{S}{s}$$

[11] In French, Un corresponds both to the indefinite article ("a" in English) and to the number 1. The twofold meaning of un must be kept in mind for the whole of the ensuing discussion.

[12] Signifiance is an important term that Lacan takes over from linguistics, the French signifiance being originally based on the English word "significance." It is taken over by Lacan in the sense that, in linguistics, it merely refers to "the fact of entaille), if you will allow me this expression, from the proverb to the locution.

Look, for example, in the dictionary under the expression "à tire-larigot,"[13] and you'll see what I mean. Certain dictionaries go so far as to invent a Mr. Larigot: after pulling on his leg over and over, people ended up creating the expression à tire-larigot. What does that expression mean? There are plenty of other locutions that are just as extravagant. They mean nothing other than the following – the subversion of desire. That is the meaning of à tire-larigot. Through the pierced barrel of signifierness flows à tire-larigot a glass, a full glass of signifierness.

What is this signifierness? At the level we are at, it is that which has a meaning effect.

Don't forget that, at the outset, the relationship between signifier and signified was incorrectly qualified as arbitrary. That is how Saussure expressed himself, probably in spite of his better judgment – he certainly believed otherwise, that is, something far closer to the text of the Cratylus, as is seen by what he had in his desk drawers, namely, his anagrams. Now what passes for arbitrary is the fact that meaning effects seem not to bear any relation to what causes them.[14]

But if they seem to bear no relation to what causes them, that is because we expect what causes them to bear a certain relation to the real. I'm talking about the serious real. The serious – one must of course make an effort to notice it, one must have come to my seminars now and then – can only be the serial.[15] That can only be obtained after a very long period of extraction, extraction from language of something that is caught up in it, and about having meaning," whereas in Lacan's work it has to do with the fact of being a signifier (hence the translation I am proposing here: signifierness). When Lacan uses the term, it is to emphasize the nonsensical nature of the signifier, the very existence of signifiers apart from any possible meaning or signification they might have; it is to emphasize the fact that the signifier's very existence exceeds its significatory role, that its substance exceeds its symbolic function, to signify. Thus, rather than referring to "the fact of having meaning," Lacan uses signifiance to refer to "the fact of having effects other than meaning effects." We should hear defiance in Lacan's signifiance – the signifier defies the role allotted to it, refusing to be altogether relegated to the task of signification.

[13] A tire-larigot figuratively means "a lot," "in large quantity," "by the bucketful," or "by the shovelful." Tirer means to pull. It may be helpful to readers who do not speak French to consider the American expression: "How do you like them apples!" Nothing in the expression itself – that is, none of the individual words or the way in which they are put together – seems to lead up to the meaning "So there!" or "Tough!" that the expression takes on in many contexts. The expression cannot be further decomposed: there are no smaller meaning units within it that create its meaning. The smallest meaning unit here is the whole sentence, which can thus be taken as a single signifying unit or signifier.

[14] For example, the meaning, "a lot" or "by the shovelful," seems to bear no relation to the locution, à tire larigot, that is, the signifier that causes it.

[15] Le sériel, "what forms a series."

which we have, at the point at which I have arrived in my exposé, only a faint idea – even regarding this indeterminate "a" (un), this lure that we don't know how to make function in relation to the signifier so that it collectivizes the signifier. In truth, we will see that we must turn things around, and instead of investigating a signifier (un signifiant), we must investigate the signifier "One" (Un) – but we haven't reached that point yet.

Meaning effects seem to bear no relation to what causes them. That means that the references or things the signifier serves to approach remain approximate – macroscopic, for example. What is important is not that it's imaginary – after all, if the signifier allowed us to point to the image we need to be happy, that would be fine and dandy, but it's not the case. At the level of the signifier/signified distinction, what characterizes the relationship between the signified and what serves as the indispensable third party, namely the referent, is precisely that the signified misses the referent. The joiner doesn't work.

24 What really takes the cake is that we nevertheless manage to use it by employing other devices (trucs). To characterize the function of the signifier, to collectivize it in a way that resembles a predication, we have the Port-Royal logic, which is what I began with today. The other day, Recanati mentioned adjectives made into nouns (substantivés).[16] Roundness is extracted from round and – why not? – justice from the just, etc. That is what will allow me to put forward my stupidity (bêtise) in order to show that perhaps stupidity is not, as people think, a semantic category, but rather a way of collectivizing the signifier.

Why not? The signifier is stupid.

It seems to me that this could lead to a smile, a stupid smile, naturally. A stupid smile, as everyone knows – it suffices to visit cathedrals – is an angel's smile.[17] Indeed, that is the only justification for Pascal's warning (semonce).[18] If an angel has such a stupid smile, that is because it is up to its ears in the supreme signifier. To find itself on dry land would do it some good – perhaps it wouldn't smile anymore.

It's not that I believe in angels – as everyone knows, I believe in them inextricably and even "inex-Teilhard-ly"[19] – it's just that I don't believe [16] In French, un substantif is a noun.

[17] Lacan is evidently referring here to the statue L'Ange au Sourire (the Smiling Angel), the guardian angel of Saint Nicaise, at the Cathédrale de Reims, dating back to the thirteenth century.

[18] Is it an accident that the term Lacan selects here, semonce, is of juridical origin and was also made into a noun? See Lacan's favorite dictionary, Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue française, Bloch and von Wartburg (Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1932).

[19] Inextrayablement and inexteilhardement sound more similar in French than do the terms I have used here to translate them: "inextricably" and "inex-Teilhard-they bear the slightest message, and it is in that respect that they are truly signifying.

Why do I so strongly emphasize the function of the signifier? Because it is the foundation of the symbolic dimension that only analytic discourse allows us to isolate as such.

I could have approached things in another way – by telling you, for example, how people go about asking me to be their analyst.

I don't want to spoil such pristine purity. Certain people would recognize themselves – God knows what they might imagine I think. Perhaps they would believe that I think they are stupid. That is truly the last thing that would cross my mind in such a case. The question of import here concerns the fact that analytic discourse introduces an adjective made into a noun, "stupidity," insofar as it is a dimension of the signifier at work (une dimension en exercice du signifiant).

Here we must take a closer look.

3

As soon as we turn things into nouns, we presuppose a substance, and nowadays, well, we just don't have that many substances. We have thinking substance and extended substance.[20]

On that basis, it would perhaps be appropriate to ask where the "substantial" dimension can be situated – however far it may be from us and, heretofore, giving but a sign to us (ne nous faisant que signe) – this substance at work (en exercice), this dimension that should be written "dit-mension,"[21] 25 over which the function of language is first of all that which is watchful, prior to any more rigorous use.

First of all, it can be said that we have changed thinking substance considerably. Since the "I am thinking"[22] that, presupposing itself, grounds existence, we have had to take a step – that of the unconscious.

Since today I'm dragging my feet in the rut of the unconscious structured like a language, it should be realized that this formulation totally changes the function of the subject as existing. The subject is not the one (celui) ly." Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (1881–1955) was a French Christian theologian and philosopher.

[20] Res cogitans and res extensia.

[21] Dit (the t is silent) means "what is said"; here Lacan is suggesting that it is a dimension of the said or spoken. Mension combines the homonyms mansion (from the Latin mansio [dwelling], which in French was the term for each part of a theater set in the Middle Ages), and mention (mention, note, or honors, as in cum laude).

[22] See the most recent English translation of Descartes' Philosophical Writings by J. Cottingham (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986): "I am thinking, therefore I am."

who thinks. The subject is precisely the one we encourage, not to say it all (tout dire),[23] as we tell him in order to charm him – one cannot say it all – but rather to utter stupidities. That is the key.

For it is with those stupidities that we do analysis, and that we enter into the new subject – that of the unconscious. It is precisely to the extent that the guy is willing not to think anymore that we will perhaps learn a little bit more about it, that we will draw certain consequences from his words (dits) – words that cannot be taken back (se dédire), for that is the rule of the game.

From that emerges a speaking (dire) that does not always go so far as to be able to "ex-sist" with respect to the words spoken (ex-sister au dit).[24] That is because of what gets included in those words as a consequence thereof.[25] That is the acid-test (épreuve) by which, in analyzing anyone, no matter how stupid, a certain real may be reached.

The status of the saying (dire) – I must leave all of that aside for today. But I can announce to you that an even bigger pain in the ass for us this year will be to put to this test (épreuve) a certain number of sayings (dires) from the philosophical tradition.

Fortunately, Parmenides actually wrote poems. Doesn't he use linguistic devices[26] – the linguist's testimony takes precedence here – that closely resemble mathematical articulation, alternation after succession, framing after alternation? It is precisely because he was a poet that Parmenides says what he has to say to us in the least stupid of manners. Otherwise, the idea that being is and that nonbeing is not, I don't know what that means to you, but personally I find that stupid. And you mustn't believe that it amuses me to say so.

Nevertheless, we will, this year, need being and the signifier One (Un), for which I paved the way last year by saying – "There's such a thing as

[23] Tout dire, to say it all or to say everything, is a common French rendering of Freud's "say whatever comes to mind."

[24] The expression Lacan uses here, ex-sister au dit, is not easily rendered in English; Lacan is borrowing a term, ex-sistence, which was first introduced into French in translations of Heidegger's work (e.g., Being and Time), as a translation for the Greek εκστασις and the German Ekstase. The root meaning of the term in Greek is "standing outside of" or "standing apart from" something. In Greek, it was generally used for the removal or displacement of something, but it also came to be applied to states of mind that we would now call "ecstatic." (Thus, a derivative meaning of the word is "ecstasy.") Heidegger often played on the root meaning of the word, "standing outside" or "stepping outside oneself," but also on its close connection in Greek with the root of the word for "existence." Lacan uses it to talk about an existence that stands apart, which insists as it were from the outside, something not included on the inside. Rather than being intimate, it is "extimate."

[25] The meaning of Lacan's sentence here is very unclear: A cause de ce qui vient au dit comme conséquence.

[26] Des appareils de langage: literally, "language apparatuses" or "linguistic apparatuses."

One!" (Y a d' l'Un!) For it is there that the serious begins, as stupid as that too may seem. Thus, we'll have several references to take up in the philosophical tradition.

We can't get rid of that renowned extended substance, the complement of that other substance, that easily either, since it is modern space – the substance of pure space, like we say "pure spirit." It certainly isn't very promising.

Pure space is based on the notion of the part, as long as one adds to that the following, that all of the parts are external to each other – partes extra partes. People managed to extract a few little things from even that, but some serious steps had to be taken. 26

In order to situate my signifier before leaving you today, I will ask you to consider what was inscribed at the beginning of my first sentence last time – "enjoying a body" (jouir d'un corps), a body that symbolizes the Other[27] – as it perhaps involves something that can help us focus on another form of substance, enjoying substance (la substance jouissante).

Isn't that precisely what psychoanalytic experience presupposes? – the substance of the body, on the condition that it is defined only as that which enjoys itself (se jouit). That is, no doubt, a property of the living body, but we don't know what it means to be alive except for the following fact, that a body is something that enjoys itself (cela se jouit).

It enjoys itself only by "corporizing" (corporiser)[28] the body in a signifying way. That implies something other than the partes extra partes of extended substance. As is emphasized admirably by the kind of Kantian that Sade was, one can only enjoy a part of the Other's body, for the simple reason that one has never seen a body completely wrap itself around the Other's body, to the point of surrounding and phagocytizing it. That is why we must confine ourselves to simply giving it a little squeeze, like that, taking a forearm or anything else – ouch!

Enjoying (jouir) has the fundamental property that it is, ultimately, one person's body that enjoys a part of the Other's body.[29] But that part also enjoys – the Other likes it more or less, but it is a fact that the Other cannot remain indifferent to it.

Occasionally something even happens that goes beyond what I just described, and that is marked by utter signifying ambiguity – for the expression "enjoyment of the body" (jouir du corps) includes a genitive that has a certain Sadian flavor to it, as I've mentioned, or, on the contrary, an [27] Lacan does not quote himself exactly here.

[28] The French corporiser (more commonly corporifier) means to give a body to that which is spirit or to give a solid consistency to a fluid.

[29] More literally stated, it is "the body of the one that enjoys a part of the body of the Other."

ecstatic, subjective flavor suggesting, in fact, that it is the Other who enjoys.[30]

As concerns jouissance, that is but an elementary level. The last time, I put forward the notion that jouissance is not a sign of love. That is what I shall have to argue for, and it will lead us to the level of phallic jouissance. But what I, strictly speaking, call "jouissance of the Other," insofar as it is merely symbolized here, is something else altogether – namely, the not-whole that I will have to articulate.

4

In this single articulation, what is the signifier – the signifier for today, and to close on this point, given the motives I have regarding it?

I will say that the signifier is situated at the level of enjoying substance (substance jouissante). That is completely different from Aristotelian physics, 27 which I am about to discuss, and which, precisely because it can be used (sollicitée) in the way I am going to use it, shows us to what extent it was illusory.

The signifier is the cause of jouissance. Without the signifier, how could we even approach that part of the body?[31] Without the signifier, how could we center that something that is the material cause of jouissance?[32] However fuzzy or confused it may be, it is a part of the body that is signified in this contribution (apport).

Now I will go right to the final cause, final in every sense of the term because it is the terminus – the signifier is what brings jouissance to a halt.

After those who embrace (s'enlacent) – if you'll allow me – alas (hélas)! And after those who are weary (las),[33] hold on there (holà)! The other pole of the signifier, its stopping action (coup d'arrêt), is as much there (est là) at the origin as the commandment's direct addressing (vocatif) can be.

The efficient, which Aristotle proposes as the third form of the cause, is nothing in the end but the project through which jouissance is limited. All kinds of things that appear in the animal kingdom make a parody of speaking beings' path to jouissance, while simultaneously sketching out message-like functions – for example, the bee transporting the pollen of the male

[30] The genitive here, de (combined here with le to form du), can, as Lacan says in "Subversion of the Subject and Dialectic of Desire" (Écrits, 814), be objective (e.g., I derive enjoyment from the Other's body) or subjective (e.g., the Other's body enjoys).

[31] That is, "that part of the body" discussed five paragraphs back or, more simply, "a part of the body."

[32] On the four Aristotelian causes, see also "Science and Truth" in Écrits.

[33] Las is also a very old French term for "alas."

flower to the female flower closely resembles what goes on in communication.

And the embrace (l'étreinte), the confused embrace wherein jouissance finds its cause, its last cause, which is formal – isn't it something like grammar that commands it?

It's no accident that Pie.re beats Paul at the crux of the first examples of (French) grammar, nor that – why not put it this way? – Pierre and Paule (Pierre et Paule) constitute the example of conjunction, except that one must wonder, afterwards, who shoves (épaule) the other. I've already gotten a lot of mileage out of that one.

One could even say that the verb is defined as a signifier that is not as stupid – you have to write that as one word – notasstupid as the others, no doubt, providing as it does the movement of a subject to his own division in jouissance, and it is all the less stupid when the verb determines this division as disjunction, and it becomes a sign.

Last year I played on a slip of the pen I made in a letter addressed to a woman – tu ne sauras jamais combien je t'ai aimé ("you will never know how much I loved you") – é instead of ée.[34] Since then, someone mentioned to me that that could mean that I am a homosexual. But what I articulated quite precisely last year is that when one loves, it has nothing to do with sex.

That is what I would like to end with today, if you will.

December 19, 1972

[34] The past participle, aimé, is supposed to agree in gender with the sex of the person designated in the phrase by the direct object, te (here t'); if the person is male, the participle remains aimé, if female, an e should be added to the end: aimée.

29

III

The function of the written[1]

THE UNCONSCIOUS IS WHAT IS READ.

ON THE USE OF LETTERS.

S/s.

ONTOLOGY, THE MASTER'S DISCOURSE.

SPEAKING OF FUCKING.

THE UNREADABLE.

I am going to enter very slowly into what I have reserved for you today, which, before beginning, strikes me as rather reckless. It has to do with the way in which we must situate the function of the written in analytic discourse.

There is an anecdote to be related here, namely, that one day, on the cover of a collection I brought out – poubellication, as I called it[2] – I found nothing better to write than the word Écrits.

It is rather well known that those Écrits cannot be read easily. I can make a little autobiographical admission – that is exactly what I thought. I thought, perhaps it goes that far, I thought they were not meant to be read.

That's a good start.

1

A letter is something that is read.[3] It even seems to be designed as a sort of extension (prolongement) of the word. It is read (ça se lit) and literally at that. But it is not the same thing to read a letter as it is to read. It is quite clear that, in analytic discourse, what is involved is but that – that which is read, that which is read beyond what you have incited the subject to say, which, as I emphasized the last time, is not so much to say everything[4]

[1] What I am translating here as "the written" is "l'écrit" which can also mean writing, a text (as in Lacan's Écrits, i.e., his writings), etc. It is not always easily distinguished here from écriture, writing, but should not be confused with the act or fact of writing, as it refers specifically to that which has already been written. In the few cases in which I render it as "writing," I provide the French in brackets.

[2] Poubellication is a condensation of poubelle, garbage can (or dustbin), and publication, publication. It can perhaps also be seen to contain embellir, to beautify, and other words as well.

[3] Or "A letter is something that can be read" or "A letter is something you read": La lettre, ça se lit.

[4] In the context of the last chapter, I translated this tout dire as to "say it all."

as to say anything, without worrying about saying something stupid (des bêtises).

That assumes that we develop the dimension [of stupidity], but it cannot be developed without the act of saying.[5] What is the dimension of stupidity? Stupidity, at least the stupidity one can proffer, doesn't go far. In common discourse, it stops short.

That is what I check when I look back, which I never do without 30 trembling, at what I have proffered in the past. That always makes me awfully afraid, afraid of having said something stupid, in other words, something that, due to what I am now putting forward, I might consider not to hold up.

Thanks to someone who is writing up this Seminar – the first year at the École normale will be coming out soon[6] – I was able to get the sense, which I encounter sometimes when put to the test, that what I put forward that year was not as stupid as all that, and at least wasn't so stupid as to have stopped me from putting forward other things that seem to me, because that's where I'm at now, to hold water.

Nevertheless, this "rereading oneself" (se relire) represents a dimension that must be situated in relation to what is, with respect to analytic discourse, the function of that which is read (ce qui se lit).

Analytic discourse has a privilege in this regard. That is what I began from in what constitutes a crucial date for me in what I am teaching – it is perhaps not so much on the "I" that emphasis must be placed, namely, concerning what "I" can proffer, as on the "from" (de), in other words, on from whence comes the teaching of which I am the effect. Since then, I have grounded analytic discourse on the basis of a precise articulation, which can be written on the blackboard with four letters, two bars, and five lines that connect up each of the letters two by two. One of these lines – since there are four letters, there should be six lines – is missing.

This writing (écriture)[7] stemmed from an initial reminder, namely, that analytic discourse is a new kind of relation based only on what functions as speech, in something one may define as a field. "Function and Field," I wrote, "of Speech and Language," I ended, "in Psychoanaly-

[5] Sans le dire could also mean "without saying so."

[6] Lacan is referring here to Seminar XI, published in English as The Four Fundamental Concepts of Psychoanalysis (New York: Norton, 1978). The text was edited by Jacques-Alain Miller and published by Éditions du Seuil in 1973.

[7] In English, we would normally refer to the kind of symbolism Lacan refers to here (the analyst's discourse whose written formulation was given in Chapter II) and also later in this chapter as notation or symbols, not as a writing, much less as a written or what is written. Given, however, Lacan's discussion in this chapter, I have opted to stretch the English use of the words writing and written, rather than always strive for the best-sounding English translation. Lacan himself uses the term "notation" later in this chapter.

sis"[8] – that amounted to designating what constitutes the originality of this discourse, which is not the same as a certain number of others that serve specific purposes (qui font office), and that, due to this very fact, I qualify as official discourses (discours officiels). The point is to discern the purpose (office) of analytic discourse, and to render it, if not official, at least officiating.

It is in this discourse that we must indicate what the function of the written in analytic discourse may be, if it is, indeed, specific.

To allow for the explanation of the functions of this discourse, I put forward the use of a certain number of letters. First of all, a, which I call "object," but which, nevertheless, is but a letter. Then A,[9] that I make function in that aspect of the proposition that takes only the form of a written formula,[10] and that is produced by mathematical logic. I designate thereby that which is first of all a locus, a place. I called it "the locus of the Other" (le lieu de l'Autre).[11]

In what respect can a letter serve to designate a locus? It is clear that there is something that is not quite right here. When you open, for example, to the first page of what was finally collected in the form of a definitive 31 edition entitled Theory of Sets,[12] bearing the name of a fictitious author, Nicolas Bourbaki, what you see is the putting into play of a certain number of logical signs. One of them designates the function of "place" as such. It is written as a little square: □.

Thus, I wasn't making a strict use of the letter when I said that the locus of the Other was symbolized by the letter A. On the contrary, I marked it by redoubling it with the S that means signifier here, signifier of A insofar as the latter is barred: S(Ⱥ). I thereby added a dimension to A's locus, showing that qua locus it does not hold up, that there is a fault, hole, or loss therein. Object a comes to function with respect to that loss. That is something which is quite essential to the function of language.

Lastly, I used the letter Φ, to be distinguished from the merely signifying function that had been promoted in analytic theory up until then with the [8] This is the title of Lacan's well-known Rome discourse from 1953 included in Écrits.

[9] In this Seminar (as elsewhere), I adopt the French convention of using A for Other (Autre) instead of O, because the barred Other, when written Ø, is easily confused with the empty set, {Ø}.

[10] The French here strikes me as somewhat ambiguous: ce qui de la proposition n'a pris que formule écrite.

[11] This could also be translated as "the Other's locus" or "the Other as locus."

[12] Originally published in French as Éléments de mathématique, Théorie des ensembles (Paris: Hermann), it was translated into English and published as Elements of Mathematics: Theory of Sets (Reading: Addison-Wesley, 1968).

term "phallus." It is something original whose true import I am specifying today as being indicated by its very writing.[13]

If these three letters are different, it is because they do not have the same function.

To once again take up the thread of analytic discourse, we must now discern what these letters introduce into the function of the signifier.

2

The written is in no way in the same register or made of the same stuff, if you'll allow me this expression, as the signifier.

The signifier is a dimension that was introduced by linguistics. Linguistics, in the field in which speech is produced, is not self-evident (ne va pas de soi).[14] A discourse sustains it, which is scientific discourse. Linguistics introduces into speech a dissociation thanks to which the distinction between signifier and signified is grounded. It divides up what seems to be self-evident, which is that when one speaks, one's speech signifies, bringing with it the signified, and, still further, is only based, up to a certain point, on the function of signification.

Distinguishing the dimension of the signifier only takes on importance when it is posited that what you hear, in the auditory sense of the term, bears no relation whatsoever to what it signifies. That is an act that is instituted only through a discourse, scientific discourse. And it is not self-evident. Indeed, it is so scarcely self-evident that a whole discourse – which does not flow from a bad pen, since it is the Cratylus, by none other than Plato – results from the endeavor to show that there must be a relationship and that the signifier in and of itself means something. This attempt, which we can qualify from our vantage point as desperate, is marked by failure, because another discourse, scientific discourse, due to its very institution – in a way whose history we need not probe here – gives us the following, that 32 the signifier is posited only insofar as it has no relation to the signified.

The very terms we use to talk about it are still slippery. A linguist as discerning as Ferdinand de Saussure speaks of arbitrariness. That is tantamount to slipping, slipping into another discourse, the master's discourse, to call a spade a spade. Arbitrariness is not a suitable term here.

When we develop a discourse, if we are to remain within its field and not

[13] Lacan's phraseology is quite complicated here: que je spécifie aujourd'hui d'être précisé dans son relief par l'écrit même.

[14] The expression Lacan uses here, aller de soi, variants of which are repeated throughout the next few paragraphs, can generally be translated as "to be self-evident," but more literally means to "go it alone," "stand alone," or "require no outside support." Here linguistics is sustained by another discourse, scientific discourse.

fall back into another, we must always try to give it its own consistency and not step outside of it except advisedly. This vigilance is all the more necessary when what is at stake is what constitutes a discourse (quand il s'agit de ce qu'est un discours). To say that the signifier is arbitrary does not have the same import as to simply say that it bears no relation to its meaning effect, for the former involves slipping into another reference.

The word "reference," in this case, can only be situated on the basis of what discourse constitutes by way of a link (lien). The signifier as such refers to nothing if not to a discourse, in other words, a mode of functioning or a utilization of language qua link.

We must still indicate here what this link means. The link – we can but turn to this right away – is a link between those who speak. You can immediately see where we are headed – it's not just anyone who speaks, of course; it's beings, beings we are used to qualifying as "living," and it would, perhaps, be rather difficult to exclude the dimension of life from those who speak. But we immediately realize that this dimension simultaneously brings in that of death, and that a radical signifying ambiguity results from this. The sole function on the basis of which life can be defined, namely, the reproduction of a body, can itself be characterized neither by life nor by death, since reproduction as such, insofar as it is sexual (sexuée), involves both life and death.

Already, by merely swimming with the tide of analytic discourse, we have made a jump known as a "world view" (conception du monde), which to us must nevertheless be the funniest thing going. The term "world view" supposes a discourse – that of philosophy – that is entirely different from ours.

If we leave behind philosophical discourse, nothing is less certain than the existence of a world. One can only laugh when one hears people claim that analytic discourse involves something on the order of such a conception.

I would go even further – putting forward such a term to designate Marxism is also a joke. Marxism does not seem to me to be able to pass for a world view. The statement of what Marx says (L'énoncé de ce que dit Marx) runs counter to that in all sorts of striking ways. Marxism is something else, something I will call a gospel. It is the announcement that history is instating another dimension of discourse and opening up the possibility of com-33 pletely subverting the function of discourse as such and of philosophical discourse, strictly speaking, insofar as a world view is based upon the latter.

Generally speaking, language proves to be a field much richer in resources than if it were merely the field in which philosophical discourse has inscribed itself over the course of time. But certain reference points have been enunciated by that discourse that are difficult to completely eliminate from any use of language. That is why there is nothing easier than to fall back into what I ironically called a world view, but which has a more moderate and more precise name: ontology.

Ontology is what highlighted in language the use of the copula, isolating it as a signifier.[15] To dwell on the verb "to be" – a verb that is not even, in the complete field of the diversity of languages, employed in a way we could qualify as universal – to produce it as such is a highly risky enterprise.

In order to exorcise it, it might perhaps suffice to suggest that when we say about anything whatsoever that it is what it is, nothing in any way obliges us to isolate the verb "to be." That is pronounced "it is what it is" (c'est ce que c'est), and it could just as well be written, "idizwadidiz" (seskecé). In this use of the copula, we would see nothing at all. We would see nothing whatsoever if a discourse, the discourse of the master, m'être,[16] didn't emphasize the verb "to be" (être).

That is what Aristotle himself thinks about twice before propounding since, to designate the being he juxtaposes to τὸ τί ἐστι, that is, to quiddity or what it is, he goes so far as to employ the following, τό τί ἦν εἶναι – what would have happened if that which was to be had simply come to be.[17] It seems that the pedicle[18] is conserved here that allows us to situate from whence this discourse on being is produced – it's quite simply being at someone's heel, being at someone's beck and call – what would have been if you had understood what I ordered you to do.[19]

[15] Comme signifiant could also mean "as signifying."

[16] Maître, "master," and m'être are generally pronounced identically in French. The latter literally means "to be myself," but in certain expressions – e.g., je me souviens de m'être aperçu que . . . "I recall having noticed that . . ." – it is simply part and parcel of a reflexive construction.

Lacan's discussion here is continued in Seminar XXI (Les non-dupes errent, January 15, 1974), where Lacan says, " '[S]peaking being' . . . is a pleonasm, because there is only being due to speaking; were it not for the verb 'to be,' there would be no being at all."

[17] The Greek expressions here can be found in many passages in Aristotle's Metaphysics; see, for example, Book V, Chapter 18, 1022a25–27, where τό τί ἦν εἶναι is translated by W. D. Ross as "what it was to be." (Richard Hope translates it as "what it means to be.") Ross more generally translates it as "essence." Lacan's French here reads as follows: ce qui se serait produit si était venu à être, tout court, ce qui était à être. This could also be rendered: "what would have been produced if that which should have been had come into Being."

[18] The pédicule ("pedicle," "pedicel," or "peduncle") – a term that has many meanings in anatomy, botany, and zoology, and whose root is pes, "foot" – in question here is most likely the Greek word ἤν (if or unless), which is often used in subjunctive clauses and as part of a negation (with μὴ). It is thus similar to the French ne when used as an "expletive" (for example, in craindre qu'il ne vienne), which Lacan discusses in great detail in Seminar IX, Identification. See also Lacan's use of pédicule in Seminar XIX (March 15, 1972).

[19] The French here is far more polyvalent: c'est tout simplement l'être à la botte, l'être aux ordres, ce qui allait être si tu avais entendu ce que je t'ordonne. The allait être involves an imperfect tense, and Lacan often plays on the French imperfect, since it

Every dimension of being is produced in the wake of the master's discourse – the discourse of he who, proffering the signifier, expects therefrom one of its link effects that must not be neglected, which is related to the fact that the signifier commands. The signifier is, first and foremost, imperative.

How is one to return, if not on the basis of a peculiar (spécial) discourse, to a prediscursive reality? That is the dream – the dream behind every conception (idée) of knowledge. But it is also what must be considered mythical. There's no such thing as a prediscursive reality. Every reality is founded and defined by a discourse.

That is why it is important for us to realize what analytic discourse is made of, and not to misrecognize the following, which no doubt has but a limited place therein, that we speak in analytic discourse about what the verb "to fuck" (foutre) enunciates perfectly well. We speak therein of fucking,[20] and we say that it's not working out (ça ne va pas).[21]

That is an important part of what is confided in analytic discourse, but 34 it is worth highlighting that analytic discourse does not have exclusivity in this regard. For that is also what is expressed in what I earlier referred to as "current discourse" (discours courant). Let us write that as "disque-ourcourant" [pronounced in the same way as discours courant, but disque means record or disk], disque aussi hors-champ, hors jeu de tout discours [a disk that is also or so very outside of the field, out of the game, or beyond the rules of all discourse], donc disque tout court [thus, just a disk] – it goes around and around for nothing, quite precisely. The disk is found in the very field on the basis of which all discourses are specified and where they all drown, where each and every one of them is just as capable of enunciating as much of the field as the others, but due to a concern with what I will call, for very good reasons, "decency" (décence),[22] does so – well – as little as possible.

What constitutes the basis of life, in effect, is that for everything having to do with the relations between men and women, what is called collectivity, it's not working out (ça ne va pas). It's not working out, and the whole world talks about it, and a large part of our activity is taken up with saying so.

Nevertheless, there is nothing serious if not what is organized in another way as discourse. That includes the fact that this relationship, this sexual can mean what "was going to be," "was about to be," or "would have been" if. . . . The French thus moves from an imperfect to a pluperfect (avais entendu, meaning "heard" or "understood," and perhaps even "heeded" or "agreed to" here) and then to a present tense (what I "order" or "am ordering" you to do).

[20] In the French, Lacan specifies here that he is talking about the verb form of foutre by referring to the English verb, "to fuck"; as a noun, foutre means "cum."

[21] This elementary French expression can be translated in a number of other ways as well: "it's no good," "it's not going well," etc.

[22] Décence is a homonym for des sens, meanings.

relationship, insofar as it's not working out, works out anyway (il va quand même) – thanks to a certain number of conventions, prohibitions, and inhibitions that are the effect of language and can only be taken from that fabric and register. There isn't the slightest prediscursive reality, for the very fine reason that what constitutes a collectivity – what I called men, women, and children – means nothing qua prediscursive reality. Men, women, and children are but signifiers.

A man is nothing but a signifier. A woman seeks out a man qua signifier (au titre de signifiant). A man seeks out a woman qua – and this will strike you as odd – that which can only be situated through discourse, since, if what I claim is true – namely, that woman is not-whole – there is always something in her that escapes discourse.

3

What we need to know is what, in a discourse, is produced by the effect of the written. As you perhaps know – you know it in any case if you read what I write – the fact that linguistics has distinguished the signifier and the signified is not the whole story. Perhaps that seems self-evident to you. But it is precisely by considering things to be self-evident that we see nothing of what is right before our eyes, before our eyes concerning the written. Linguistics has not simply distinguished the signified from the signifier. If there is something that can introduce us to the dimension of the written as such, it is the realization that the signified has nothing to do with the ears, but only with reading – the reading of the signifiers we hear.[23] The signified is not what you hear. What you hear is the signifier. The signified is the effect of the signifier.

One can distinguish here something that is but the effect of discourse, of 35 discourse as such – in other words, of something that already functions qua link. Let us take things at the level of a writing (un écrit) that is itself the effect of a discourse, scientific discourse, namely the writing (l'écrit) S, designed to connote the place of the signifier, and s with which the signified is connoted as a place. Place as a function is created only by discourse itself. "Places everyone!"[24] – that functions only in discourse. Anyway, between the two, S and s, there is a bar, $\frac{S}{s}$.

[23] The French here is la lecture de ce qu'on entend de signifiant, which can be translated literally as, "the reading of what one hears qua signifier (or qua signifying)"; the sentences that follow in the text are what allow for the translation I have provided there.

[24] The French here, chacun à sa place, literally means "everyone in his place."

It doesn't look like anything when you write a bar in order to explain things. This word, "explain," is of the utmost importance because there ain't nothing you can understand in a bar, even when it is reserved for signifying negation.[25]

It is very difficult to understand what negation means. If you look at it a bit closely, you realize in particular that there is a wide variety of negations that it is quite impossible to cover with the same concept. The negation of existence, for example, is not at all the same as the negation of totality.[26]

There is something that is even more certain: adding a bar to the notation S and s is already a bit superfluous and even futile, insofar as what it brings out is already indicated by the distance of what is written.[27] The bar, like everything involving what is written, is based only on the following – what is written is not to be understood.

That is why you are not obliged to understand my writings. If you don't understand them, so much the better – that will give you the opportunity to explain them.

It's the same with the bar. The bar is precisely the point at which, in every use of language, writing (l'écrit) may be produced. If, in Saussure's work itself, S is above s, that is, over the bar, it is because the effects of the unconscious have no basis without this bar – that is what I was able to show you in "The Instance of the Letter," included in my Écrits, in a way that is written (qui s'écrit), nothing more.

Indeed, were it not for this bar nothing about language could be explained by linguistics. Were it not for this bar above which there are signifiers that pass, you could not see that signifiers are injected into the signified.[28]

Were there no analytic discourse, you would continue to speak like birdbrains, singing the "current disk" (disque-ourcourant),[29] making the disk go around, that disk that turns because "there's no such thing as a sexual relationship" – a formulation that can only be articulated thanks to the entire [25] See Chapter VII, where Lacan uses a bar over the different "quantifiers" to signify negation.

[26] See Chapter VII, where Lacan introduces the existential and universal quantifiers.

[27] Presumably, the distance between the S and s in the notation $\frac{S}{s}$.

[28] Lacan's French here, vous ne pourriez voir que du signifiant s'injecte dans le signifié, is rendered a bit odd because Lacan doesn't say a signifier or several signifiers, but rather some signifier, in the sense in which we speak in English about "some bread" or "some water," in other words, as an unquantifiable substance. Here, signifier is injected into the signified, apparently like fuel is injected into an engine.

[29] "Disk" (disque) should be understood here primarily in the sense of a phonograph record.

edifice of analytic discourse, and that I have been drumming into you for quite some time.

But drumming it into you, I must nevertheless explain it – it is based only on the written in the sense that the sexual relationship cannot be written (ne peut pas s'écrire). Everything that is written stems from the fact that it 36 will forever be impossible to write, as such, the sexual relationship. It is on that basis that there is a certain effect of discourse, which is called writing.

One could, at a pinch, write x R y, and say x is man, y is woman, and R is the sexual relationship. Why not? The only problem is that it's stupid, because what is based on the signifier function (la fonction de signifiant)[30] of "man" and "woman" are mere signifiers that are altogether related to the "curcurrent" (courcourant)[31] use of language. If there is a discourse that demonstrates that to you, it is certainly analytic discourse, because it brings into play the fact that woman will never be taken up except quoad matrem. Woman serves a function in the sexual relationship only qua mother.

Those are overall truths (vérités massives), but they will lead us further. Thanks to what? Thanks to writing. Writing will not object to this first approximation since it is in this way that writing will show that woman's jouissance is based on a supplementation of this not-whole (une suppléance de ce pas-toute). She finds the cork[32] for this jouissance [based on the fact] that she is not-whole[33] – in other words, that makes her absent from herself somewhere, absent as subject – in the a constituted by her child.

As for x – in other words, what man would be if the sexual relationship could be written in a sustainable way, a way that is sustainable in a discourse – man is but a signifier because where he comes into play as a signifier, he comes in only quoad castrationem, in other words, insofar as he has a relation to phallic jouissance. The upshot being that as soon as a discourse, analytic discourse, seriously took up this question and posited that the precondition of what is written is that it be sustained by a discourse, everything fell apart. Now you'll never be able to write the sexual relationship – write

[30] This ambiguous expression could also arguably be translated as "signifying function" or "function as signifier."

[31] Courcourant involves a doubling of the first syllable of courant, "current" (in all senses of the term), making it a bit singsong-like. Cour alone is courtyard, also suggesting that this is a courtyard or backyard use of language. Cou cou is a sound birds (or birdbrains?) make in French, and a coucou is a cuckoo (bird or clock). Coucou is also what you say to a little baby to say "peek-a-boo!" Courrant means running, giving the additional sense of a use of language that runs (drivels?) on and on. Courcourant is derived from the neologism Lacan provided two paragraphs back, disque-ourcourant, by lopping off the "dis."

[32] Bouchon, which I have translated here as "cork," can also mean "stopper" or "plug"; it seems to put a stop here to this form of jouissance.

[33] Or "this jouissance, which she has owing to the fact of not being whole . . ." or "due to her not being whole . . ."

it with a true writing (écrit), insofar as the written is that aspect of language that is conditioned by a discourse.

4

The letter is, radically speaking, an effect of discourse.

What is nice about what I tell you – don't you agree? – is that it's always the same thing. Not that I repeat myself, that's not the point. It's that what I said before takes on meaning afterward.

The first time, as far as I recall, that I spoke of the letter – it must have been some fifteen years ago, somewhere at Sainte-Anne (Hospital) – I mentioned a fact known to everyone who reads a little, which is not the case for everyone, that a certain Sir Flinders Petrie believed he had discovered that the letters of the Phoenician alphabet existed well before the time of Phoenicia on small Egyptian pottery where they served as manufacturers' marks.
37 That means that the letter first emerged from the market, which is typically an effect of discourse, before anyone dreamt of using letters to do what? Something that has nothing to do with the connotation of the signifier, but that elaborates and perfects it.

We should approach things at the level of the history of each language. It is clear that the letters which upset us so much that we call them, God only knows why, by a different name, "characters," to wit, Chinese letters, emerged from very ancient Chinese discourse in a way that was very different from the way in which our letters emerged. Emerging from analytic discourse, the letters I bring out here have a different value from those that can emerge from set theory. The uses one makes of them differ, but nevertheless – and this is what is of interest – they are not without converging in some respect. Any effect of discourse is good in the sense that it is constituted by the letter.

All of that is but a first sketch that I will have the opportunity to develop by distinguishing the use of letters in algebra from the use of letters in set theory. For the time being, I would simply like to point out the following – the world, the world is in [a state of] decomposition, thank God. We see that the world no longer stands up, because even in scientific discourse it is clear that there isn't the slightest world. As soon as you can add something called a "quark" to atoms and have that become the true thread of scientific discourse, you must realize that we are dealing with something other than a world.

You must sit down and read a little work by writers, not of your era – I won't tell you to read Philippe Sollers, who is unreadable, like me as a matter of fact – but you could read Joyce, for example. You will see therein how language is perfected when it knows how to play with writing.

I can agree that Joyce's work is not readable – it is certainly not translatable into Chinese. What happens in Joyce's work? The signifier stuffs (vient truffer)[34] the signified. It is because the signifiers fit together, combine, and concertina – read Finnegans Wake – that something is produced by way of meaning (comme signifié) that may seem enigmatic, but is clearly what is closest to what we analysts, thanks to analytic discourse, have to read – slips of the tongue (lapsus).[35] It is as slips that they signify something, in other words, that they can be read in an infinite number of different ways. But it is precisely for that reason that they are difficult to read, are read awry, or not read at all. But doesn't this dimension of "being read" (se lire) suffice to show that we are in the register of analytic discourse?

What is at stake in analytic discourse is always the following – you give a different reading to the signifiers that are enunciated (ce qui s'énonce de signifiant) than what they signify.[36]

To make myself understood, I will take a reference you read in the great book of the world. Consider the flight of a bee. A bee goes from flower to 38 flower gathering nectar. What you discover is that, at the tip of its feet, the bee transports pollen from one flower onto the pistil of another flower. That is what you read in the flight of the bee. In the flight of a bird that flies close to the ground – you call that a flight, but in reality it is a group at a certain level – you read that there is going to be a storm. But do they read? Does the bee read that it serves a function in the reproduction of phanerogamic plants? Does the bird read the portent of fortune, as people used to say – in other words, the tempest?

That is the whole question. It cannot be ruled out, after all, that a swallow reads the tempest, but it is not terribly certain either.

In your analytic discourse, you assume that the subject of the unconscious knows how to read. And this business of the unconscious is nothing other than that. Not only do you assume that it knows how to read, but you assume that it can learn how to read.

The only problem is that what you teach it to read has absolutely nothing to do, in any case, with what you can write of it.

January 9, 1973

[34] Truffer literally means to garnish with truffles; figuratively it means to stuff, lard, fill, or pepper.

[35] Lapsus is the usual French term for the broad Freudian category, "parapraxis," including slips of the tongue and of the pen, forgetting, and so on.

[36] Lacan's complicated phraseology would have us translate: "you give a different reading to what is enunciated qua signifier than what it signifies."

39

IV

Love and the signifier

THE OTHER SEX.[1]
CONTINGENCY OF THE SIGNIFIER, ROUTINE OF THE SIGNIFIED.
THE END OF THE WORLD AND THE "PARA-BEING."
LOVE MAKES UP FOR THE ABSENCE OF THE SEXUAL RELATIONSHIP.
THE ONES.

What can I still (encore) have to say to you after all the time this has lasted, without having all the effects that I would like? Well, it is precisely because it doesn't that I never run out of things to say.

Nevertheless, since one cannot say it all,[2] and for good reason, I am reduced to this narrow course, which is such that at every moment I must be careful not to slip back into what has already been done on the basis of what has been said.

That is why today I am going to try, once again, to stay this difficult ground-breaking course, whose horizon is strange, qualified, as it is, by my title – Encore.

1

The first time I spoke to you, I stated that jouissance of the Other – the Other I said to be symbolized by the body – is not a sign of love.[3]

Naturally, that goes over well, because you feel that it is at the same level as what I've said before (le précédent dire) and does not deviate therefrom.

Nevertheless, certain terms contained therein warrant commentary. Jouissance is exactly what I try to make present through this very act of speaking (par ce dire même). "The Other" here is more than ever thrown into question.

On the one hand, the Other must be newly hammered out or recast for it to take on its full meaning, its complete resonance. On the other hand, it

[1] L'Autre sexe would normally be translated into English as "the opposite sex"; here, however, due to the capital O, I have translated it as "the Other sex." It should be kept in mind, nevertheless, that Lacan is playing off the two different meanings.

[2] Tout dire also means to "say everything."

[3] The exact quote from Chapter I is: "Jouissance of the Other, . . . , of the body of the Other who symbolizes the Other, is not the sign of love."

is important to put it forward as a term that is based on the fact that it is me who is speaking, and who can speak only from where I am, identified with a pure signifier. Man and a woman, as I said last time, are nothing but signifiers. They derive their function from this, from saying (dire) as a distinct incarnation of sex.

The Other, in my terminology, can thus only be the Other sex. 40

What is the status of this Other? What is its position with respect to this return on the basis of which (de quoi)[4] the sexual relationship is realized, namely, a jouissance, that analytic discourse has precipitated out as the function of the phallus, whose enigma remains utter and complete, since that function is articulated therein only on the basis of facts of absence?

But is that to say that what is at stake here is, as people all too quickly thought they could translate it, the signifier of what is lacking in the signifier? That is what this year ought to put an end to, and it should say what the function of the phallus is in analytic discourse. For the time being, I will say that what I put forward last time as the function of the bar is not unrelated to the phallus.

There is still the second part of the sentence linked to the first part by an "is not" – "is not the sign of love." And this year I shall have to articulate what serves as the linchpin of everything that has been instituted on the basis of analytic experience: love.

People have been talking about nothing else for a long time. Need I emphasize the fact that it is at the very heart of philosophical discourse? That is precisely what should make us suspicious. Last time, I had you catch a glimpse of philosophical discourse in its true light – as a variation on the master's discourse. I also said that love aims at being, namely, at what slips away most in language – being that, a moment later, was going to be,[5] or being that, due precisely to having been, gave rise to surprise. And I was also able to add that that being is perhaps very close to the signifier m'être,[6] is perhaps being at the helm (l'être au commandement),[7] and that therein lies the strangest of illusions (leurres). Doesn't that also command us to question in what sense the sign can be distinguished from the signifier?

Hence we have four points – jouissance, the Other, the sign, and love.

[4] The French, de quoi (which I have translated here as "on the basis of which"), is quite vague and could be translated in a number of other ways, including "in relation to which," "from which," "by which," etc.

[5] Allait être (was going to be) could also be translated as "would have been."

[6] The French allows us to read either "the signifier m'être" or "the m'être signifier," m'être being a homonym of maître, master (thus, "the master signifier").

[7] In a race, the person winning is said d'être au commandement, that is, to be "leading," "out in front," "heading the pack," or "first." However, in the last chapter, Lacan was more clearly referring to being at someone's orders.

Let us read what was put forward at a time when the discourse of love was admittedly that of being – let us open Richard of Saint Victor's book on the divine trinity.[8] We begin with being, being insofar as it is conceived – excuse me for slipping writing (l'écrit) into my speech – as "be-ternal-ing" (l'êtrernel),[9] following Aristotle's elaboration, which is still so moderate, and under the influence, no doubt, of the eruption of the "I am what I am," which is the statement of Judaic truth.

When the idea of being – up until then simply approached or glancingly touched on – culminates in this violent ripping away from the function of time by the statement of the eternal, strange consequences ensue. There is, says Richard of Saint Victor, being that is intrinsically eternal,[10] being that is eternal but not intrinsically so, and being that is not eternal and does not possess its fragile or even inexistent being intrinsically. But there is no such thing as non-eternal being that is intrinsically. Of the four subdivisions that are produced by the alternation of affirmation and negation of "eternal" and "intrinsically," that is the only one that seems to Richard of Saint Victor to have to be ruled out.

41 Doesn't that have to do with the signifier? For no signifier is produced (se produit) as eternal.

That is no doubt what, rather than qualifying it as arbitrary, Saussure could have formulated – it would have been better to qualify the signifier with the category of contingency. The signifier repudiates the category of the eternal and, nevertheless, oddly enough (singulièrement), it is intrinsically.

Isn't it clear to you that it participates, to employ a Platonic approach, in that nothing on the basis of which something entirely original was made ex nihilo, as creationism (l'idée créationiste) tells us?

[8] Book III of The Trinity can be found in English in Richard of St. Victor: The Twelve Patriarchs, The Mystical Ark, and Book Three of the Trinity, translated by Grover A. Zinn (New York: Paulist Press, 1979). Complete editions can be found in French: La Trinité, translated by Gaston Salet (Paris: Sources Chrétiennes, 1969), and De Trinitate: texte critique, translated by Jean Ribaillier (Paris: 1958).

[9] L'êtrernel is a conflation of être (being) and éternel (eternal), and perhaps of lettre (letter) as well. L'Éternel is a term for God.

[10] The expression I am rendering as "intrinsically" is de lui-même, literally "by itself" or "from itself" (as opposed to "because of someone or something else"). In certain contexts, it can take on the sense of "self-generated," "self-caused," or "self-based," and seems quite clearly to refer back to Aristotle's καθ' αὐτό. Terence Irwin and Gail Fine, in their translation of Aristotle's Physics (254b12–30) in Aristotle: Selections (Indianapolis: Hackett, 1995), provide the locution "by its own agency." Other possible translations include "in its own right," "in itself," "essentially" (as opposed to "coincidentally"), and "that by virtue of which." See Aristotle's extensive discussion of the term in Metaphysics, Book V, Chapter 18 (1022a14–36). Grover A. Zinn, in his translation of Book III of The Trinity, renders it simply as "from himself" (p. 373).

Isn't that something that appears (apparaisse) – insofar as your laziness (laparesse) can be shaken up by any sort of apparition – in the book of Genesis? Genesis recounts nothing other than the creation, from nothing, in effect – of what? – of nothing but signifiers.

As soon as this creation emerges, it is articulated on the basis of the naming of what is. Isn't that creation in its essence? While Aristotle cannot help but enunciate that, if ever there was anything, it had always been there, isn't what is at stake in creationism a creation on the basis of nothing – thus on the basis of the signifier?

Isn't that what we find in that which, being reflected in a world view, was enunciated as the Copernican revolution?

2

I have been throwing in doubt for a long time what Freud thought he could say about the said revolution. The hysteric's discourse taught him about that other substance, which consists entirely in the fact that there are signifiers (il y a du signifiant). Having apprehended the effect of the signifier in the hysteric's discourse, he managed to turn the latter by the quarter turn that made it into analytic discourse.[11]

The very notion of a quarter turn evokes revolution, but certainly not in the sense in which revolution is subversion. On the contrary, what turns – that is what is called revolution – is destined, by its very statement (énoncé), to evoke a return.

Assuredly, we have by no means reached the completion of this return, since this quarter turn is being made in a very painful way. But it would not be an exaggeration to say that if there was, indeed, a revolution somewhere, it was certainly not at the level of Copernicus. The hypothesis had been advanced for many years that the sun was perhaps the center around which things revolved. But so what? What was of import to mathematicians was certainly the point of origin of that which turns. According to Aristotle, the eternal circling (virée)[12] of the stars in the last of the spheres presupposed an unmoved sphere, which was the first cause of the movement of those that revolve. If the stars revolve, it is because the earth itself turns. It was already wondrous that, on the basis of this circling, revolution, or eternal 42 turning of the stellar sphere, there were men who forged other spheres, conceiving the so-called Ptolemaic system, and made the planets revolve –

[11] See Chapter II, section 1, where analytic discourse can be seen to result from the hysteric's discourse if each of the elements is rotated ninety degrees to the right.

[12] Virée generally means "swerve," "curve," or "veering."

planets that, with respect to the earth, are in the ambiguous position of coming and going in a zigzag pattern – revolve in accordance with an oscillatory movement.

Wasn't it an extraordinary tour de force to have conceptualized the movement of the spheres? Copernicus merely added the remark that perhaps the movement of the intermediary spheres could be expressed differently. Whether or not the earth lay at the center was not what was most important to him.

The Copernican revolution is by no means a revolution. If the center of a sphere is assumed, in a discourse that is merely analogical, to constitute the pivotal point (point-maître), the fact of changing this pivotal point, of having it be occupied by the earth or the sun, involves nothing that in itself subverts what the signifier "center" intrinsically (de lui-même) preserves. Man – what is designated by this term, which is nothing but that which makes (things) signify – was far from ever having been shaken by the discovery that the earth is not at the center. He had no problem substituting the sun for it.

Of course it is now obvious that the sun is not a center either, and that it is strolling through a space whose status is ever more precariously established. What remains at the center is the fine routine that is such that the signified always retains the same meaning (sens) in the final analysis. That meaning is provided by the sense each of us has of being part of his world, that is, of his little family and of everything that revolves around it. Each of you – I am speaking even for the leftists – you are more attached to it than you care to know and would do well to sound the depths of your attachment. A certain number of biases are your daily fare and limit the import of your insurrections to the shortest term, to the term, quite precisely, that gives you no discomfort – they certainly don't change your world view, for that remains perfectly spherical. The signified finds its center wherever you take it. And, unless things change radically, it is not analytic discourse – which is so difficult to sustain in its decentering and has not yet made its entrance into common consciousness – that can in any way subvert anything whatsoever.

Nevertheless, if you will allow me to make use of this Copernican reference, I will stress what is effective about it. It's not the fact of changing the center.

It turns. That fact still has a great deal of value for us, as reduced as it may be in the final analysis, motivated only by the fact that the earth turns and that it therefore seems to us that it is the celestial sphere that turns. The earth continues to turn and that has all sorts of effects, for example, the fact that you count your age in years. The subversion, if it existed somewhere, at some time, was not that of having changed the point around which it circles (point de virée) – it is that of having replaced "it turns" with "it falls." 43

What is crucial, as some people have noticed, is not Copernicus, but more specifically Kepler, due to the fact that in his work it does not turn in the same way – it turns in an ellipse, and that already throws into question the function of the center. That toward which it falls in Kepler's work is a point of the ellipse that is called a focus, and in the symmetrical point there is nothing. That is assuredly a corrective to the image of the center. But "it falls" only takes on the weight of subversion when it leads to what? To this and nothing more:

$$F = g\frac{mm'}{d^2}.$$

It is in this writing (écrit), in what is summarized in these five little letters that can be written in the palm of your hand, and one number to boot, that consists what we unduly attribute to Copernicus. This is what rips us away from the imaginary function – nevertheless grounded in the real – of revolution.

What is produced in the articulation of the new discourse that emerges as analytic discourse is that the function of the signifier is taken as the starting point, for what the signifier brings with it by way of meaning effects is far from accepted on the basis of the lived experience of the very fact.

It is on the basis of meaning effects that the structuring of which I reminded you was constructed. For quite some time it seemed natural for a world to be constituted whose correlate, beyond it, was being itself, being taken as eternal. This world conceived of as the whole (tout), with what this word implies by way of limitation, regardless of the openness we grant it, remains a conception[13] – a serendipitous term here – a view, gaze, or imaginary hold. And from that results the following, which remains strange, that some-one – a part of this world – is at the outset assumed to be able to take cognizance of it. This One finds itself therein in a state that we can call existence, for how could it be the basis of the "taking cognizance" if it did not exist? Therein has always lain the impasse, the vacillation resulting from the cosmology that consists in the belief in a world. On the contrary, isn't there something in analytic discourse that can introduce us to the following: that every subsistence or persistence of the world as such must be abandoned?

[13] Thus far, I have been translating conception du monde as "world view"; here conception appears alone. Conception has the same double meaning in French as in English: "view (or notion)" and "inception of pregnancy."

Language – the language (langue) forged by philosophical discourse – is such that, as you see, I cannot but constantly slip back into this world, into this presupposition of a substance that is permeated[14] with the function of being.

44

3

Following the thread of analytic discourse goes in the direction of nothing less than breaking up anew (rebriser), inflecting, marking with its own camber – a camber that could not even be sustained as that of lines of force – that which produces the break (faille) or discontinuity. Our recourse, in llanguage (lalangue),[15] is to that which shatters it (la brise).[16] Hence nothing seems to better constitute the horizon of analytic discourse than the use made of the letter by mathematics. The letter reveals in discourse what is called – not by chance or without necessity – grammar. Grammar is that aspect of language that is revealed only in writing (à l'écrit).

Beyond language, this effect, which is produced by being based only on writing, is certainly the ideal of mathematics. Now to refuse to refer to writing (l'écrit) is to forbid oneself what can actually be articulated using (de) all the effects of language. This articulation occurs in what results from language regardless of what we do – namely, a presumed shy of and beyond (en deçà et au-delà).

We certainly sense that this shy of is no more than an intuitive reference. And yet this presupposition cannot be eliminated because language, in its meaning effect, is never but beside the referent.[17] Isn't it thus true that language imposes being upon us and obliges us, as such, to admit that we never have anything by way of being (de l'être)?

What we must get used to is substituting the "para-being" (par-être) – the being "para," being beside – for the being that would take flight.[18]

I say the "para-being" (par-être), and not the "appearing" (paraître),[19]

[14] The term Lacan uses here, imprégnée, also means "impregnated," but primarily in the sense of saturated, not of fertilization.

[15] The French here, lalangue, is a term Lacan creates simply by putting together the feminine article la with the noun langue (language, but specifically spoken language, as in tongue). Lacan discusses what he means by lalangue in the course of this Seminar (as well as elsewhere); very roughly speaking, it has to do with the acoustic level of language, the level at which polysemy is possible due to the existence of homonyms (like those Lacan plays on throughout this Seminar). It is the level at which an infant (or songwriter) may endlessly repeat one syllable of a word (for example, "la la la"), the level at which language may "stutter" – hence the translation provided here, borrowed from Russell Grigg, "llanguage."

[16] La here could refer to "break," "discontinuity," or "llanguage."

[17] The French here, à côté du référent, could also be translated as "alongside the referent."

[18] Fuir (to take flight) also means "to leak."

[19] The neologism Lacan creates here, par-être, is pronounced exactly like paraître, which means "to appear" or "appearing." Two sentences further on, Lacan as the phenomenon has always been called – that beyond which there is supposedly that thing, the noumenon. The latter has, in effect, led us, led us to all sorts of opacifications[20] that can be referred to precisely as obscurantism. It is at the very point at which paradoxes spring up regarding everything that manages to be formulated as the effect of writing (effet d'écrit) that being presents itself, always presents itself, by para-being.[21] We should learn to conjugate that appropriately: I par-am, you par-are, he par-is, we par-are, and so on and so forth.

It is in relation to the para-being that we must articulate what makes up for (supplée au)[22] the sexual relationship qua nonexistent. It is clear that, in everything that approaches it, language merely manifests its inadequacy.

What makes up for the sexual relationship is, quite precisely, love.

The Other, the Other as the locus of truth, is the only place, albeit an irreducible place, that we can give to the term "divine being," God, to call him by his name. God (Dieu) is the locus where, if you will allow me this wordplay, the dieu – the dieur – the dire, is produced. With a trifling change, the dire constitutes Dieu.[23] And as long as things are said, the God hypothesis will persist.

That is why, in the end, only theologians can be truly atheistic, namely, 45 those who speak of God.

There is no other way to be an atheist, except to hide one's head in one's arms in the name of I know not what fear, as if this God had ever manifested any kind of presence whatsoever. Nevertheless, it is impossible to say anything without immediately making Him subsist in the form of the Other.

That is quite evident in even the slightest movement of something I can't stand, for the best of reasons, that is, History.

People do History precisely in order to make us believe that it has some intends both meanings when he says that "being presents itself, always presents itself, by par-être," i.e., by appearing and being beside (or alongside).

[20] The French, opacification, is originally a medical term for the decrease in transparency of the cornea or crystalline lens. Lacan plays in this sentence on the similar French pronunciation of noumêne ("noumenon") and nous mène ("leads us").

[21] Par-être could also be rendered by the neologistic "ap-be-aring beside" or "appbesiding."

[22] The French, supplée au rapport sexuel, could more literally be translated as "supplements the sexual relationship." The end of the next sentence could be more literally translated as "language manifests itself merely in (or on the basis of) its inadequacy."

[23] The French, Pour un rien, le dire ça fait Dieu, is far more polysemic than my translation here; by translating it as "For a nothing, the saying amounts to God," one can see speech's godlike power to create ex nihilo. Fait here can be either "creates" or "plays the part of," "turns into" or "becomes." Dieur, in the last sentence, is a neologism, but since it is constructed like many other French terms, it can literally be understood to mean "sayer" or "speaker" (thus, the speaking god or the speaker as god).

sort of meaning. On the contrary, the first thing we must do is begin from the following: we are confronted with a saying (dire), the saying (dire) of another person who recounts his stupidities, embarrassments, inhibitions, and emotions (émois).[24] What is it that we must read therein? Nothing but the effects of those instances of saying (dires). We see in what sense these effects agitate, stir things up, and bother speaking beings. Of course, for that to lead to something, it must serve them, and it does serve them, by God, in working things out, accommodating themselves, and managing all the same – in a bumbling, stumbling sort of way – to give a shadow of life to the feeling known as love.

It must, it really must, it must last longer (encore). It must, with the help of this feeling, lead, in the end – as people have seen who, with respect to all of this, have taken their precautions under the aegis of the Church – to the reproduction of bodies.

But isn't it possible that language may have other effects than to lead people by the nose to reproduce yet again (encore), in the body to body (en corps à corps),[25] and in incarnated bodies (en corps incarné)?

There is another effect of language, which is writing (l'écrit).

4

We have seen changes in writing (l'écrit) since language has existed. What is written are letters, and letters have not always been fabricated in the same way. On that subject, people do history, the history of writing, and people rack their brains imagining what purpose the Mayan and Aztec pictographs might have served and, a bit further back in time, the pebbles of the Mas d'Azil[26] – what could those funny sort of dice have been, and what kind of games did they play with them?

To raise such questions is the habitual function of History. One should say – above all, don't touch that H,[27] the initial of History. That would be a fine way of bringing people back to the first of the letters, the one to which I confine my attention, the letter A. The Bible begins, by the way, only with the letter B – it left behind the letter A so that I could take charge of it.

46 There is a lot to learn here, not by studying the pebbles of the Mas d'Azil, [24] On the distinctions Lacan draws between embarras, empêchement, and émoi, see Seminar X, Anxiety.

[25] In French, en corps is pronounced exactly like encore. Corps à corps is usually translated as "hand to hand" (combat, for example).

[26] The Mas d'Azil is an area in southern France where artifacts from the Azilian industry, a tool tradition of Late Paleolithic and Early Mesolithic Europe, have been found. Art seems to have been confined to geometric drawings made on pebbles using red and black pigments.

[27] The letter H is pronounced exactly like hache in French, which means "ax" or "hatchet."

nor even, as I formerly did for my receptive audience (bon public),[28] my receptive audience of analysts, by seeking out the notch on the stone to explain the unary trait[29] – that was within their ken – but by looking more closely at what mathematicians have been doing with letters since, scorning a number of things, they began, in the most well grounded of fashions, under the name of set theory, to notice that one could approach the One in a way other than the intuitive, fusional, amorous way.

"We are but one." Everyone knows, of course, that two have never become but one, but nevertheless "we are but one." The idea of love begins with that. It is truly the crudest way of providing the sexual relationship, that term that manifestly slips away, with its signified.

The beginning of wisdom should involve beginning to realize that it is in that respect that old father Freud broke new ground. I myself began with that because it affected me quite a bit myself. It could affect anyone, moreover, couldn't it, to realize that love, while it is true that it has a relationship with the One, never makes anyone leave himself behind.[30] If that, all of that and nothing but that, is what Freud said by introducing the function of narcissistic love, everyone senses and sensed that the problem is how there can be love for an other.

The One everyone talks about all the time is, first of all, a kind of mirage of the One you believe yourself to be. Not to say that that is the whole horizon. There are as many Ones as you like – they are characterized by the fact that none of them resemble any of the others in any way – see the first hypothesis in the Parmenides.

Set theory bursts onto the scene by positing the following: let us speak of things as One that are strictly unrelated to each other. Let us put together objects of thought, as they are called, objects of the world, each of which counts as one. Let us assemble these absolutely heterogeneous things, and let us grant ourselves the right to designate the resulting assemblage by a letter. That is how set theory expresses itself at the outset, that theory, for example, that I mentioned last time in relation to Nicolas Bourbaki.

You let slip by the fact that I said that the letter designates an assemblage. That is what is printed in the text of the definitive edition to which the authors – as you know, there are several of them – ended up consenting. They are very careful to say that letters designate assemblages. Therein lies their timidity and their error – letters constitute (font)[31] assemblages. They [28] While bon public literally means "good audience," it also implies that they are receptive to or appreciate whatever Lacan says (no matter how absurd).

[29] See Seminar IX, Identification.

[30] Sortir quiconque de soi-même could also be translated as "go beyond himself."

[31] Font here can also mean "create" or "play the part of."

don't designate assemblages, they are assemblages. They are taken as (comme) functioning like (comme) these assemblages themselves.

You see that by still preserving this "like" (comme), I am staying within the bounds of what I put forward when I say that the unconscious is structured like a language. I say like so as not to say – and I come back to this all 47 the time – that the unconscious is structured by a language. The unconscious is structured like the assemblages in question in set theory, which are like letters.[32]

Since what is at stake for us is to take language as (comme) that which functions in order to make up for the absence of the sole part of the real that cannot manage to be formed from being (se former de l'être) – namely, the sexual relationship – what basis can we find in merely reading letters? It is in the very play of mathematical writing (l'écrit) that we must find the compass reading toward which to head in order to draw from this practice – from this new social link, analytic discourse, that emerges and spreads in such a singular fashion – what can be drawn from it regarding the function of language, that language in which we put our faith in order for this discourse to have effects – middling, no doubt, but tolerable enough – so that this discourse can prop up and complete the other discourses.

For some time now, it has been clear that university discourse must be written "uni-vers-Cythera,"[33] since it must teach sex education. We shall see what that will lead to. We certainly shouldn't try to block it. The idea that something may be imparted regarding this bit (point) of knowledge – which is placed (se pose) exactly in the authoritarian situation of semblance – that can improve relations between the sexes is certainly destined to bring a smile to an analyst's face. But after all, who knows?

As I already said, the angel's smile is the stupidest of smiles, and one must thus never brag about it. But it is clear that the very idea of demonstrating something related to sex education on the blackboard does not seem, from the vantage point of the analyst's discourse, to promise much in the way of fortunate encounters or happiness.

If there is something in my Écrits that shows that my fine orientation, since it is of that fine orientation that I try to convince you, is not such a recent development, it is the fact that right after a war, where nothing obviously seemed to promise a pretty future, I wrote "Logical Time and the Assertion of Anticipated Certainty."[34] One can quite easily read therein – if [32] There is a problem here in the French text; given the context, I have assumed that the word qui should be inserted between ensembles and sont (in L'inconscient est structuré comme les assemblages dont il s'agit dans la théorie des ensembles sont comme les lettres).

[33] Cythera (or Kithira) is the southernmost of the Ionian Islands in Greece, and is reputed to be the island of Aphrodite, an island of love and pleasure.

[34] Translated into English by Bruce Fink and Marc Silver, in Newsletter of the Freudian Field 2 (1988), pp. 4–22.

one writes and not only if one has a good ear – that it is already little a that thetisizes the function of haste. In that article, I highlighted the fact that something like intersubjectivity can lead to a salutary solution (issue). But what warrants a closer look is what each of the subjects sustains (supporte), not insofar as he is one among others, but insofar as he is, in relation to the two others, what is at stake in their thinking. Each intervenes in this ternary only as the object a that he is in the gaze of the others.

In other words, there are three of them, but in reality, there are two plus a. This two plus a, from the standpoint of a, can be reduced, not to the two others, but to a One plus a. You know, moreover, that I have already used these functions to try to represent to you the inadequacy of the relationship between the One and the Other, and that I have already provided as a basis for this little a the irrational number known as the golden number.[35] It is insofar as, starting from little a,[36] the two others are taken as One plus a, 48 that what can lead to an exit in haste functions.

This identification, which is produced in a ternary articulation, is grounded in the fact that in no case can two as such serve as a basis. Between two, whatever they may be, there is always the One and the Other, the One and the a, and the Other cannot in any way be taken as a One.

It is insofar as something brutal is played out in writing (l'écrit) – namely, the taking as ones of as many ones as we like – that the impasses that are revealed thereby are, by themselves, a possible means of access to being for us and a possible reduction of the function of that being in love.

I want to end by showing in what respect the sign can be distinguished from the signifier.

The signifier, as I have said, is characterized by the fact that it represents a subject to another signifier. What is involved in the sign? The cosmic theory of knowledge or world view has always made a big deal of the famous example of smoke that cannot exist without fire.[37] So why shouldn't I put forward what I think about it? Smoke can just as easily be the sign of a smoker. And, in essence, it always is. There is no smoke that is not a sign of a smoker. Everyone knows that, if you see smoke when you approach a deserted island, you immediately say to yourself that there is a good chance there is someone there who knows how to make fire. Until things change considerably, it will be another man. Thus, a sign is not the sign of some thing, but of an effect that is what is presumed as such by a functioning of the signifier.

[35] On the golden number, see, in particular, Seminar XIV, The Logic of Fantasy, and Seminar XVI, From one Other to the other.

[36] The French, du petit a, could mean "from the standpoint of little a," "on the basis of little a," and other things as well.

[37] Lacan is referring here to the proverb, il n'y a pas de fumée sans feu, "there's no smoke without fire."

That effect is what Freud teaches us about, and it is the starting point of analytic discourse, namely, the subject.

The subject is nothing other than what slides in a chain of signifiers, whether he knows which signifier he is the effect of or not. That effect – the subject – is the intermediary effect between what characterizes a signifier and another signifier, namely, the fact that each of them, each of them is an element. We know of no other basis by which the One may have been introduced into the world if not by the signifier as such, that is, the signifier insofar as we learn to separate it from its meaning effects.

In love what is aimed at is the subject, the subject as such, insofar as he is presumed in an articulated sentence, in something that is organized or can be organized on the basis of a whole life.

A subject, as such, doesn't have much to do with jouissance. But, on the other hand, his sign is capable of arousing desire. Therein lies the mainspring of love. The course I will try to continue to steer in our next classes will show you where love and sexual jouissance meet up.

January 16, 1973

V

Aristotle and Freud: the other satisfaction

ARISTOTLE'S HEADACHE (TRACAS).
THE DEFICIENCY OF JOUISSANCE AND THE SATISFACTION OF BLAH-BLAH.
DEVELOPMENT, THE HYPOTHESIS OF MASTERY.
JOUISSANCE IS INAPPROPRIATE TO THE SEXUAL RELATIONSHIP.

"All the needs of speaking beings are contaminated by the fact of being involved in an other satisfaction" – underline the last three words – "that those needs may not live up to."[1]

This first sentence, which I wrote down this morning when I woke up so that you would write it down, sweeps away the opposition between an other satisfaction and needs – assuming this term ["needs"], which people so often resort to, can be so easily grasped, since, after all, it can only be grasped by not living up to (faire défaut à) that other satisfaction.

The other satisfaction is, as you must realize,[2] what is satisfied at the level of the unconscious – insofar as something is said there and is not said there, if it is true that it is structured like a language.

Here I am coming back to something I have been referring to for some time, namely, the jouissance on which that other satisfaction depends, the one[3] that is based on language.

1

In dealing, a long time ago, a very long time ago indeed, with the ethics of psychoanalysis, I began with nothing less than Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics.

That can be read. There is only one problem for a certain number of you here, and that is that it cannot be read in French. It is manifestly untranslat-

[1] Lacan's French here, à quoi ils peuvent faire défaut, is quite ambiguous; it could suggest that those needs may come up short as regards that other satisfaction, not live up to it, or default on it.

[2] The French here, vous devez l'entendre, suggests that Lacan expects us to hear, realize, or grasp what is to follow in the sentence from the very expression "the other satisfaction" (and perhaps from the general theme of the Seminar thus far).

[3] Lacan does not repeat the noun, jouissance, here. Instead he simply says celle ("the one"), which could refer either to jouissance or the other satisfaction.

able. A long time ago, the Garnier publishing company came out with something that might have made me believe there was a translation, by someone named Voilquin. He was an academic, obviously. It's not his fault if Greek cannot be translated into French. Things have gotten condensed 50 in such a way that Garnier, which, moreover, has since merged with Flammarion, no longer gives you anything but the French text – I must say that publishers infuriate me. You all notice then, when you read it without the Greek on opposite pages, that you can't make head nor tail of it. It is, strictly speaking, unintelligible.

"All art and all research, like all action and all reflected deliberation" – what relation could there possibly be among those four things? – "tend, it seems, toward some good. Thus people have sometimes had good reason to define the good as that towards which one tends in all circumstances. Nevertheless" – and this comes out of the blue, not having yet been discussed – "it seems that there is a difference between ends."[4]

I challenge anyone to be able to clear away this thick morass without abundant commentary referring to the Greek text. It seems quite impossible that the text could sound like this simply because we have but badly taken notes. After a while, a light bulb flashes on in the heads of certain commentators – it dawns on them that, if they are obliged to work so hard, maybe there's a reason for it. Aristotle need not be unthinkable at all – I'll come back to this point.

In my own case, what wound up being written – that is, typed up on the basis of the stenography[5] – concerning what I had said about ethics seemed more than utilizable by the people who were, nevertheless, simultaneously engaged in pointing me out to the attention of the Internationale de psychanalyse[6] with the result that is well known. They would have liked to see preserved, all the same, my reflections on what psychoanalysis brings with it by way of ethics. It would have been sheer profit [for them] – I would have sunk to the bottom while The Ethics of Psychoanalysis would have stayed afloat. That's an example of the fact that calculation is not enough –

[4] The passage of which Lacan is quoting the French translation is the very first paragraph of the Nicomachean Ethics (1094a); here is the text of a very recent English translation of the passage: "Every craft and every investigation, and likewise every action and decision, seems to aim at some good; hence the good has been well described as that at which everything aims. However, there is an apparent difference among the ends aimed at" (Aristotle: Selections, translated by Terence Irwin and Gail Fine [Indianapolis: Hackett, 1995], p. 347).

[5] A stenographer began to transcribe Lacan's seminars starting in 1952. Lacan had, in fact, begun giving his seminar two years before that, but no stenographer was present and only a few notes taken by Lacan's students remain.

[6] Lacan seems to be deliberately distorting the name of the International Psychoanalytical Association (IPA), generally known in French as the Association psychanalytique internationale; Lacan's name for it evokes the communist Internationals. Lacan was essentially forced out of the IPA in 1963, three years after he gave Seminar VII, The Ethics of Psychoanalysis (1959–1960).

I stopped my Ethics from being published. I refused to allow it to come out because I'm not going to try to convince people who want nothing to do with me. One must not convince (convaincre). What is proper to psychoanalysis is not to vanquish (vaincre), regardless of whether people are assholes (con) or not.[7]

It wasn't at all a bad seminar, in the end. At the time, someone who did not in any way participate in the calculation I just mentioned, wrote it up as he could, making an honest, wholehearted effort. He made it into a written text, a written text by him. He hadn't even thought of stealing it from me, and he would have published it like that if I had been willing. But I wasn't. Today, of all the seminars that someone else is going to bring out, it is perhaps the only one I will rewrite myself and make into a written text. I really should do one, all the same. Why not pick that one?

There's no reason not to put oneself to the test, not to see how others before Freud saw the terrain in which he constituted his field. It is another way of experiencing what is involved, namely, that this terrain is unthinkable except with the help of the instruments with which we operate, and that the only instruments by which accounts are conveyed are writings. A very simple test makes this clear – reading the Nicomachean Ethics in the French translation, you understand nothing in it, of course, but no less than 51 in what I tell you, and thus it suffices all the same.

Aristotle is no more comprehensible than what I talk to you about. It is even less comprehensible because he stirs up more things and things that are further from us. But it is clear that the other satisfaction I was talking about earlier is exactly the satisfaction that can be seen to emerge from what? Well, my good friends, there's no escaping it if you force yourself to look at it closely (au pied du truc)[8] – from the universals: the Good, Truth, and Beauty.

But the fact that there are these three specifications gives an air of pathos to the approach adopted by certain texts, those that are "authorized," with the meaning I give that term when placed in quotes, namely, those that are bequeathed to us under an author's name. That is what happens with certain texts that come to us from what I think twice about calling a very ancient culture – it's not culture.

Culture, insofar as it is distinct from society, doesn't exist. Culture is the [7] In the present context, un con means "an idiot," "an asshole," "a jerk," and so on; as an adjective, con means "stupid," "idiotic," etc. In playing on the words vaincre and convaincre, Lacan is saying that, in psychoanalysis, there is no point trying to win over or convince jerks.

[8] Lacan has modified here the usual French expression être au pied du mur, "to be up against it," or "with one's back to the wall," by saying si vous vous mettez au pied du truc. That implies, it seems to me, putting yourself up against it, but also evokes the expression, prendre quelque chose au pied de la lettre, "to take something literally."

fact that it has a hold on us (ça nous tient). We no longer have it on our backs, except in the form of vermin, because we don't know what to do with it, except to get ourselves deloused. I recommend that you keep it, because it tickles and wakes you up. That will awaken your feelings that tend rather to become a bit deadened[9] under the influence of ambient conditions, in other words, due to what others who come afterward will call your culture. It will have become culture for them because you will have already been six feet under for a long time and, with you, everything that you sustain qua social link. In the final analysis, there's nothing but that, the social link. I designate it with the term "discourse" because there's no other way to designate it once we realize that the social link is instated only by anchoring itself in the way in which language is situated over and etched into what the place is crawling with, namely, speaking beings.

We shouldn't be astonished by the fact that former discourses – and there will be others to follow – are no longer thinkable to us or thinkable only with great difficulty. Just as the discourse I am trying to bring to light is not immediately accessible to your understanding, similarly, from where we stand, it is not very easy to understand Aristotle's discourse. But is that a reason why it should no longer be thinkable? It is quite clear that it is thinkable. It is only when we imagine that Aristotle means something that we worry about what he is encompassing. What is he catching in his net, in his network? What is he drawing out of it? What is he handling? What is he dealing with? What is he struggling with? What is he maintaining? What is he working on? What is he pursuing?

Obviously, in the first four lines [of Aristotle's Ethics] that I read to you, you hear words, and you assume they mean something, but naturally you don't know what. "All art, all research, all action" – what does all of that 52 mean? It's because Aristotle threw in a lot of stuff after that, and because it comes down to us in printed form after having been copied and recopied for a long time, that we assume there must be something there that grabs one (fait prise). That is when we raise the question, the only question – at what level did such things satisfy them?

It makes little difference what use was made of them at the time. We know that they were passed down and that there were volumes of Aristotle's work. That disconcerts us, and it does so precisely because the question "At what level did such things satisfy them?" is translatable only as follows: "At what level might a certain jouissance have been to blame?"[10] In other words, why – why did he get so worked up (se tracassait)?

[9] The French term Lacan uses here, abrutis, can also be translated as "moronic" or "idiotic."

[10] The French term, faute, recalls the faire défaut used at the very beginning of this lecture, and can mean "sin," "fault," "error," and so on. In the expression

You heard me right – failing, deficiency (faute, défaut),[11] something that isn't working out (qui ne va pas). Something skids off track in what is manifestly aimed at, and then it immediately starts up with the good and happiness. The good, the bad, and the oafish! (Du bi, du bien, du benêt!)[12]

2

"Reality is approached with apparatuses of jouissance."[13]

That is another formulation I am proposing to you, as long as we focus, of course, on the fact that there's no other apparatus than language. That is how jouissance is fitted out (appareillée) in speaking beings.

That is what Freud says, assuming we correct the statement of the pleasure principle. He said it the way he did because there were others who had spoken before him, and that seemed to him the way it could most easily be heard. It is very easy to isolate, and the conjunction of Aristotle with Freud helps us isolate it.

I push further ahead, at the point at which it can now be done, by saying that the unconscious is structured like a language. On that basis, language is clarified, no doubt, by being posited as the apparatus of jouissance. But inversely, perhaps jouissance shows that in itself it is deficient (en défaut) – for, in order for it to be that way, something about it mustn't be working.

Reality is approached with apparatuses of jouissance. That doesn't mean that jouissance is prior to reality. Freud left the door open to misunderstanding on that score – you can find his discussion in what is known in French as the Essais de Psychanalyse.[14]

There is, says Freud, a Lust-Ich before a Real-Ich. That is tantamount to slipping back into the rut, the rut I call "development," which is merely a hypothesis of mastery. It suggests that a baby has nothing to do with the faute à une certaine jouissance, it is that certain jouissance that is to blame, that has sinned, come up short, proved inadequate, deficient, lacking, failing, etc.

[11] See footnotes 1 and 10 above regarding these highly polyvalent French nouns.

[12] Lacan seems to be playing off a somewhat nonsensical French advertisement for a liquor called Dubonet, which was well known at the time: "Du du, du bon, Dubonet"; he may also be intentionally mimicking the sounds of certain jazz vocals – dooby dooby do.

[13] The French here, les appareils de la jouissance, could also be translated as "jouissance devices."

[14] Lacan may be referring here to the footnote on page 135 of the French collection of Freud's work entitled Essais de Psychanalyse (Paris: Payot, 1981 [the earlier edition contained the same texts in an older translation]), where Freud talks about "the child's development into a mature adult" (SE XVIII, p. 79). Freud's references to the "pleasure-ego" and the "reality-ego" can be found, above all, in "Formulations on the Two Principles of Mental Functioning" (1911), "Instincts and their Vicissitudes" (1915), and "Negation" (1925).

Real-Ich, poor tot, and is incapable of having the slightest notion of the real. That is reserved for people we know, adults concerning whom, moreover, it is expressly stated that they never manage to wake up – when something happens in their dreams that threatens to cross over into the real, it dis-53 tresses them so much that they immediately awaken, in other words, they go on dreaming. It suffices to read, be with them a little bit, see them live, and listen to them in analysis to realize what "development" means.

When we say "primary" and "secondary" for the processes, that may well be a manner of speaking that fosters an illusion. Let's say, in any case, that it is not because a process is said to be primary – we can call them whatever we want, after all – that it is the first to appear. Personally, I have never looked at a baby and had the sense that there was no outside world for him. It is plain to see that a baby looks at nothing but that, that it excites him, and that that is the case precisely to the extent that he does not yet speak. From the moment he begins to speak, from that exact moment onward and not before, I can understand that there is [such a thing as] repression. The process of the Lust-Ich may be primary – why not? it's obviously primary once we begin to think – but it's certainly not the first.

Development is confused with the development of mastery. It is here that one must have a good ear, like in music – I am the master (m'être), I progress along the path of mastery (m'êtrise), I am the master (m'être) of myself (moi) as I am of the universe. That is what I was talking about earlier, the vanquished idiot (con-vaincu). The universe is a flower of rhetoric. This literary echo may perhaps help us understand that the ego (moi) can also be a flower of rhetoric, which grows in the pot of the pleasure principle that Freud calls "Lustprinzip," and that I define as that which is satisfied by blah-blah.

That is what I am saying when I say that the unconscious is structured like a language. But I must dot the i's and cross the t's. The universe – you might realize it by now, all the same, given the way in which I have accentuated the use of certain words, the "whole" and the "not-whole," and their differential application to the two sexes – the universe is the place where, due to the fact of speaking, everything succeeds (de dire, tout réussit).

Am I going to do a little William James here? Succeeds in what? I can tell you the answer, now that I have, I hope, finally managed to bring you to this point: succeeds in making the sexual relationship fail (faire rater)[15] in the male manner.

Normally I would expect to hear some snickering now – alas, I don't hear any. Snickering would mean "So, you've admitted it, there are two ways to make the sexual relationship fail." That is how the music of the epithalamion[16] is modulated. The epithalamion, the duet (duo) – one must distinguish the two of them – the alternation, the love letter, they're not the sexual relationship. They revolve around the fact that there's no such thing as a sexual relationship.

[15] Rater means to "fail," "botch," "screw up," "mess up," etc. I have translated it in a number of different ways in this chapter.

There is thus the male way of revolving around it, and then the other one, that I will not designate otherwise because it's what I'm in the process of elaborating this year – how that is elaborated in the female way. It is 54 elaborated on the basis of the not-whole. But as, up until now, the not-whole has not been amply explored, it's obviously giving me a hard time.

On that note, I am going to tell you a good one to distract you a bit.

In the middle of my winter sports, I felt that I had to go to Milan by rail in order to keep my word. It took up a whole day just to get there. In short, I went to Milan, and as I cannot but talk about what I'm working on at the moment, that's the way I am – I said that I would rework The Ethics of Psychoanalysis, but that's because I'm drawing it out anew[17] – I picked an absolutely ridiculous title for my lecture to the Milanese, who had never heard anyone talk about such things before, "Psychoanalysis in Reference to the Sexual Relationship." They are very intelligent. They understood it so well that immediately, that very evening, the following was printed in the newspaper, "According to Dr. Lacan, Ladies" – le donne – "Do Not Exist!"

It's true – what do you expect? – if the sexual relationship doesn't exist, there aren't any ladies. There was someone who was furious, a lady from the women's liberation movement down there. She was truly. . . . I said to her, "Come tomorrow morning, and I'll explain to you what it's all about."

If there is some angle from which this business of the sexual relationship could be clarified, it's precisely from the ladies' side (côté), insofar as it is on the basis of the elaboration of the not-whole that one must break new ground. That is my true subject this year, behind Encore, and it is one of the meanings of my title. Perhaps I will manage, in this way, to bring out something new regarding feminine sexuality.

There is one thing that provides dazzling evidence of this not-whole. Consider how, with one of these nuances or oscillations of signification that are produced in language (langue), the not-whole changes meaning when I say to you, "Regarding feminine sexuality, our colleagues, the lady analysts, do not tell us . . . the whole story!" (pas tout!). It's quite striking.[18] They haven't contributed one iota to the question of feminine sexuality. There must be an internal reason for that, related to the structure of the apparatus of jouissance.

[16] A nuptial poem or song in honor of a bride and bridegroom.

[17] Je la réextrais literally means "I am re-extracting it, mining it, drawing it out (of the ground)."

[18] Unfortunately, the word play is not very striking in English; I have not found a way to work "not whole" into such a formulation directly, without the interposition of other words.

3

That brings me back to what I myself earlier raised by way of objections to myself, all by myself, namely, that there was a male way of botching (rater) the sexual relationship, and then another. This botching (ratage) is the only way of realizing that relationship if, as I posit, there's no such thing as a sexual relationship. To say, thus, that everything succeeds does not stop us from saying "not-everything succeeds" (pas-tout réussit), for it is in the same 55 manner – it fails (ça rate). It's not a matter of analyzing how it succeeds. It's a matter of repeating until you're blue in the face why it fails.

It fails. That is objective. I have already stressed that. Indeed, it is so plain that it is objective that one must center the question of the object in analytic discourse thereupon. The failure is the object.

I already said long ago in what respect the good and the bad object differ. There is the good, there is the bad, oh la la! Today I am trying to begin with that, with what is related to what's good (le bon), the good (le bien), and to what Freud enunciates. The object is a failure (un raté). The essence of the object is failure.

You will notice that I spoke of essence, just like Aristotle. So? That means that such old words are entirely usable. At a time when I dragged my feet less than today, that is what I turned to right after Aristotle. I said that, if something freshened the air a bit after all this Greek foot-dragging around Eudemonism,[19] it was certainly the discovery of utilitarianism.

That didn't faze my audience at the time because they'd never heard of utilitarianism – the result being that they couldn't make the mistake of believing that it meant resorting to the useful (utilitaire). I explained to them what utilitarianism was in Bentham's work, which is not at all what people think it is. In order to understand it one must read The Theory of Fictions.

Utilitarianism means nothing but the following – we must think about the purpose served by the old words, those that already serve us. Nothing more. We must not be surprised by what results when we use them. We know what they are used for – they are used so that there may be the jouissance that should be (qu'il faut). With the caveat that, given the equivocation between faillir and falloir, the jouissance that should be [19] Eudemonism is the doctrine that the basis of moral obligations is found in the tendency of "right actions" to produce happiness.

must be translated as the jouissance that shouldn't be/never fails (qu'il ne faut pas).[20]

Yes, I am teaching something positive here. Except that it is expressed by a negation. But why shouldn't it be as positive as anything else?

The necessary – what I propose to accentuate for you with this mode – is that which doesn't stop (ne cesse pas) what? – being written (de s'écrire).[21] That is a very fine way in which to divide up at least four modal categories. I will explain that to you another time, but I will give you a bit more of a taste this time anyway. "What doesn't stop not being written" is a modal category, and it's not the one you might have expected to be opposed to the necessary, which would have been the contingent. Can you imagine? The necessary is linked (conjugué) to the impossible, and this "doesn't stop not being written" is the articulation thereof. What is produced is the jouissance that shouldn't be/could never fail (qu'il ne faudrait pas).[22] That is the correlate of the fact that there's no such thing as a sexual relationship, and it is the substantial aspect (le substantiel) of the phallic function.

Let me now return to the textual level. It is the jouissance that shouldn't be/could never fail (qu'il ne faudrait pas) – in the conditional tense. That suggests to me that to use it we could employ protasis and apodosis.[23] If it 56 weren't for that, things would go better (ça irait mieux) – that's a conditional tense in the second part. That is the material implication, the implication the Stoics realized was perhaps what was most solid in logic.

How are we thus going to express what shouldn't be/could never fail with respect to jouissance, if not by the following? Were there another jouissance than phallic jouissance, it shouldn't be/could never fail to be that one.

[20] Falloir, used in all the tenses, but only in the third person singular, il faut, il faudrait, etc., means "one must," "one should," "one has to," "it is necessary," and so on. Faillir means to "fail," "falter," "default," "miss," or "come up short"; in certain contexts, e.g., j'ai failli faire une gaffe, "I almost made a blunder," it means to be on the verge of doing something. Both faillir and falloir are written faut in the third person singular, present tense. Hence la jouissance qu'il ne faut pas is the jouissance that mustn't be, shouldn't be, but can't fail to be or never fails anyway. (Faillir also formerly meant to sin [for a girl], to lapse, or to be remiss in one's commitments.) The phrase la jouissance qu'il faut works much better with falloir than with faillir, because the il refers to nothing in particular in the case of the former ("the jouissance that is necessary" or "should be"), whereas it refers to a "he" or an "it" in the case of the latter ("the jouissance that it defaults on" or "the jouissance that he doesn't live up to"). Moreover, for faillir to work here grammatically, the phrase would have to be recast: la jouissance à laquelle il faut.

[21] De s'écrire could also be translated here as "writing itself."

[22] Lacan is playing here on the same equivalence between the verbs faillir and falloir that he played on two paragraphs back, both verbs being written faudrait in the conditional tense, third person singular.

[23] Lacan introduces these terms in his early article, "Logical Time and the Assertion of Anticipated Certainty," where the protasis takes on the meaning of an "if" clause in an if-then type proposition, and the apodosis takes on the meaning of the "then" clause.

That's very nice. One must use things like that, old words, as stupid as anything, but really use them, work them to the bone. That's utilitarianism. And that allowed a giant step to be taken away from the old tales about universals that had preoccupied people since Plato and Aristotle, had dragged along throughout the Middle Ages, and were still suffocating Leibniz, to so great an extent that one wonders how he still managed to be so intelligent.

Were there another one, it shouldn't be/could never fail to be that one.

What does "that one" designate? Does it designate the other in the sentence, or the one on the basis of which we designated that other as other? What I am saying here is sustained at the level of material implication, because the first part designates something false – "Were there another one," but there is no other than phallic jouissance – except the one concerning which woman doesn't breathe a word, perhaps because she doesn't know (connait)[24] it, the one that makes her not-whole. It is false that there is another one, but that doesn't stop what follows from being true, namely, that it shouldn't be/could never fail to be that one.

You see that this is entirely correct. When the true is deduced from the false, it is valid. The implication works. The only thing we cannot abide is that from the true should follow the false. Not half bad, this logic stuff! The fact that the Stoics managed to figure that out all by themselves is quite impressive. One mustn't believe that such things bore no relation to jouissance. We have but to rehabilitate the terms to see that.

It is false that there is another. That won't stop me from playing once more on the equivocation based on faux (false), by saying that it shouldn't (faux-drait) be/could never fail to be/couldn't be false that it is that one.[25] Suppose that there is another – but there isn't. And, simultaneously, it is not because there isn't – and because it is on this that the "it shouldn't be/could never fail" depends – that the cleaver falls any the less on the jouissance with which we began. That one has (faut) to be, failing (faute de) – you should understand that as guilt – failing the other that is not.[26]

That opens up for us, tangentially, and I am saying this in passing, a little glimpse that has considerable weight in a metaphysics. There may be cases

[24] Connaître implies something more experiential than savoir, and could lead to the following translation here: "she doesn't experience it." Lacan is perhaps also playing on the con – the French equivalent for the English slang "cunt" – in connaître, and in other verbs as well further on. Cf. his comments in Chapter VI on woman's experience/knowledge of it.

[25] This play on words is untranslatable in English: faux ("false" or "wrong") is pronounced in French exactly like the first syllable of faudrait.

[26] Faute de usually means for lack of or failing that, but here Lacan wants us to also hear the sin or fault in faute. Lacan may also want us to hear faut at the beginning of the sentence as based on faillir: "That one defaults, failing. . . ." The same is perhaps true four paragraphs down.

in which, instead of it being us who go in search of something to reassure ourselves in the manger of metaphysics, we can even give something back to metaphysics. To wit, one must not forget that the fact that nonbeing is not is blamed by speech on being, whose fault it is. It's true that it is its fault, because if being did not exist, we would be far less uneasy with the 57 question of nonbeing, and thus it is deservedly that we reproach being for it, and consider it to be at fault.

That is also why – and this occasionally angers me, it is what I began with, moreover, and I assume you don't remember – when I forget myself (m'oublie) to the point of publishing (p'oublier),[27] in other words, of forgetting everything (tout-blier) – the whole (tout) has something to do with it – I deserve to have to put up with people talking about me and not at all about my book. Which is just like what happened in Milan. Perhaps it wasn't entirely about me that people were speaking when they said that, according to me, ladies don't exist, but it certainly wasn't what I had just said.

In the end, if this jouissance comes to someone (celui) who speaks, and not by accident, it is because it is a bit premature. It has something to do with the renowned (fameux) sexual relationship, concerning which he will have only too many occasions to realize that it doesn't exist. It is thus second rather than first. There are traces of it in Freud's work. If Freud spoke of Urverdrängung, primal repression, it was precisely because the true, good, everyday repression is not first – it is second.

People repress the said jouissance because it is not fitting[28] for it to be spoken, and that is true precisely because the speaking (dire) thereof can be no other than the following: qua jouissance, it is inappropriate (elle ne convient pas). I already sustained as much earlier by saying that it is not the one that should be (faut), but the one that shouldn't be/never fails.

Repression is produced only to attest, in all statements (dires) and in the slightest statement, to what is implied by the statement that I just enunciated, that jouissance is inappropriate – non decet[29] – to the sexual relationship. It is precisely because the said jouissance speaks that the sexual relationship is not.

Which is why that jouissance would do better to hush up, but when it does, that makes the very absence of the sexual relationship a bit harder yet to bear. Which is why, in the final analysis, it doesn't hush up, and why the [27] P'oublier evokes "forgetting" (oublier), "publishing" (publier), and "garbage can" (poubelle).

[28] The French, il ne convient pas, can be rendered in a number of ways: it is not "fitting," "suitable," "becoming," "proper," or "appropriate." I translate it in several ways here.

[29] Non decet means "not fitting," "not befitting," "not proper," "unbecoming," "unsuitable," etc.

first effect of repression is that it speaks of something else. That is what constitutes the mainspring of metaphor.

There you have it. You see the relationship between all that and utility. It's utilitarian. It makes you capable of serving some purpose, since you don't know (faute de savoir) how to enjoy otherwise than to be enjoyed (être joui) or duped (joué), because it is precisely the jouissance that shouldn't be/could never fail.

4

It's on the basis of this step-by-step approach, which made me "scand"[30] something essential today, that we must consider the light Aristotle and Freud can be seen to shed on each other. We must investigate how what they say (dires) can intersect and cross over into each other's work.

58 In book seven of the Nicomachean Ethics, Aristotle raises the question of pleasure. What seems most certain to him, in referring to jouissance, is no more nor less than the idea that pleasure can but be distinguished from needs, from those needs with which I began in my first sentence, and with which he frames what is at stake in generation. Needs are related to movement. Indeed, Aristotle places at the center of his world – a world that has now definitively disappeared with the tide – the unmoved mover, immediately after which comes the movement it causes, and, a bit further away, what is born and dies, what is engendered and corrupted. That is where needs are situated. Needs are satisfied by movement.

Oddly enough, we find the same thing in Freud's work, but there it concerns the articulation of the pleasure principle. What equivocation makes it such that, according to Freud, the pleasure principle is brought on only by excitation, this excitation provoking movement in order to get away from it? It is strange that that is what Freud enunciates as the pleasure principle, whereas in Aristotle's work, that can only be considered as an attenuation of pain, surely not as a pleasure.

If Aristotle connects the status of pleasure with something, it can only be with what he calls ἐνέργεια, an activity.

Even more oddly, the first example he provides of this, not without coherence, is seeing – it is there that, in his view, resides the supreme pleasure, the one he distinguishes from the level of γένεσις, the generation of some-[30] Scander is the verb form of "scansion," and is usually translated as "to scan" or "scanning" (as in scanning verse). I have opted in all of my translations of Lacan's work to date to introduce a neologism – to scand, scanding – so as to distinguish the far more common contemporary uses of scanning (looking over rapidly, quickly running through a list, taking ultra-thin pictures of the body with a scanner, or "feeding" text and images in digital form into a computer) from Lacan's idea here of cutting, interrupting, punctuating, or highlighting something.

thing, the one that is produced at the heart or center of pure pleasure. No pain has to precede the fact that we see in order for seeing to be a pleasure. It is amusing that having thus posed the question, he has to put forward what? What French cannot translate otherwise, lacking a word that is not equivocal, than by l'odorer (smelling). Aristotle here places smell and sight at the same level. As opposed as the second sense seems to be to the first, he tells us that pleasure turns out to be borne thereby. Thirdly, he adds hearing.

It is just about 1:45 p.m. To orient yourselves on the path along which we are proceeding, recall the step we made earlier by formulating that jouissance is centrally related to the one (celle-là) that shouldn't be/never fails, that shouldn't be/could never fail in order for there to be a sexual relationship, and remains wholly attached to it. Hence, what emerges with the term by which Aristotle designates it is quite precisely what analytic experience allows us to situate as being the object – from at least one pole of sexual identification, the male pole – the object that puts itself in the place of what cannot be glimpsed of the Other. It is inasmuch as object a plays the role somewhere – from a point of departure, a single one, the male one – of that which takes the place of the missing partner, that what we are also used to seeing emerge in the place of the real, namely, fantasy, is constituted.

I almost regret having, in this way, said enough, which always means too much. For one must see the radical difference of what is produced at the other pole, on the basis of woman. 59

Next time, I will try to enunciate in a way that stands up – and that is complete enough for you to bear the time before we meet again, in other words, half a month – that, for woman – but write woman with the slanted line with which I designate what must be barred – for ~~Woman~~, something other than object a is at stake in what comes to make up for (suppléer) the sexual relationship that does not exist.

February 13, 1973

61

VI

God and ~~Woman~~'s jouissance

READING-LOVING, HATING.

MATERIALISTS.

JOUISSANCE OF BEING.

THE MALE, POLYMORPHOUS PERVERT.

MYSTICS.

For a long time I have wanted to speak to you while walking around a bit among you. Thus, I was hoping, I must admit, that the so-called academic vacation would have diminished the number of you attending here.

Since I have been refused this satisfaction, I will return to what I began with the last time – what I called "another satisfaction," the satisfaction of speech.

Another satisfaction is the one that answers to[1] the jouissance that was barely (juste) required, just enough (juste) for it to happen between what I will abbreviate by calling them man and woman. In other words, the satisfaction that answers to phallic jouissance.

Note here the modification that is introduced by the word "barely" (juste). This "barely" is a "just barely" (tout juste), a "just barely successful" that is the flip-side of failure – it just barely succeeds. This already justifies what Aristotle contributes with the notion of justice as the bare mean (le juste milieu).[2] Perhaps some of you recognized, when I introduced the whole (tout) – found in the expression "just barely" (tout juste) – that I circumvented the word "prosdiorism,"[3] which designates the whole that is not lacking in any language. Well, the fact that it is the prosdiorism, the whole, that allows us on this occasion to slide from Aristotle's justice to the just barely (justesse), to the just barely successful (réussite de justesse), is what

[1] The French here, répond à, can mean a number of different things: "responds to," "corresponds to," "answers to," "talks back to," and so on. It is found again in the next sentence.

[2] Aristotle defines justice as the intermediate point or mean between two extremes in Nicomachean Ethics, Book V, Chapters 3–5. I have changed the more standard translations – "golden mean" or "happy medium" – to convey Lacan's sense here of what "just barely" achieves the middle position.

[3] Lacan uses this term repeatedly in Seminar XIX (December 8, 1971, January 12 and 19, 1972, etc.) in reference to what have come to be known as the existential and universal quantifiers. They appear in Aristotle's work as "one," "some," "all," and the negations of these terms.

legitimates my having brought in Aristotle's work here. Indeed – right? – it cannot be understood immediately like that.

If Aristotle cannot be understood so easily, due to the distance that separates us from him, that is what, in my view, justifies my saying to you that reading in no way obliges you to understand. You have to read first.

1

62

That is why today, in a way that may seem paradoxical to certain of you, I will advise you to read a book regarding which the least one can say is that it concerns me. The book is entitled Le titre de la lettre,[4] and was published by the Galilée publishing company, in the collection A la lettre. I won't tell you who the authors are – they seem to me to be no more than pawns in this case.

That is not to diminish their work, for I will say that, personally, I read it with the greatest satisfaction. I would like you to put yourselves to the test of this book, written with the worst of intentions, as you will easily see in the last thirty pages. I cannot encourage its circulation strongly enough.

I can say in a certain way that, if it is a question of reading, I have never been so well read – with so much love. Of course, as is attested to by the end of the book, it is a love about which the least one can say is that its usual underside (doublure) in analytic theory need not be ruled out here.

But that goes too far. To even talk about subjects in this case, in any way whatsoever, may be going too far. To even mention their feelings is perhaps to recognize them too much as subjects.

Let us simply say that it is a model of good reading, such good reading that I can safely say that I regret never having obtained anything like it from my closest associates. The authors felt that they had to limit themselves – and, well, why not compliment them for it, since the condition of a reading is obviously that it impose limits on itself – to an article included in my Écrits that is entitled "The Instance of the Letter."

Beginning with what distinguishes me from Saussure, and what made me, as they say, distort him, we proceed, little by little, to the impasse I designate concerning analytic discourse's approach to truth and its paradoxes. That is, no doubt, something that ultimately escapes – I needn't probe any further – those who set themselves this extraordinary task. It is as if it were precisely upon reaching the impasse to which my discourse is designed to lead them that they considered their work done, declaring themselves – or rather declaring me, which amounts to the same thing given their conclusions – confounded. It would be altogether appropriate for you yourselves to examine their conclusions, which, you will see, can be qualified as inconsiderate. Up until these conclusions, the work proceeds in a way that I can only characterize as strikingly illuminating (éclaircissement).

[4] In English, see Jean-Luc Nancy and Philippe Lacoue-Labarthe, The Title of the Letter, translated by David Pettigrew and François Raffoul (Albany: SUNY Press, 1992).

63 If it could, by any chance, lighten your attendance here (éclaircir),[5] I would regard that as merely an added perk for me, but, after all, I'm not sure – why not have faith in you (vous faire confiance), since there are always just as many of you here? – whether anything could put you off.[6]

Thus, apart from the last twenty or thirty pages – to tell you the truth, those are the only ones I skimmed through – the others will be a comfort to you that, overall, I can but wish you.

2

On that note, I will continue with what I have to say to you today, namely, to further articulate the consequence of the fact that no relationship gets constituted between the sexes in the case of speaking beings, for it is on that basis alone that what makes up for that relationship can be enunciated.

For a long time I have scanded what constitutes the first step in this undertaking with a certain "There's such a thing as One" (Y a d' l'Un). This "There's such a thing as One" is not simple – that's the word for it. In psychoanalysis, or more precisely in Freud's discourse, it is announced by the fact that Eros is defined as the fusion that makes one from two, as what is supposed to gradually tend in the direction of making but one from an immense multitude. But, since it is clear that even all of you – as numerous as you are here, assuredly forming a multitude – not only do not make one, but have no chance of pulling that off – which is only too amply demonstrated every day, if only by communing in my speech – Freud obviously has to bring in another factor that poses an obstacle to this universal Eros in the guise of Thanatos, the reduction to dust.

That is obviously a metaphor that Freud is able to use thanks to the fortunate discovery of the two units of the germ (germen), the ovum and the spermatozoon, about which one could roughly say that it is on the basis of their fusion that is engendered what? A new being. Except that that doesn't happen without meiosis, a thoroughly obvious subtraction, at least for one of the two, just before the very moment at which the conjunction occurs, a subtraction of certain elements that are not superfluous in the final operation.

[5] Lacan is playing here on the double meaning of éclaircir, which he used in the first sentence of this class in the sense of "diminishing" (the number of those attending his lecture); it also means to "enlighten."

[6] The French here, je ne suis pas sûr . . . que rien enfin ne vous rebute, could perhaps also mean "I'm not sure . . . whether there is nothing that could put you off."

But biological metaphors clearly cannot reassure us here – they reassure us here still less than elsewhere. If the unconscious is truly what I say it is, being structured like a language, it is at the level of language (langue) that we must investigate this One. The course of the centuries has provided this One with an infinite resonance. Need I mention here the Neo-Platonists? Perhaps I will have occasion to mention their adventure very quickly later, since what I need to do today is very precisely designate from whence the thing not only may but must be taken up on the basis of our discourse and of the revamping our experience brings about in the realm of Eros.

We must begin with the fact that this "There's such a thing as One" is to be understood in the sense that there's One all alone (il y a de l'Un tout seul). We can grasp, thereby, the crux (nerf) of what we must clearly call by the name by which the thing resounds throughout the centuries, namely, love. 64

In analysis, we deal with nothing but that, and analysis doesn't operate by any other pathway. It is a singular pathway in that it alone allowed us to isolate what I, I who am talking to you, felt I needed to base transference on, insofar as it is not distinguished from love, that is, on the formulation "the subject supposed to know."

I cannot but mention the new resonance this term "knowledge" can take on for you. I love the person I assume to have knowledge. Earlier you saw me stall, back off, and hesitate to come down on one side or the other, on the side of love or on the side of what we call hatred, when I insistently invited you to read a book whose climax is expressly designed to discredit me (déconsidérer) – which is certainly not something that can be backed away from by someone who speaks, ultimately, but on the basis of "de-sideration"[7] and aims at nothing else. The fact is that this climax appears sustainable to the authors precisely where there is a "desupposition" of my knowledge. If I said that they hate me it is because they "desuppose" that I have knowledge.

And why not? Why not, if it turns out that that must be the condition for what I call reading? After all, what can I presume Aristotle knew? Perhaps the less I assume he has knowledge, the better I read him. That is the condition of a strict putting to the test of reading, a condition I don't weasel out of.

What is offered to us to be read by that aspect of language that exists, namely, what is woven as an effect of its erosion[8] – that is how I define what is written thereof – cannot be ignored. Thus, it would be disdainful not [7] "Sideration" is a medical term for the sudden annihilation of the vital functions due to an intense emotional shock. In French, it is related to sidérer, "to stun," "stagger," or "shock." Dé-sidération is close in spelling to déconsidérer, used earlier in the sentence.

[8] The French here, ce qui vient à se tramer d'effet de son ravinement, is rather ambiguous.

to at least recall to mind what has been said about love throughout the ages by a thought that has called itself – improperly, I must say – philosophical.

I am not going to provide a general review of the question here. It seems to me that, given the type of faces I see all around the room, you must have heard that, in philosophy, the love of God (l'amour de Dieu)[9] has occupied a certain place. We have here a sweeping fact that analytic discourse cannot but take into account, if only tangentially.

I will recall to mind here something that was said after I was, as the authors express themselves in this booklet, "excluded" from Sainte-Anne [Hospital]. In fact, I was not excluded; I withdrew. That's a horse of a different color, especially given the importance of the term "excluded" in my topology – but it's of no import, since that's not what we're here to talk about. Well-intentioned people – who are far worse than ill-intentioned ones – were surprised when they heard that I situated a certain Other between man and woman that certainly seemed like the good old God of time immemorial. It was only an echo, but they made themselves the unpaid conduits thereof. They were, by God, it must be admitted, from the pure philosophical tradition, and among those who claim to be materialists – that is why I say "pure," for there is nothing more philosophical than materialism. Materialism believes that it is obliged, God only knows why – a serendipitous expression here – to be on its guard against this God who, as I said, dominated the whole debate regarding love in philosophy. Those people, to whose warm reception I owed a renewed audience, thus manifested a certain uneasiness.

It seems clear to me that the Other – put forward at the time of "The Instance of the Letter" as the locus of speech – was a way, I can't say of laicizing, but of exorcising the good old God. After all, there are even people[10] who complimented me for having been able to posit in one of my last seminars that God doesn't exist. Obviously, they hear (entendent)[11] – they hear, but alas, they understand, and what they understand is a bit precipitate.

So today, I am instead going to show you in what sense the good old God exists. The way in which he exists will not necessarily please everyone, especially not the theologians, who are, as I have been saying for a long time, far more capable than I am of doing without his existence. I, unfortunately, am not entirely in the same position, because I deal with the Other.

[9] The French here could also mean "God's love."

[10] The French here, il y a bien des gens, could also be translated as "there are plenty of people."

[11] Entendre means both "to hear" and "to understand"; here, however, it is being juxtaposed with comprendre, which I have translated as "to understand" in the latter part of this sentence.

This Other – assuming there is but one all alone – must have some relationship with what appears of the other sex.

On that score, I didn't stop myself, the year I mentioned last time, that of The Ethics of Psychoanalysis, from referring to courtly love. What is courtly love?

It is a highly refined way of making up for (suppléer à) the absence of the sexual relationship, by feigning that we are the ones who erect an obstacle thereto. It is truly the most amazing thing that has even been attempted. But how can one denounce the fake?

Rather than dwelling on the paradox of why courtly love appeared during the feudal era, materialists should see therein a magnificent occasion to show, on the contrary, how it is rooted in the discourse of loyalty (féalité), of fidelity to the person. In the final analysis, the "person" always has to do with the master's discourse. Courtly love is, for man – in relation to whom the lady is entirely, and in the most servile sense of the word, a subject – the only way to elegantly pull off the absence of the sexual relationship.

It is along this pathway that I shall deal – later though, for today I must break new ground – with the notion of the obstacle, with what in Aristotle's work – whatever else may be said, I prefer Aristotle to Jaufré Rudel[12] – is precisely called the obstacle, ἔνστασις.[13]

My readers – whose book you must, I repeat, all go out and buy later – even found that. They investigate the instance so thoroughly, so carefully – as I said, I have never seen a single one of my students do such work, alas, no one will ever take seriously what I write, except of course those about whom I said earlier that they hate me in the guise of desupposing my knowl- 66 edge – that they even discover the ἔνστασις, the Aristotelian logical obstacle that I had reserved for the end. It is true that they do not see where it fits in. But they are so used to working, especially when something motivates them – the desire, for example, to obtain their Master's,[14] a truly serendipitous term here – that they even mention that in the footnote on pages 28 and 29.[15]

Consult Aristotle and you will know everything when I at last come to [12] A reference to the courtly love poet, Jaufré Rudel de Blaye. See Les chansons de Jaufré Rudel, edited by Alfred Jeanroy (Paris: Librairie Ancienne Honoré Champion, 1924). In English, see, for example, Trobador Poets, translated by Barbara Smythe (New York: Cooper Square Publishers, 1966), and Songs of the Troubadours, translated by Anthony Bonner (New York: Schocken Books, 1972).

[13] ἔνστασις is the obstacle one raises to an adversary's argument; it is also the exception to a universal predicate, hence an instance or counterinstance that refutes a general claim. This is but one example of the inappropriateness of translating Lacan's "Instance de la lettre" as "Agency of the Letter."

[14] The French term, maîtrise, means both "Master's degree" (in arts or sciences) and "mastery."

[15] This corresponds to footnote 4 on page 24 of the English edition.

this business of the ἔνστασις. You can read, one after the other, the passage in the Rhetoric and the two sections of the Topics[16] that will allow you to truly know what I mean when I try to integrate my four formulas, $\exists x\overline{\Phi x}$ and the rest, into Aristotle's work.

Lastly, to finish up on this point, why should materialists, as they are called, be indignant about the fact that I situate – and why shouldn't I – God as the third party in this business of human love? Even materialists sometimes know a bit about the ménage à trois, don't they?

So let us try to push ahead. Let us try to push ahead regarding what results from the following, that nothing indicates that I don't know what I'm saying when I speak to you. What creates a problem right from the beginning of this book, which continues right up until the end, is that it assumes – and with that one can do anything – that I have an ontology, or, what amounts to the same thing, a system.

In the circular diagram[17] in which is supposedly laid out what I put forward regarding the instance of the letter, the authors are at least honest enough to use dotted lines – for good reason, since they hardly weigh anything – to situate all of my statements enveloping the names of the principal philosophers into whose general ontology I am claimed to insert my supposed system. But it cannot be ambiguous that I oppose to the concept of being – as it is sustained in the philosophical tradition, that is, as rooted in the very thinking that is supposed to be its correlate – the notion that we are duped (joués)[18] by jouissance.

Thought is jouissance. What analytic discourse contributes is the following, and it is already hinted at in the philosophy of being: there is jouissance of being.

I spoke to you of the Nicomachean Ethics because the trace is there. What Aristotle wanted to know, and that paved the way for everything that followed in his wake, is what the jouissance of being is. Saint Thomas had no problem after that coming up with the physical theory of love – as it was called by the abbot Rousselot, whom I mentioned last time[19] – namely, that the first being we have a sense of is clearly our being, and everything that is for the good of our being must, by dint of this very fact, be the Supreme Being's jouissance, that is, God's. To put it plainly, by loving God, we love [16] Lacan is referring here to the passages in Aristotle's work mentioned in the footnote of The Title of the Letter: Rhetoric II, 25, 1402a, Topics VIII, 2, 157ab, and II, 11, 115b. The authors also mention Prior Analytics II, 26.

[17] Found on page 112 (page 110 of the English edition), and entitled " 'System' of 'The Instance of the Letter,' or De revolutionibus orbium litteralium."

[18] The French here literally means "played"; figuratively it means "deceived," "had," "toyed with," "outsmarted," and so on.

[19] See Pierre Rousselot, Pour l'histoire du problème de l'amour au moyen âge (Münster: Aschendorffsche Buchhandlung, 1907). Lacan did not mention Rousselot in the last class as published in this Seminar.

ourselves, and by first loving ourselves – "well-ordered charity," as it is put[20] – we pay the appropriate homage to God.

Being – if people want me to use this term at all costs – the being that I 67 oppose to that – and to which this little volume is forced to attest right from the very first pages of its reading, which simply involve reading – is the being of signifierness. And I fail to see in what sense I am stooping to the ideals of materialism – I say "to the ideals" because they're beyond its scope – when I identify the reason for the being of signifierness in jouissance, jouissance of the body.

But, you see, a body hasn't seemed materialistic enough since Democritus. One has to find atoms and the whole nine yards, not to mention sight, smell, and everything that follows therefrom. All that goes together.

It's no accident that Aristotle occasionally quotes Democritus, even if he feigns disgust when he does so, for he relies on the latter's work. In fact, the atom is simply an element of flying signifierness, quite simply a στοιχεῖον.[21] Except that it is extremely difficult to make it work out right when one retains only what makes the element an element, namely, the fact that it is unique, whereas one should introduce the other a little bit, namely, difference.

Now, if there's no such thing as a sexual relationship, we must see in what respect the jouissance of the body can serve a purpose here.

3

Let us approach things first from the pole at which every x is a function of Φx, that is, from the pole where man is situated.

One ultimately situates oneself there by choice – women are free to situate themselves there if it gives them pleasure to do so. Everyone knows there are phallic women, and that the phallic function doesn't stop men from being homosexuals. It is, nevertheless, the phallic function that helps them situate themselves as men and approach woman. I shall discuss man quickly, because what I have to talk about today is woman and because I assume that I have already sufficiently hammered it home to you[22] that you still recall the following – there is no chance for a man to have jouissance of [20] "Charité bien ordonnée commence par soi-même" is a well-known French proverb. In English, it literally means "Well-ordered charity begins with oneself," but the most closely related proverb in English is "Charity begins at home."

[21] στοιχεῖον means "element," "principal constituent," "letter," or "part of speech."

[22] Lacan had already devoted a great deal of attention in Seminars XVIII and XIX to the phallic function and the four logical formulas he quickly glosses below; that is what allows him to assume that his audience still recalls what he has already stated about man.

a woman's body, otherwise stated, for him to make love, without castration (à moins de castration),[23] in other words, without something that says no to the phallic function.

That is the result of analytic experience. That doesn't stop him from desiring woman in every way, even when that condition does not obtain. He not only desires her, but does all kinds of things to her that bear an astonishing resemblance to love.

As opposed to what Freud maintains, it is man – I mean he who happens to be male without knowing what to do with it, all the while being a speaking being – who approaches woman, or who can believe that he approaches her, because on that score there is no dearth of convictions, the con-victions I spoke about last time.[24] But what he approaches is the cause of his desire 68 that I have designated as object a. That is the act of love.[25] To make love (faire l'amour), as the very expression indicates, is poetry.[26] But there is a world between poetry and the act. The act of love is the male's polymorphous perversion, in the case of speaking beings. There is nothing more certain, coherent, and rigorous as far as Freudian discourse is concerned.

I still have a half hour to try to thrust you, if I dare express myself thus,[27] into how things stand at woman's pole. One of the following two things is true: either what I write has no meaning at all – which is, by the way, the conclusion of the short book [discussed earlier], and that is why I beg you to have a look at it – or when I write $\overline{\forall x}\Phi x$, a never-before-seen function in which the negation is placed on the quantifier, which should be read "not-whole," it means that when any speaking being whatsoever situates itself under the banner "women," it is on the basis of the following – that it grounds itself as being not-whole in situating itself in the phallic function.[28] That is what defines what? Woman precisely, except that Woman can only be written with a bar through it.[29] There's no such thing as Woman, Woman with a capital W indicating the universal. There's no such thing as [23] The French here might also be translated as "anything less than (or short of) castration" or as "with something less than (or in the case of something less than) castration." See the last paragraph of this chapter.

[24] Lacan is referring back to the con-vaincu he mentioned in the last lecture, the vanquished (or convinced) asshole or idiot. In the play on words, con as "cunt" may also be intended.

[25] The French here, l'acte d'amour, seems to imply "the act of love-making," more than a "loving act." Hence it strikes me as more or less equivalent here to l'acte sexuel, i.e., intercourse.

[26] Faire, in French, often suggests something more make-believe than "make" in English. The hysteric who fait l'homme plays the part or role of man, perhaps like an actor. Faire l'amour can thus suggest something like "playing at love" or "creating love."

[27] Introduire, which I have translated here as "thrust," can take on the meaning of penetration in certain contexts.

[28] Or "it grounds itself as not-wholly situating itself in the phallic function."

[29] In the French, Lacan says that we must bar the article "La" in "La femme," which, as he tells us in the next sentence, is the definite article that designates the Woman because, in her essence – I've already risked using that term, so why should I think twice about using it again? – she is not-whole.

I see my students far less attached to reading my work than the slightest underling when he is motivated by the desire to obtain a Master's; not one of them has avoided producing an utter and complete muddle regarding the lack of a signifier, the signifier of the lack of a signifier, and other gibberish regarding the phallus, whereas with "woman" (la) I am designating for you the signifier that is, nevertheless, common and even indispensable. The proof is that, earlier, I already spoke of man and "woman" (la femme). That "woman" (la) is a signifier. With it I symbolize the signifier whose place it is indispensable to mark – that place cannot be left empty. "Woman" (la) is a signifier, the crucial property (propre) of which is that it is the only one that cannot signify anything, and this is simply because it grounds woman's status in the fact that she is not-whole. That means we can't talk about Woman (La femme).

A woman can but be excluded[30] by the nature of things, which is the nature of words, and it must be said that if there is something that women themselves complain about enough for the time being, that's it. It's just that they don't know what they're saying – that's the whole difference between them and me.

The fact remains that if she is excluded by the nature of things, it is precisely in the following respect: being not-whole, she has a supplementary jouissance compared to what the phallic function designates by way of jouissance.

You will notice that I said "supplementary." If I had said "complementary" what a mess we'd be in! We would fall back into the whole.

Women content themselves (s'en tiennent),[31] any woman contents herself (aucune s'en tient), being not-whole, with the jouissance in question and, well, generally speaking, we would be wrong not to see that, contrary to 69 what people say, it is nevertheless they who possess men.

Commoners – I know some of them, they're not necessarily here, but I know quite a few – commoners call their wife "la bourgeoise." That's what that means. He is the one who obeys orders (à la botte), not her. Since Rabelais, we have known that the phallus, her man, as she says, is not indifuniversal. In English, the definite article "the" sometimes functions in that way, as in "the Good," "the Just," and so on. In the case of woman, however, "the woman" seems to imply a specific woman ("the woman of one's dreams," "the woman downstairs"), whereas Lacan is aiming here instead at a universal like womanliness or the essence of woman. See, on this point, Chapter I, footnote 28.

---

[30] Il n'y a de femme qu'exclue could also be rendered as "There is no woman except excluded."

[31] This could be translated in many ways: "Women confine themselves . . . to the jouissance in question," "Women stick . . . to . . . ," "Women go . . . with . . . ," etc.

ferent to her. But, and this is the whole point, she has different ways of approaching that phallus and of keeping it for herself. It's not because she is not-wholly in the phallic function that she is not there at all. She is not not at all there.[32] She is there in full (à plein). But there is something more (en plus).

Be careful with this "more" – beware of taking it too far too quickly. I cannot designate it any better or otherwise because I have to rough it out (trancher),[33] and I have to go quickly.

There is a jouissance, since I am confining myself here to jouissance,[34] a jouissance of the body that is, if I may express myself thus – why not make a book title out of it? it'll be the next book in the Galilée collection – "beyond the phallus." That would be cute, huh? And it would give another consistency to the women's liberation movement. A jouissance beyond the phallus. . . .

You may have noticed – I am naturally speaking here to the few semblances of men I see here and there, fortunately I don't know them for the most part, and that way I don't presume anything about the others – that now and then, there is something that, for a brief moment, shakes (secoue) women up or rescues them (secourt). When you look up the etymology of those two words in the Bloch et Von Wartburg that is so delectable to me, and that I am sure you don't even all have on your bookshelves, you'll see the relationship between them.[35] Such things don't happen by chance, all the same.

There is a jouissance that is hers (à elle), that belongs to that "she" (elle) that doesn't exist and doesn't signify anything.[36] There is a jouissance that is hers about which she herself perhaps knows nothing if not that she experiences it – that much she knows. She knows it, of course, when it comes (arrive). It doesn't happen (arrive) to all of them.

I don't want to end up talking about putative frigidity, but one must isolate that aspect of relationships between men and women that is related to current trends (la mode). It's very important. Of course in Freud's discourse, alas, as in courtly love, all of that is covered over by minute consid-

[32] This is an obvious commentary on Lacan's second matheme for women: $\exists x \Phi x$.

[33] Trancher literally means to "cut or slice"; figuratively it means "to decide, determine, or settle (a debate or question)." Lacan's concern here seems to be to simply lay down a few guideposts at the outset.

[34] Lacan uses the same expression here, s'en tenir à la jouissance, as he did at the beginning of the third paragraph back.

[35] The two verbs, secouer and secourir, are discussed on page 581 of the Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue française, by Oscar Bloch and Walther von Wartburg (Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1932).

[36] This is, perhaps, a reference to what Lacan says elsewhere: "The so-called third person [he, she, or it] doesn't exist" (Seminar III, The Psychoses, translated by Russell Grigg [New York: Norton, 1993], p. 314).

erations that have led to all kinds of problems (ravages). Minute considerations concerning clitoral jouissance and the jouissance that people call by whatever name they can find, the other one, precisely, the one that I am trying to get you to approach by a logical pathway, because, as things currently stand, there is no other.

The plausibility of what I am claiming here – namely, that woman knows nothing of this jouissance – is underscored by the fact that in all the time people have been begging them, begging them on their hands and knees – I spoke last time of women psychoanalysts – to try to tell us, not a word! We've never been able to get anything out of them. So we call this jouissance by whatever name we can come up with, "vaginal," and speak of the posterior pole of the uterine orifice and other such "cunt-torsions" (conneries) – 70 that's the word for it! If she simply experienced it and knew nothing about it, that would allow us to cast myriad doubts on this notorious (fameuse) frigidity.

That too is a theme, a literary theme. And it's worth dwelling on for a moment. I've been doing nothing but that since I was twenty, exploring the philosophers on the subject of love. Naturally, I didn't immediately focus on the question of love, but that did dawn on me at one point, with the abbot Rousselot, actually, whom I mentioned earlier, and the whole quarrel about physical love and ecstatic love, as they are called.[37] I understand why Gilson didn't find that opposition to be a very good one.[38] He thought that Rousselot had made a discovery that wasn't really one, because that opposition was part of the problem, and love is just as ecstatic in Aristotle's work as in Saint Bernard's,[39] assuming one knows how to read the chapters regarding φιλία, friendship. Some of you must surely know what literary debauchery occurred around that: Denis de Rougemont – have a look at Love in the Western World,[40] it gets red hot! – and then another no stupider than anyone else, named Nygren, a Protestant, [the author of] Agape and [37] See Écrits, 119, and Seminar III, 287. Rousselot explains that "physical love" was not understood in the Middle Ages as corporal or bodily, but rather as natural love – the kind of love one finds in nature between mother bear and cub, for example (Pour l'histoire du problème d'amour au moyen âge, p. 3). In the translation of Saint Thomas Acquinas' Summa Theologica prepared by the Fathers of the English Dominican Province, it is rendered as "natural love" (Chicago: Encyclopedia Britannica, 1952) (Question 60).

[38] See Étienne-Henri Gilson, The Choir of Muses (L'École des muses), 1951.

[39] Lacan is, no doubt, referring here to Bernard of Clairvaux, a Cistercian; see Bernard of Clairvaux: Selected Works, translated by G.R. Evans (New York: Paulist Press, 1987).

[40] This book was published in French in 1939 as L'Amour et l'Occident. It was translated into English by Montgomery Belgion and published simultaneously in the U.S. and England under different titles: Love in the Western World (New York: Pantheon, 1940 and 1956) and Passion and Society (London: Faber and Faber Ltd., 1940 and 1956).

Eros.[41] Christianity naturally ended up inventing a God such that he is the one who gets off (jouit)!

There is, nevertheless, a little connection when you read certain serious authors, like women, as if by chance. I will give you a reference here to an author, a reference I owe to a very nice person who had read the author's work and brought it to me. I read it immediately. I'd better write her name on the board, otherwise you won't buy it. It is Hadewijch d'Anvers, a Beguine – she is what we so quaintly refer to as a mystic.[42]

I don't use the word "mystic" as Péguy did.[43] Mysticism isn't everything that isn't politics. It is something serious, about which several people inform us – most often women, or bright people like Saint John of the Cross, because one is not obliged, when one is male, to situate oneself on the side of $\forall x \Phi x$. One can also situate oneself on the side of the not-whole. There are men who are just as good as women. It happens. And who also feel just fine about it. Despite – I won't say their phallus – despite what encumbers them that goes by that name, they get the idea or sense that there must be a jouissance that is beyond. Those are the ones we call mystics.

I have already spoken about other people who were not too bad in terms of mysticism, but who were situated instead on the side of the phallic function, Angelus Silesius, for example.[44] Confusing his contemplative eye with the eye with which God looks at him, must, if kept up, partake of perverse jouissance. For the Hadewijch in question, it's like for Saint Teresa – you need but go to Rome and see the statue by Bernini[45] to immediately understand that she's coming. There's no doubt about it. What is she getting off 71 on? It is clear that the essential testimony of the mystics consists in saying that they experience it, but know nothing about it.

These mystical jaculations are neither idle chatter nor empty verbiage; they provide, all in all, some of the best reading one can find – at the bottom of the page, drop a footnote, "Add to that list Jacques Lacan's Écrits," because it's of the same order. Thanks to which, naturally, you are all going [41] Anders Nygren's Agape and Eros, translated by Philip S. Watson (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1953); partial translations were published in England between 1932 and 1939 by the S.P.C.K. House. Originally published in Swedish as Den Kristna Kärlekstanken genom tiderna. Eros och Agape (Stockholm: Svenska Kyrkans Diakonistyrelses Bokförlag, 1930 and 1936).

[42] See, in particular, Hadewijch: The Complete Works, translated by Mother Columba Hart (New York: Paulist Press, 1980).

[43] See Charles Péguy, Notre Patrie (1905), Notre Jeunesse (1910), and Mystère de la charité de Jeanne d'Arc (1910).

[44] See, in particular, Angelus Silesius: The Cherubinic Wanderer, translated by Maria Shrady (New York: Paulist Press, 1986).

[45] "The Ecstasy of St. Teresa" is a marble and gilded bronze niche sculpture by Gian Lorenzo Bernini (1645–52) located in the Coronaro Chapel in Santa Maria della Vittoria in Rome. See the cover photo of the French edition of this Seminar.

to be convinced that I believe in God. I believe in the jouissance of woman insofar as it is extra (en plus), as long as you put a screen in front of this "extra" until I have been able to properly explain it.

What was attempted at the end of the last century, in Freud's time, what all sorts of decent souls around Charcot and others were trying to do, was to reduce mysticism to questions of cum (affaires de foutre). If you look closely, that's not it at all. Doesn't this jouissance one experiences and yet knows nothing about put us on the path of ex-sistence? And why not interpret one face of the Other, the God face, as based on feminine jouissance?

As all of that is produced thanks to the being of signifierness, and as that being has no other locus than the locus of the Other (Autre) that I designate with capital A, one sees the "cross-sightedness"[46] that results. And as that is also where the father function is inscribed, insofar as castration is related to the father function, we see that that doesn't make two Gods (deux Dieu), but that it doesn't make just one either.

In other words, it's no accident that Kierkegaard discovered existence in a seducer's little love affair. It's by castrating himself, by giving up love, that he thinks he will accede to it.[47] But perhaps, after all – why not? – Regine too existed. This desire for a good at one remove (au second degré), a good that is not caused by a little a – perhaps it was through Regine that he attained that dimension.

February 20, 1973

[46] Biglerie literally means cross-eyedness, and seems to connote a sort of hoodwinking based on double-vision.

[47] "It" here seems to refer to "existence." See, in particular, Soren Kierkegaard, The Diary of a Seducer (New York: Frederick Ungar, 1966).

73

VII

A love letter (une lettre d'âmour)

COALESCENCE AND SCISSION OF a AND S(Ⱥ).
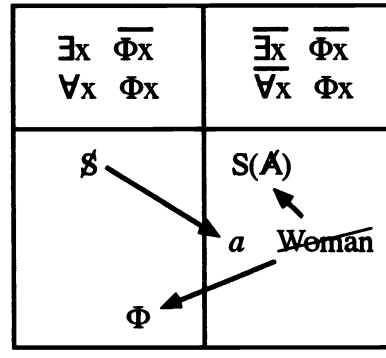
THE BEYONDSEX.
SPEAKING TO NO AVAIL.
PSYCHOANALYSIS IS NOT A COSMOLOGY.
KNOWLEDGE OF JOUISSANCE.



After what I just put on the board, you may think you know everything. Don't.

Today I am going to try to speak about knowledge, about that knowledge which, in the inscription of the four discourses – on which the social link is based, as I thought I could show you – I symbolized by writing S_2. Perhaps I will manage today to make you sense why this 2 goes further than a secondariness in relation to the pure signifier that is written S_1.

1

Since I decided to give you this inscription as a prop on the blackboard, I am going to comment on it, briefly I hope. I did not, I must admit, write it down or prepare it anywhere.[1] It doesn't strike me as exemplary, if not, as usual, in producing misunderstandings.

74 In effect, a discourse like analytic discourse aims at meaning. By way of meaning, it is clear that I can only deliver to you, to each of you, what you are already on the verge of absorbing. That has a limit, a limit provided by the meaning in which you live. I wouldn't be exaggerating if I said that that doesn't go very far. What analytic discourse brings out is precisely the idea that that meaning is based on semblance (ce sens est du semblant).[2]

[1] It should be noted that the top four formulas in the table had already been presented by Lacan in Seminars XVIII and XIX.

If analytic discourse indicates that that meaning is sexual, that can only be by explaining its limit. There is nowhere any kind of a last word if not in the sense in which "word" is "not a word" (mot, c'est motus)[3] – I have already stressed that. "No answer, not a word" (Pas de réponse, mot), La Fontaine says somewhere. Meaning (sens) indicates the direction toward which it fails (échoue).[4]

Having posited that, which should make you beware understanding too quickly, having taken all these precautions dictated by mere prudence – φρόνησις, as it is expressed in Greek in which so many things were said, but which remained far from what analytic discourse allows us to articulate – here is more or less what is inscribed on the blackboard.

We'll start with the four propositional formulas at the top of the table, two of which lie to the left, the other two to the right. Every speaking being situates itself on one side or the other. On the left, the lower line – $\forall x \Phi x$ – indicates that it is through the phallic function that man as whole acquires his inscription (prend son inscription),[5] with the proviso that this function is limited due to the existence of an x by which the function Φx is negated (niée): $\exists x \overline{\Phi x}$. That is what is known as the father function[6] – whereby we find, via negation, the proposition $\overline{\Phi x}$, which grounds the operativity (exercice) of what makes up for the sexual relationship with castration, insofar as that relationship is in no way inscribable. The whole here is thus based on

[2] The French, semblant, was still in currency in English in Carlyle's time; see his Heroes (1841), verse 284: "Thou art not true; thou art not extant, only semblant." It took on the meanings of seeming, apparent, and counterfeit, meanings still associated with the contemporary English "semblance." Jacques-Alain Miller proposes the term "make-believe" to render it in "Microscopia: An Introduction to the Reading of Television" (translated by Bruce Fink) in Jacques Lacan, Television: A Challenge to the Psychoanalytic Establishment, edited by Joan Copjec (New York: Norton, 1990). Here I have generally preferred "semblance"; in the instance at hand, Lacan says du semblant, implying either "some semblance" (like some water) or "based on semblance." On semblance see, above all, Lacan's Seminar XVIII, D'un discours qui ne serait pas du semblant ("On a Discourse That Would Not Be Based on Semblance").

[3] Motus might also be translated as "don't breathe a word of it" or "mum's the word."

[4] Sens in French also means "direction."

[5] The French here could perhaps also be rendered as "can be written." Inscription in French also means "enrollment," "registration," and "matriculation."

[6] The French here, la fonction du père, could also be translated as "the father's function" or "the function of the father."

the exception posited as the end-point (terme), that is, on that which altogether negates Φx.

On the other side, you have the inscription of the woman portion of speaking beings. Any speaking being whatsoever, as is expressly formulated in Freudian theory, whether provided with the attributes of masculinity – attributes that remain to be determined – or not, is allowed to inscribe itself in this part. If it inscribes itself there, it will not allow for any universality – it will be a not-whole, insofar as it has the choice of positing itself in Φx or of not being there (de n'en pas être).[7]

Those are the only possible definitions of the so-called man or woman portion for that which finds itself in the position of inhabiting language.

Underneath – that is, below the horizontal bar where the vertical bar (division) is crossed over, that division of what is improperly called humanity insofar as humanity is divided up into sexual identifications – you have a scanded indication of what is in question. On the side of man, I have inscribed $, certainly not to privilege him in any way, and the Φ that props him[8] up as signifier and is also incarnated in S_1, which, of all the signifiers, is the signifier for which there is no signified, and which, with respect to meaning (sens), symbolizes the failure thereof. It is "half-sense," "indesense" par excellence, or if you will allow me again, "reti-sense." This $, thus 75 doubled by that signifier on which, in the end, it does not even depend, this $ never deals with anything by way of a partner but object a inscribed on the other side of the bar. He is unable to attain his sexual partner, who is the Other, except inasmuch as his partner is the cause of his desire. In this respect, as is indicated elsewhere in my graphs by the oriented conjunction of $ and a, this is nothing other than fantasy. This fantasy, in which the subject is caught up (pris), is as such the basis of what is expressly called the "reality principle" in Freudian theory.

Now for the other side. What I am working on this year is what Freud expressly left aside: Was will das Weib? "What does woman want?" Freud claims that there is only masculine libido.[9] What does that mean if not that a field that certainly is not negligible is thus ignored. That field is the one of all beings that take on the status of woman – assuming that being takes on anything whatsoever of her destiny. Moreover, it is improper to call her Woman (la femme), because, as I stressed last time, as soon as Woman is enunciated by way of a not-whole, the W cannot be written. There is only barred Woman here.[10] ~~Woman~~ is related to the signifier of A insofar as it is barred. I will illustrate that for you today.

[7] This might also be rendered, "not being part of it."

[8] It's not clear whether le here refers to man or $.

[9] The French is difficult to render with the exact degree of negation: il n'y a de libido que masculine.

[10] Same structure as in the preceding footnote: Il n'y a ici de la que barré.

The Other is not simply the locus in which truth stammers. It deserves to represent that to which woman is fundamentally related. Assuredly, we have but sporadic testimonies of this, and that is why I took them up last time in their metaphorical function. Being the Other, in the most radical sense, in the sexual relationship, in relation to what can be said of the unconscious, woman is that which has a relationship to that Other. That is what I would like to articulate a little more precisely today.

Woman has a relation to the signifier of that Other, insofar as, qua Other, it can but remain forever Other. I can only assume here that you will recall my statement that there is no Other of the Other. The Other, that is, the locus in which everything that can be articulated on the basis of the signifier comes to be inscribed, is, in its foundation, the Other in the most radical sense. That is why the signifier, with this open parenthesis, marks the Other as barred: S(Ⱥ).

How can we conceive of the fact that the Other can be, in some sense (quelque part), that to which half – since that it also roughly the biological proportion – half of all speaking beings refer (se réfère)?[11] That is nevertheless what is written on the blackboard with the arrow that begins from ~~Woman~~. ~~Woman~~ cannot be said (se dire). Nothing can be said of woman. Woman has a relation with S(Ⱥ), and it is already in that respect that she is doubled, that she is not-whole, since she can also have a relation with Φ.

I designate Φ as the phallus insofar as I indicate that it is the signifier that has no signified, the one that is based, in the case of man, on phallic jouissance. What is the latter if not the following, which the importance of masturbation in our practice highlights sufficiently – the jouissance of the idiot?

2

76

After that, to calm you back down, I need but speak to you of love – which I will do in a moment. But what does it mean that I have come to such a pass as to speak to you of love, whereas it is not very compatible with the direction from which analytic discourse can provide a semblance of something that would be science?[12]

You are barely aware of this "would be science." Of course, you know, because I have made you take notice of it, that there was a time when one could, not without reason, assure oneself that scientific discourse was grounded in the Galilean turning point. I have stressed that enough to [11] The French here could also be translated as "refer themselves," "are related," "relate themselves," etc.

[12] The French here, serait science, reappears in the next sentence; in both cases it could also be translated as "would like to be science" or "would constitute science."

assume that, at the very least, some of you have gone back to the sources, I mean to Koyré's work.

Regarding scientific discourse, it is very difficult to maintain equally present two terms that I will mention to you.

On the one hand, scientific discourse has engendered all sorts of instruments that we must, from our vantage point here, qualify as gadgets. You are now, infinitely more than you think, subjects of instruments that, from the microscope right down to the radiotelevision, are becoming the elements of your existence. You cannot currently even gauge the import of this, but it is nonetheless part of what I am calling scientific discourse, insofar as a discourse is what determines a form of social link.

On the other hand – and here there is no linkup – there is a subversion of knowledge (connaissance). Prior to that, no knowledge was conceived that did not participate in the fantasy of an inscription of the sexual link. One cannot even say that the subjects of antiquity's theory of knowledge did not realize that.

Let us simply consider the terms "active" and "passive," for example, that dominate everything that was cogitated regarding the relationship between form and matter, a relationship that was so fundamental, and to which each of Plato's steps refers, and then Aristotle's, concerning the nature of things. It is visible and palpable that their statements are based only on a fantasy by which they tried to make up for what can in no way be said (se dire), namely, the sexual relationship.

The strange thing is that in this crude polarity that makes matter passive and form the agent that animates it, something, albeit something ambiguous, nevertheless got through, namely, that this animation is nothing other than the a with which the agent animates what? He animates nothing – he takes the other as his soul.[13]

Consider what progresses over the course of the ages regarding the idea of a God that is not the God of Christian faith, but that of Aristotle – the 77 unmoved mover, the supreme sphere. The idea that there is a being such that all other beings with less being than it can have no other aim than being the most being they can be, is the whole foundation of the idea of the Good in Aristotle's ethics, which I encouraged you to look at in order to grasp the impasses therein. If I base myself now on the inscriptions on the blackboard, it is assuredly revealed that it is in the opaque place of jouissance of the Other, of this Other insofar as woman, if she existed, could be it, that the Supreme Being is situated – this Supreme Being that is manifestly mythical in Aristotle's work, this unmoving sphere from which all movements stem, whatever they may be: changes, generations, motions, translations, increases, etc.

[13] The French, il prend l'autre pour son âme, could also be translated as "he (mis)takes the other for his soul."

It is insofar as her jouissance is radically Other that woman has more of a relationship to God than anything that could have been said in speculation in antiquity following the pathway of that which is manifestly articulated only as the good of man.

The aim of my teaching, insofar as it pursues what can be said and enunciated on the basis of analytic discourse, is to dissociate a and A by reducing the first to what is related to the imaginary and the other to what is related to the symbolic.[14] It is indubitable that the symbolic is the basis of what was made into God. It is certain that the imaginary is based on the reflection of one semblable in another.[15] And yet, a has lent itself to be confused with S(Ⱥ), below which it is written on the blackboard, and it has done so by means of the function of being. It is here that a scission or detachment remains to be effectuated. It is in this respect that psychoanalysis is something other than a psychology. For psychology is this uneffectuated scission.

3

Now, in order to rest a little, I'm going to allow myself to read to you what I wrote to you a while ago, on what? I wrote from the only place where it is possible to speak of love.

Indeed, people have done nothing but speak of love in analytic discourse. How can one help but sense that, with respect to everything that can be articulated now that scientific discourse has been discovered, it is purely and simply a waste of time? What analytic discourse contributes – and perhaps that is, after all, the reason for its emergence at a certain point in scientific discourse – is that to speak of love is in itself a jouissance.

That is assuredly confirmed by the tangible effect that saying whatever

[14] The French, ce qui est de l'imaginaire and ce qui est du symbolique, could more literally be translated as "what is of the imaginary" and "what is of the symbolic," or as "what is based on the imaginary" and "what is based on the symbolic."

[15] Semblable is often translated as "fellow man" or "counterpart," but in Lacan's usage it refers specifically to the mirroring of two imaginary others (a and a') who resemble each other (or at least see themselves in each other). "Fellow man" – corresponding to the French prochain – points to man (not woman), the adult (not the child), and suggests fellowship, whereas semblable evokes rivalry and jealousy first and foremost in Lacan's work. "Counterpart" suggests parallel hierarchical structures within which the two people take on similar symbolic roles. My "counterpart" could also be someone who serves to complete or complement me, whereas my semblable is someone who is indistinguishable from me, competes with me, and usurps my role (this is especially evident in paranoia, where a total confusion of a and a' may occur). I have thus preferred to revive here the now archaic English "semblable" found, for example, in Hamlet, Act V, Scene II, line 124: "his semblable is his mirror; and who else would trace him, his umbrage, nothing more."

[comes to mind] – the very watchword of the analysand's discourse – is what leads to the Lustprinzip, what leads to it most directly, without requiring the accession to the higher spheres that constitutes the foundation of Aristotelian ethics.

78 The Lustprinzip is, in effect, based only on the coalescence of a with S(Ⱥ).

A is barred by us, of course. That doesn't mean that it suffices to bar it for nothing to exist thereof. If by S(Ⱥ) I designate nothing other than woman's jouissance, it is assuredly because it is with that that I am indicating that God has not yet made his exit.

That is more or less what I wrote for you. What was I, in the end, writing for you? The only thing one can write that is a bit serious – a love letter.

I'm one of those people who doesn't give the psychological presuppositions, thanks to which all of that lasted so long, a good reputation. Still, it is hard to see why the fact of having a soul should be a scandal for thought – if it were true. If it were true, the soul could not be spoken except on the basis of what allows a being – speaking being, to call it by its name – to bear what is intolerable in its world, which assumes that the soul is foreign to it, in other words, phantasmatic. Which considers the soul to be here – in other words, in this world – owing only to its patience and courage in confronting it. That is confirmed by the fact that, up until our time, the soul has never had any other meaning.

It is here that llanguage, llanguage in French must help me out – not, as it sometimes does, by offering me a homonym, like d'eux for deux or peut for peu, or this il peut peu,[16] which must be there to serve some purpose for us – but simply by allowing me to say that one "souloves" (âme).[17] I soulove, you soulove, he souloves. You see here that we can rely only on writing, especially if we include "I so love soulove."[18]

The soul's existence can thus be thrown into question (mise en cause) – that's the right term with which to ask whether it's not an effect of love. In effect, as long as the soul souloves the soul (l'âme âme l'âme), sex is not involved. Sex doesn't count here. The elaboration from which the soul results is "hommosexual,"[19] as is perfectly legible in history.

What I said earlier about the soul's courage and patience in bearing the world is the true warrant (répondant) of what makes Aristotle, in his search for the Good, come up with the following – each of the beings in the world can only orient itself toward the greatest being by confounding its good, its [16] He (or it) can do little.

[17] Lacan here is combining aimer, "to love," and âme, "soul."

[18] The French, jamais j'âmais, literally means "Never did I soulove," which could also be rendered as "Never did I so soulove."

[19] Hommosexuelle is a play on homme, "man," and "homosexual."

own good, with that with which the Supreme Being shines. What Aristotle evokes with the term φιλία, namely, what represents the possibility of a bond (lien) of love between two of these beings, can also, manifesting the tension toward the Supreme Being, be reversed in the way in which I expressed it – it is in their courage in bearing the intolerable relationship to the Supreme Being that friends, φίλοι, recognize and choose each other. This ethics is manifestly "beyondsex" (hors-sexe),[20] so much so that I would like to give it the accent that Maupassant provides by enunciating somewhere in his work the strange term "Horla."[21] The "Beyondsex" (Horsexe) is the man about whom the soul speculated.

But it turns out that women too are in soulove (âmoureuses), in other 79 words, that they soulove the soul. What can that soul be that they soulove in their partner, who is nevertheless homo to the hilt, from which they cannot get away? That can only, in effect, lead them to this final term – and it is not for nothing that I call it as I do – ὑστερια, as it is said in Greek, hysteria, namely, to play the part of the man (faire l'homme),[22] as I have said, being thus hommosexual or beyondsex themselves – it being henceforth difficult for them not to sense the impasse that consists in the fact that they love each other as the same (elles se mêment)[23] in the Other, for, indeed, there is no need to know you are Other to be there (il n'y a pas besoin de se savoir Autre pour en être).

So that the soul may come into being, woman is differentiated from it right from the beginning. She is called woman (on la dit-femme) and defamed (diffâme).[24] The most famous (fameux) things that have come down to us about women in history are, strictly speaking, what one can say that is infamous (infamant).[25] It is true that she retains the honor of Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchuses. There's no need to speak of Cornelia to analysts, who hardly ever think of her, but speak to them of any old Cornelia and they'll

[20] Or "outside of sex."

[21] Guy de Maupassant's short story, "Le Horla," can be found in the Oeuvres complètes de Guy de Maupassant (Paris: Louis Conard, 1927), volume 18, pp. 3–48; in English, see The Life of Henri René Guy de Maupassant (New York: M. Walter Dunne, 1903), volume 2, pp. 1–35.

[22] Faire l'homme means both "to make the man" (e.g., make a man of him) and "to play the man's part"; both meanings may perhaps be expressed in the English "to constitute a man."

[23] This neologistic expression is based on elles s'aiment – "they love themselves or each other" – and même, which means same in this context. The expression seems to suggest that they find themselves to be the same (in the Other) and love each other for their similarities or love themselves in each other. The last few words of the sentence, pour en être, could also be translated as "to be part of it" or "to participate in it."

[24] Dit-femme and diffâme are homonyms in French; the latter also contains âme, "soul."

[25] Infamant also means "defamatory." Phonemically speaking, fameux and infamant both contain femme, "woman."

tell you that it won't be very good for her children, the Gracchuses (Gracques) – they'll tell whoppers (craques) until the end of their existence.

That was the beginning of my letter, an âmusement.

Next I made an allusion to courtly love, which appeared at the time at which hommosexual âmusement had fallen into supreme decadence, in that sort of impossible bad dream known as feudalism. At that level of political degeneracy, it must have become perceptible that, for woman, there was something that could no longer work at all.

The invention of courtly love is not at all the fruit of what people are historically used to symbolizing with the "thesis-antithesis-synthesis." There wasn't the slightest synthesis afterward, of course – in fact, there never is. Courtly love shone as brightly as a meteor in history and afterward we witnessed the return of all the bric-a-brac of a supposed renaissance of stale antiquities. Courtly love has remained enigmatic.

Here there is a little parenthesis – when one gives rise to two (quand un fait deux), there is never a return. They don't revert to making one again, even if it is a new one. Aufhebung is one of philosophy's pretty little dreams.

After the meteor of courtly love, what relegated courtly love to its original futility came from an entirely different partition. It required nothing less than scientific discourse, that is, something that owes nothing to the presuppositions of antiquity's soul.

And it is from that alone that psychoanalysis emerged, namely, the objectivization of the fact that the speaking being still spends time speaking to no avail (en pure perte). He still spends time speaking for a purpose that is among the shortest-lived – the shortest-lived, I say, because it is no more than still (encore) underway. In other words, it will continue only as long as it takes for it to finally be resolved – that's what we have coming to us – demographically.

80 That is not at all what will fix man's relationship with women. It is Freud's genius to have seen that. Freud, what a funny name – Kraft durch Freud, it's a whole platform! It is the funniest leap in the sacred farce of history. One could, perhaps, while this turning point lasts, have an inkling of something that concerns the Other, insofar as woman deals with it.

I am providing now an essential complement to something that has already been very clearly seen, but that would be clarified by seeing by what pathways it was seen.

What was seen, but only regarding men, is that what they deal with is object a, and that the whole realization of the sexual relationship leads to fantasy. It was seen, of course, regarding neurotics. How do neurotics make love? That is the question with which people began. They couldn't help but notice that there was a correlation with the perversions – which supports my a, because a is what is there as the cause, whatever the said perversion.

What is amusing is that Freud at first attributed the perversions to women – see the Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality. That is truly a confirmation that, when one is a man, one sees in one's partner what one props oneself up on, what one is propped up by narcissistically.

But people had the opportunity after that to notice that the perversions, such as we believe we discern them in neurosis, are not that at all. Neurosis consists in dreaming, not perverse acts. Neurotics have none of the characteristics of perverts. They simply dream of being perverts, which is quite natural, for how else could they attain their partner?

People then began to meet perverts – they're the ones Aristotle didn't want to see at all costs. There is in them a subversion of behavior based on a savoir-faire, which is linked to knowledge (savoir), knowledge of the nature of things – there is a direct connection between sexual behavior and its truth, namely, its amorality. Put some soul at the beginning of that – âmorality. . . .

There is a morality – that is the consequence – of sexual behavior. The morality of sexual behavior is what is implicit in (sous-entendu) everything that has been said about the Good.

But endlessly saying good things leads to Kant where morality shows its true colors. That is what I felt I needed to lay out in an article, "Kant with Sade" – morality admits that it is Sade.

You can write Sade however you like: either with a capital S, to render homage to the poor idiot who gave us interminable writings on that subject – or with a lower-case s, for, in the final analysis, that's morality's way of being agreeable, and in old French, that is what that means[26] – or, still better, you can write it as çade, since one must, after all, say that morality ends at the level of the id (ça), which doesn't go very far. Stated differently, the point is that love is impossible and the sexual relationship drops into the abyss of 81 nonsense, which doesn't in any way diminish the interest we must have in the Other.

What we want to know – in what constitutes feminine jouissance insofar as it is not wholly occupied with man, and even insofar, I will say, as it is not, as such, at all occupied with him – what we want to know is the status of the Other's knowledge (son savoir).[27]

If the unconscious has taught us anything, it is first of all that somewhere

[26] The old French adjective, sade, out of use since the sixteenth century, meant "agreeable" (in reference to persons or things).

[27] The French here could mean "her knowledge," but given the fact that woman is not the grammatical subject of the sentence, and given the context of the preceding and subsequent sentences, "its knowledge" seems more likely, referring thus to the Other. In preceding chapters, however, Lacan raised the question of what woman knows of her jouissance; in any case, later in this section he equates the question of her knowledge with the question of the Other's knowledge.

in the Other it knows (ça sait). It knows because it is based precisely on those signifiers with which the subject constitutes himself.

Now that leads to confusion, because it is difficult for whoever souloves not to think that everything in the world knows what it has to do. If Aristotle props up his God with the unmoving sphere on the basis of which everyone must pursue his good, it is because that sphere is supposed to know what is good for it. That is what the break (faille) induced by scientific discourse obliges us to do without.

There is no need to know why – we no longer have any need whatsoever for the knowledge Aristotle situates at the origin. In order to explain the effects of gravitation, we don't need to assume the stone knows where it must land. Imputing a soul to animals makes knowing the act par excellence of nothing other than the body – you see that Aristotle wasn't completely off the wall – except that the body is made for an activity, an ἐνέργεια, and that somewhere the entelechy of this body is based on the substance he calls the soul.

Analysis allows for this confusion by restoring the final cause, by making us say that, as concerns everything at least related to speaking beings, reality is like that – in other words, phantasmatic. Is that something that can, in any way whatsoever, satisfy scientific discourse?

There is, according to analytic discourse, an animal that happens to be endowed with the ability to speak (qui se trouve parlant) and who, because he inhabits the signifier, is thus a subject of it.[28] Henceforth, everything is played out for him at the level of fantasy, but at the level of a fantasy that can be perfectly disarticulated in a way that accounts for the following – that he knows a lot more about things than he thinks when he acts. But this isn't tantamount to the beginnings of a cosmology.

That is the eternal ambiguity of the term "unconscious." Certainly, the unconscious is presupposed on the basis of the fact that there is, somewhere in the speaking being, something that knows more about things than he does, but this is not an acceptable model of the world. Psychoanalysis, insofar as it derives its very possibility from the discourse of science, is not a cosmology, though it suffices for man to dream for him to see reemerge this immense bric-a-brac, this cluttered storeroom with which he has to make do, which assuredly makes a soul of him, a soul that is occasionally lovable when something is willing to love it.

A woman can, as I said, love in a man only the way in which he faces the 82 knowledge thanks to which (dont)[29] he souloves. But, concerning the knowledge thanks to which (dont) he is, the question is raised on the basis of the fact that there is something, jouissance, regarding which (dont) it is not possible to say whether a woman can say anything about it, whether she can say what she knows about it.

[28] Or "is thus subjected to it."

[29] Dont is an extremely versatile pronoun that can be translated in many ways: "of which," "by which," "with which," "about which," "whose," etc.

At the end of today's lecture, I have thus arrived, as always, at the edge of what polarized my subject, namely, whether the question of what she knows about it can be raised. That is no different from the question whether the term she gets off on (dont elle jouit) beyond all this "playing" (jouer) that constitutes her relationship to man – the term I call the Other, signifying it with an A – whether this term knows anything. For it is in this respect that she herself is subjugated (sujette) to the Other, just as much as man.

Does the Other know?

There was someone named Empedocles – as if by chance, Freud uses him from time to time like a corkscrew – of whose work we know but three lines, but Aristotle draws the consequences of them very well when he enunciates that, in the end, God was the most ignorant of all beings according to Empedocles, because he knew nothing of hatred. That is what the Christians later transformed into floods of love. Unfortunately, that doesn't fit, because not to know hatred in the least is not to know love in any way either. If God does not know hatred, according to Empedocles, it is clear that he knows less about it than mortals.

The upshot is that one could say that the more a man can believe a woman confuses him with God, in other words, what she enjoys, the less he hates (haie), the less he is (est) – both spellings are intended[30] – and since, after all, there is no love without hate, the less he loves.

March 13, 1973

[30] Lacan is playing here on the equivalent pronunciation of est and haie.

83

VIII

Knowledge and truth

HATELOVING (L'HAINAMORATION).
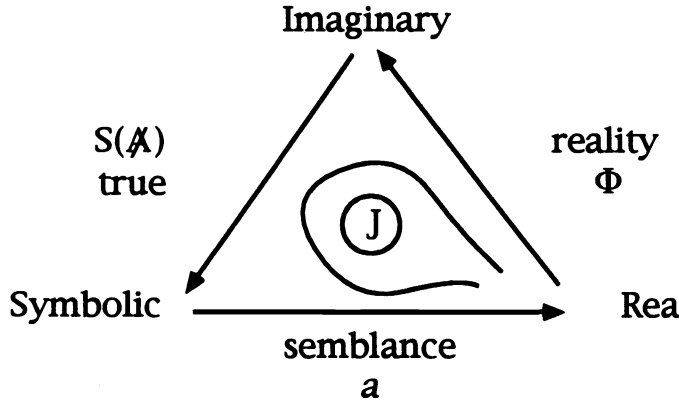
KNOWLEDGE ABOUT TRUTH.
CONTINGENCY OF THE PHALLIC FUNCTION.
FREUD'S CHARITY.
GETTING OFF ON KNOWLEDGE.
THE UNCONSCIOUS AND WOMAN.



I would really like it if, from time to time, I had a response, even a protest.

I left rather worried the last time, to say the least. It seemed altogether bearable to me, nevertheless, when I reread what I had said – that's my way of saying that it was very good. But I wouldn't be displeased if someone could attest to having understood something. It would be enough for a hand to go up for me to give that hand the floor, so to speak.

I see that no one is putting a hand up, and thus I must go on.

84

1

What I will willingly write for you today as "hainamoration"[1] is the depth (relief) psychoanalysis was able to introduce in order to situate the zone of [1] Hainamoration is composed of the noun haine ("hate") and the adjective énamoré ("enamored"). "Depth" probably isn't the best translation for relief three words further on; other possible translations include "profile," "terrain," "ground," "outline," and so on.

its experience. It was evidence of good will on its part. If only it had been able to call it by some other name than the bastardized one of "ambivalence," perhaps it would have succeeded better in shaking up the historical setting in which it inserted itself. But perhaps that was modesty on its part.

I mentioned last time that it's no accident Freud arms himself with Empedocles' statement that God must be the most ignorant of all beings, since he does not know hatred. The question of love is thus linked to that of knowledge. I added that Christians transformed God's non-hatred into a mark of love. It is here that analysis reminds us that one knows nothing of love without hate. Well, if the knowledge (connaissance) that has been fomented over the course of the centuries disappoints us, and if today we must overhaul the function of knowledge, it is perhaps because hatred has never been put in its proper place.

True, that doesn't seem to be the most desirable thing to mention. That's why I ended last time with the sentence, "One could say that the more a man believes a woman confuses him with God, in other words, what she enjoys," recall the schema I presented last time, "the less he hates," and simultaneously, "the less he is," in other words, in this business, "the less he loves."[2] I wasn't too happy about having ended on that note, which is nevertheless a truth. That is why today I will examine once more in what respect the true and the real apparently get confused.[3]

"The true aims at the real" – that statement is the fruit of a long reduction of pretensions to truth. Wherever truth presents itself, asserts itself as if it were an ideal that could be based on speech,[4] it is not so easily attained. If analysis rests on a presumption, it is that knowledge about truth can be constituted on the basis of its experience.

In the little writing (gramme) I gave you of analytic discourse, a is written in the upper left-hand corner, and is supported by S_2, in other words, by knowledge insofar as it is in the place of truth. It is from that point that it[5] interrogates $, which must lead to the production of S_1, that is, of the signifier by which can be resolved what? Its relation to truth.

$$\frac{a}{S_2} \rightarrow \frac{$}{S_1}$$

Schema of Analytic Discourse

Truth, let us say, to go right to the quick, is originally ἀλήθεια, a term 85 about which Heidegger speculated extensively. Emet, the Hebrew term, is,

[2] Lacan has slightly changed his formulation since the last time.
[3] The French here, se confond, could also be translated as "overlap."
[4] Or "an ideal of which speech could be the medium (or prop)."
[5] "It" here seems to refer to a, but could grammatically refer to S_2 or knowledge.

like every term for truth, of juridical origin. Even in our times, a witness is asked to tell the truth, nothing but the truth, and, what's more, the whole truth, if he can – but how, alas, could he? We demand of him the whole truth about what he knows. But, in fact, what is sought – especially in legal testimony – is that on the basis of which one can judge his jouissance.[6] The goal is that jouissance be avowed, precisely insofar as it may be unavowable. The truth sought is the one that is unavowable with respect to the law that regulates jouissance.

It is also in that sense that, in Kant's terms, the problem is raised of what a free man should do when one proposes to him all the jouissances if he denounces the enemy who the tyrant fears is disputing his jouissance. From the imperative that nothing pathetic[7] should dictate testimony, must we deduce that a free man ought to tell the tyrant the truth, even if that means delivering the enemy or rival into the tyrant's hands by his truthfulness? The reservations sparked in all of us by Kant's answer, which is affirmative, stem from the fact that the whole truth is what cannot be told. It is what can only be told on the condition that one doesn't push it to the edge, that one only half-tells (mi-dire) it.

Yet another thing restrains (ligote) us regarding the status of truth: the fact that jouissance is a limit. This is related to the very structure that was evoked by my "quadripodes" at the time at which I constructed them for you – jouissance is questioned (s'interpelle), evoked, tracked, and elaborated only on the basis of a semblance.

Love itself, as I stressed last time, is addressed to the semblance. And if it is true that the Other is only reached if it attaches itself (qu'à s'accoler), as I said last time, to a, the cause of desire, then love is also addressed to the semblance of being. That there-being[8] is not nothing. It is attributed to (supposé à)[9] that object that is a.

Shouldn't we find anew here the trace that, insofar as such, it (cor)responds to some imaginary? I have expressly designated that imaginary as I (*l'*I), isolated here from the term "imaginary." It is only on the basis of the clothing of the self-image that envelops the object cause of desire that the object relationship[10] is most often sustained – that is the very articulation of analysis.

[6] Ce qu'il en est de sa jouissance literally means "how things stand with his jouissance," or "the status or state of his jouissance."

[7] "Pathetic" in the Kantian sense of an emotional attachment to a person or thing.

[8] The French here, cet être-là, literally "that being over there" or "the being just mentioned," also plays off of the French term for Dasein: être-là, "being-there." Qu'à s'accoler in the last sentence could also be rendered as "if one attaches oneself."

[9] Supposé à would more literally be translated as "assumed in" or "presupposed in."

[10] Rapport objectal is not the same as the usual term for object relations in French, relation d'objet.

The affinity of a to its envelope is one of the major conjunctions put forward by psychoanalysis. To me it essentially introduces a point about which we must be suspicious.

This is where the real distinguishes itself. The real can only be inscribed on the basis of an impasse of formalization. That is why I thought I could provide a model of it using mathematical formalization, inasmuch as it is the most advanced elaboration we have by which to produce signifierness. The mathematical formalization of signifierness runs counter to meaning – I almost said "à contre-sens."[11] In our times, philosophers of mathematics say "it means nothing" concerning mathematics, even when they are mathematicians themselves, like Russell. 86

And yet, compared to a philosophy that culminates in Hegel's discourse – a plenitude of contrasts dialectized in the idea of an historical progression, which, it must be said, nothing substantiates for us – can't the formalization of mathematical logic, which is based only on writing (l'écrit), serve us in the analytic process, in that what invisibly holds (retient) bodies is designated therein?

If I were allowed to give an image for this, I would easily take that which, in nature, seems to most closely approximate the reduction to the dimensions of the surface writing (l'écrit) requires, at which Spinoza himself marveled – the textual work that comes out of the spider's belly, its web. It is a truly miraculous function to see, on the very surface emerging from an opaque point of this strange being, the trace of these writings taking form, in which one can grasp the limits, impasses, and dead ends that show the real acceding to the symbolic.

That is why I do not believe that it was in vain that I eventually came up with the inscriptions (l'écriture) a, the $$$ of the signifier, A, and Φ. Their very writing constitutes a medium (support) that goes beyond speech, without going beyond language's actual effects. Its value lies in centering the symbolic, on the condition of knowing how to use it, for what? To retain[12] a congruous truth – not the truth that claims to be whole, but that of the half-telling (mi-dire), the truth that is borne out by guarding against going as far as avowal, which would be the worst, the truth that becomes guarded starting right with (dès) the cause of desire.

2

Analysis presumes that desire is inscribed on the basis of a corporal contingency.

[11] Contre-sens literally means "counter meaning," "counter direction," "against the tide or current," etc.; figuratively, it means "contradiction."

[12] Retenir can mean "to hold," "reserve," "retain," "keep," "carry," "accept," and so on, as well as to "hold back," "check," "stop," "keep back," etc.

Let me remind you what I base this term "contingency" on. The phallus – as analysis takes it up as the pivotal or extreme point of what is enunciated as the cause of desire – analytic experience stops not writing it. It is in this "stops not being written" (cesse de ne pas s'écrire)[13] that resides the apex of what I have called contingency.

Analytic experience encounters its terminus (terme) here, for the only thing it can produce, according to my writing (gramme), is S_1. I think you still remember the clamor I managed to stir up last time by designating this signifier, S_1, as the signifier of even the most idiotic jouissance – in the two senses of the term, the idiot's jouissance, which certainly functions as a reference here, and also the oddest jouissance.[14]

The necessary is introduced to us by the "doesn't stop" (ne cesse pas). The "doesn't stop" of the necessary is the "doesn't stop being written" (ne cesse pas de s'écrire). Analysis of the reference to the phallus apparently leads us to this necessity.

87 The "doesn't stop not being written," on the contrary, is the impossible, as I define it on the basis of the fact that it cannot in any case be written, and it is with this that I characterize the sexual relationship – the sexual relationship doesn't stop not being written.

Because of this, the apparent necessity of the phallic function turns out to be mere contingency. It is as a mode of the contingent that the phallic function stops not being written. What submits the sexual relationship to being, for speaking beings, but the regime of the encounter is tantamount to contingency. It is only as contingency that, thanks to psychoanalysis, the phallus, reserved in ancient times to the Mysteries, has stopped not being written. Nothing more. It has not entered into the "doesn't stop," that is, into the field on which depend necessity, on the one hand, and impossibility.[15]

The true thus attests here that by making us beware the imaginary, as it does, it has a lot to do with "a-natomy."

It is, in the final analysis, from a depreciatory perspective that I contribute the three terms I write as a, $S(\not A)$, and Φ. They are written on the triangle constituted by the Imaginary, the Symbolic, and the Real.[16]

To the right is the scant reality (peu-de-réalité)[17] on which the pleasure

[13] S'écrire could less idiomatically be translated as "to write itself" or "writing itself."

[14] The Greek root of "idiot," ιδιότης, means "particular" or "peculiar."

[15] I have left out two words before "impossibility," plus haut, which are quite vague and could be rendered as "higher up" or "above that" (as if Lacan were referring to a diagram), or as "before that" or "prior to that."

[16] See the triangle on the first page of this chapter.

[17] Cf. André Breton's use of this term in "Discours sur le peu de réalité" in his Oeuvres complètes (Paris: Pléaïdes, 1993), vol. 2.

principle is based, which is such that everything we are allowed to approach by way of reality remains rooted in fantasy.

On the other side, what is S(Ⱥ) but the impossibility of telling the whole truth (tout le vrai), about which I spoke earlier?

Lastly, the symbolic, directing itself toward the real, shows us the true nature of object a. If I qualified it earlier as a semblance of being, it is because it seems to give us the basis (support) of being. In everything elaborated on being and even on essence, in Aristotle's work for example, we can see, if we read it on the basis of analytic experience, that object a is what is at stake. Contemplation, for example, Aristotelian contemplation, is based on the gaze, as I defined it in The Four Fundamental Concepts of Psychoanalysis, as one of the four media (supports) that constitute the cause of desire.

With such a "graphicization" – not to say "graph," because that term has a precise meaning in mathematical logic – we see the correspondences that make the real an open [set] between semblance, a result of the symbolic, and reality as it is based on the concreteness of human life: on what leads men, on what makes them always run headlong down the same pathways, and on what is such that the yet-to-be-born (encore-à-naître) will never yield anything but l'encorné.[18]

On the other side we have a. Being on the right path, overall, it would have us take it for being, in the name of the following – that it is apparently something. But it only dissolves (se résout), in the final analysis, owing to its failure, unable, as it is, to sustain itself in approaching the real.

The true, then, of course, is that. Except that it is never reached except by twisted pathways. To appeal to the true, as we are often led to do, is 88 simply to recall that one must not make the mistake of believing that we are already at the level of semblance (dans le semblant). Before the semblance, on which, in effect, everything is based and springs back in fantasy, a strict distinction must be made between the imaginary and the real. It must not be thought that we ourselves in any way serve as a basis for the semblance. We are not even semblance. We are, on occasion, that which can occupy that place, and allow what to reign there? Object a.

Indeed, the analyst, of all [those whose] orders of discourse are sustained currently (actuellement)[19] – and that word is not nothing, provided we give "action" its full Aristotelian meaning – is the one who, by putting object a in the place of semblance, is in the best position to do what should rightfully (juste) be done, namely, to investigate the status of truth as knowledge.

[18] L'encorné is "someone with horns," a reference to someone who has been cheated on: a cuckold. L'encore-né ("the reborn") is a homonym.

[19] There is a problem of grammatical structure in this sentence, as Lacan compares the analyst as a person, instead of analytic discourse, to other orders of discourse.

3

What is knowledge? It is strange that, prior to Descartes, the question of knowledge had never been raised. Analysis had to come onto the scene before this question was raised afresh.

Analysis came to announce to us that there is knowledge that is not known, knowledge that is based on the signifier as such. A dream does not introduce us into any kind of unfathomable experience or mystery – it is read in what is said about it, and one can go further by taking up the equivocations therein in the most anagrammatic sense of the word ["equivocations"]. It is regarding that aspect of language that Saussure raised the question whether the strange punctuation marks he found in the saturnine verses were intentional or not.[20] That is where Saussure was awaiting Freud. And it is where the question of knowledge is raised afresh.

If you will excuse me for borrowing from an entirely different register, that of the virtues inaugurated by the Christian religion, there is here a sort of belated effect, an offshoot of charity. Wasn't it charitable of Freud to have allowed the misery of speaking beings to say to itself that there is – since there is the unconscious – something transcendent, truly transcendent, which is but what the species inhabits, namely, language? Wasn't there, yes, charity in the fact of announcing the news that his everyday life has, in language, a more reasonable basis than it seemed before, and that there is already some wisdom – unattainable object of a vain pursuit – there?

Do we need this whole detour to raise the question of knowledge in the form, "What is it that knows?" Do we realize that it is the Other? – such as I posited it at the outset, as a locus in which the signifier is posited, and without which nothing indicates to us that there is a dimension of truth anywhere, a dit-mension, the residence of what is said, of this said (dit) whose knowledge posits the Other as locus. The status of knowledge 89 implies as such that there already is knowledge, that it is in the Other, and that it is to be acquired (à prendre). That is why it is related to learning (fait d'apprendre).

The subject results from the fact that this knowledge must be learned, and even have a price put on it – in other words, it is its cost that values it, not as exchange but as use. Knowledge is worth just as much as it costs (coûte), a pretty penny (beau-coût),[21] in that it takes elbow grease[22] and that it's difficult. Difficult to what? Less to acquire it than to enjoy it (d'en jouir).

In the enjoying, the conquest of this knowledge is renewed every time it [20] A probable reference to Verlaine's Poèmes saturniens (1866).

[21] Beau-coût sounds just like beaucoup in French.
[22] The French here, qu'il faille y mettre de sa peau, could also be translated as "one must pay with one's hide (or skin)" or "one must pay in blood."

is exercised, the power it yields always being directed toward its jouissance.

It is strange that it has never been brought out clearly that the meaning of knowledge resides altogether in the fact that the difficulty of its exercise is the very thing that increases the difficulty of its acquisition. That is because, with every exercise of this acquisition, we find anew that there's no point asking which of these repetitions was the first to have been learned.

Of course there are things that run and that certainly seem to work like little machines – they are called computers. I am willing to accept the notion that a computer thinks. But that it knows, who would say such a thing? For the foundation of knowledge is that the jouissance of its exercise is the same as that of its acquisition.

Here we encounter in a sure manner, surer than in Marx's own work, the true nature of use value, since in Marx's work use value serves only as an ideal point in relation to exchange value, to which everything is reduced.

Let us talk about this learned (appris) that is not based on exchange. With Marx's knowledge of politics – which is not nothing – one cannot do "commarxe,"[23] if you will allow me. No more than one can, with Freud's knowledge, defraud.

One has but to look to see that, wherever one does not come by such knowledge (ces savoirs) by pounding it into one's head by tough experience, it falls flat. It can neither be imported nor exported. There is no information that stands up unless it is shaped for use (formé à l'usage).

Thus is deduced the fact that knowledge is in the Other and owes nothing to being except that the latter has borne (véhiculé) the letter thereof. From whence it results that being can kill where the letter reproduces, but never reproduces the same, never the same being of knowledge.

I think you must have an inkling now of the function I grant the letter in relation to knowledge. I beg you not to too quickly associate this function with so-called messages, for it makes the letter analogous to a germ cell, which, in the realm of molecular physiology, must be strictly separated from the bodies with respect to which it transmits (véhicule) life and death together.

Marx and Lenin, Freud and Lacan are not coupled in being. It is via the letter they found in the Other that, as beings of knowledge, they proceed two by two, in a supposed Other. What is new about their knowledge is that it doesn't presume the Other knows anything about it – certainly not the 90 being who constituted the letter there[24] – for it is clearly on the basis of the [23] A combination of commerce and Marx.

[24] The French here, l'être qui y a fait lettre, could also be translated as "the being who played the part of (or became) the letter there." The words I have translated as "it doesn't presume the Other knows anything about it," n'en est pas supposé que l'Autre en sache rien, could also be translated as "it doesn't presume the Other knows nothing about it."

Other (de l'Autre)[25] that he constituted the letter at his own expense, at the price of his being, which, by God, is not nothing at all for each of us, but not a whole lot either, to tell the truth.

I'm going to tell you a little secret about those beings from which the letter is wrought (d'où se fait la lettre). Despite everything people have said, for example, about Lenin, I don't think either hate or love, hainamoration, has ever really killed (étouffé) anyone. Don't tell me stories about Mrs. Freud! On that score, I have Jung's testimony. He told the truth. Indeed, that was his flaw – he told nothing but that.

Those who still manage to make those kinds of rejections of being are really the ones who partake of scorn (mépris). I will make you write it this time, since today I'm having fun, méprix.[26] That makes uniprix. We live in the age of supermarkets, so one must know what one is capable of producing, even by way of being.

The hitch is that the Other, the locus, knows nothing. One can no longer hate God if he himself knows nothing – in particular, of what is going on. When one could hate him, one could believe he loved us, since he didn't hate us in return. This is not apparent, despite the fact that, in certain cases, people went at it full speed ahead.

Lastly, as I come to the end of these discourses that I have the strength to pursue before you, I would like to tell you an idea that came to me, about which I have reflected just a little bit. The misfortune of Christ is explained to us by the idea of saving men. I find, rather, that the idea was to save God by giving a little presence and actuality back to that hatred of God regarding which we are, and for good reason, rather indecisive (mous).

That is why I say that the imputation of the unconscious is an incredible act of charity. The subjects know, they know. But all the same, they don't know everything. At the level of this not-everything (pas-tout), only the Other doesn't know. It is the Other who constitutes the not-everything, precisely in that the Other is the part of the not-at-all-knowledgeable (pas-savant-du-tout)[27] in the not-everything.

Thus, it may momentarily be convenient to make the Other responsible for this, to which analysis leads in the most avowed manner, though no one realizes it: if libido is only masculine, it is only from where the dear woman [25] Or "from the Other." It is not clear to me what il here (rendered by "he") refers to.

[26] Prix itself means "price," and thus méprix literally means "mispriced." Uniprix (in the next sentence) is the name of a French supermarket and literally means "one price" or "united price." "Supermarkets" (in the sentence after that) is in English in the original.

[27] The French here could also be translated as "not-knowledgeable-of-the-whole."

is whole, in other words, from the place from which man sees her, that the dear woman can have an unconscious.

And what does it help her do?[28] It helps her, as everyone knows, make the speaking being, who is reduced here to man, speak, in other words – I don't know if you have noticed this in analytic theory – it helps her exist only as mother. She has unconscious effects, but her unconscious – at the limit point at which she is not responsible for everyone's unconscious, in other words, at the point at which the Other she deals with, the Other with a capital O, works in such a way that she knows nothing, because the Other knows even less, given how difficult it is to even maintain its existence – this 91 unconscious, what can we say of it, if not to sustain with Freud that it doesn't leave her sitting pretty?

The last time, I played (joué), as I allow myself to do, on the equivocation, a bit farfetched, between il hait (he hates) and il est (he is). I enjoy (jouis) that equivocation only insofar as I ask whether it is worthy of a pair of scissors. That is precisely what is at stake in castration.

That being as such may provoke hatred cannot be ruled out. Certainly, Aristotle's whole concern was, on the contrary, to conceive of being as that by which beings with less being participate in the highest of beings. And Saint Thomas succeeded in reintroducing that into the Christian tradition – which is not surprising given that, having spread among the Gentiles, the Christian tradition had necessarily been thoroughly shaped thereby, the upshot being that one had but to pull the strings for it to work again. But do people realize that everything in the Jewish tradition goes against that? The dividing line (coupure) there does not run from the most perfect to the least perfect. The least perfect there is quite simply what it is, namely, radically imperfect, and one must but obey with the finger and the eye, if I dare express myself thus, he who bears the name Jahve, and several other names to boot. The latter chose his people and one cannot go against that.

Isn't it revealed therein that it is far better to betray him occasionally than to "be-thrate" him (l'être-haïr),[29] the former being what the Jews obviously did not deprive themselves of doing. They couldn't work it out (en sortir) any other way.

On the subject of hatred, we're so deadened (étouffés) that no one realizes that a hatred, a solid hatred, is addressed to being, to the very being of someone who is not necessarily God.

We remain stuck – and that is why I said that a is a semblance of being –

[28] The French, à quoi ça lui sert, could also be translated as "what good does it do her" or "what purpose does it serve for her."

[29] Lacan here combines the verbs to be and to hate, but l'ê tre-haïr can also be heard as le trahir, "to betray him."

at the level – and it is in that respect that analysis, as always, is a little bit lame – of the notion of jealous hatred, the hatred that springs forth from "jealouissance," the hatred that "sprimages forth" (s'imageaillisse)[30] from the gaze of the little guy observed by Saint Augustine. Augustine is there as a third party. He observes the little guy and, pallidus, the latter pales in observing the conlactaneum suum hanging on the nipple. Fortunately, this [jealouissance] is the first substitute jouissance, according to Freud – the desire evoked on the basis of a metonymy that is inscribed on the basis of a presumed demand, addressed to the Other, that is, on the basis of the kernel[31] of what I called Ding, in my seminar, The Ethics of Psychoanalysis, namely, the Freudian Thing, in other words, the very neighbor (prochain) Freud refuses to love beyond certain limits.

The child who is gazed at has it – he has the a. Is having the a the same as being it? That is the question with which I will leave you today.

March 20, 1973

92

Complement

Beginning of the next class: THE LINGUIST'S POSITION.

I hardly ever talk about what comes out when it is something by me, especially since I generally have to wait so long for it that my interest in it wanes. Nevertheless, it wouldn't be bad for next time if you read something I entitled "L'Étourdit," that begins with the distance there is between the saying (dire) and the said (dit).

The fact that being may reside only in what is said (Qu'il n'y ait d'être que dans le dit) is a question I'll leave open. It is certain that nothing is said but of being (il n'y a du dit que de l'être), yet that does not imply the inverse. On the contrary, and this is something I have said (mon dire), the unconscious is only on the basis of what is said (il n'y a de l'inconscient que du dit). We can deal with the unconscious only on the basis of what is said, of what is said by the analysand. That is a saying (dire).

How to say it? That is the question. One cannot speak any old which way, and that is the problem of whoever inhabits language, namely, all of us.

[30] S'imageaillisse contains s'image and jaillisse and seems to suggest a sort of springing forth from the image.

[31] The French here could be translated in many different ways due to the ambiguity of the thrice repeated de: le désir évoqué d'une métonymie qui s'inscrit d'une demande supposée, adressée à l'Autre, de ce noyau. . . . What I have thrice translated as "on the basis of" could be replaced by "from," "by," "of," or "due to." The third de could also be understood as linked to demande, thus suggesting the translation "a presumed demand, addressed to the Other, for the kernel. . . ." Noyau (kernel) could also be translated as "nucleus" or "core."

That is why today – regarding the gap I wanted to express one day by distinguishing what I do here from linguistics, the former being linguistricks – I asked someone, who to my great appreciation was willing to grant my request, to come today to tell you how things stand currently from the linguist's position. No one is better qualified than the person I present to you, Jean-Claude Milner, a linguist.

End of the class: thank-you's.

I don't know what I can do in the quarter of an hour that remains. I will take an ethical notion as my guide. Ethics, as perhaps can be glimpsed by those who heard me speak about it formerly, is closely related to our inhabiting of language, and it is also – as a certain author whom I will mention another time has laid it out – in the realm of gestures. When one inhabits language, there are gestures one makes, greeting (salutation) gestures, prostration gestures on occasion, and gestures of admiration when it is a question of another vanishing point (point de fuite) – beauty. That implies that things go no further. One makes a gesture and then one conducts oneself like everyone else, namely, like the rest of the riffraff (canailles).

Nevertheless, there are gestures and then there are gestures. The first gesture that is literally dictated to me by this ethical reference must be that of thanking Jean-Claude Milner for what he has told us concerning the present state of the fault line (faille) that is opening up in linguistics itself. That justifies perhaps a certain number of behaviors that we perhaps owe – I'm speaking for myself – only to a certain distance we were at from this 93 science on the rise, when it believed that it could become a science. It was truly urgent for us to obtain the information we have just received. Indeed, it is very hard not to realize that, regarding analytic technique, if the subject sitting across from us doesn't say anything, it is a difficulty concerning which the least one can say is that it is altogether unusual (spéciale).

What I put forward, by writing lalangue [llanguage] as one word, is that by which I distinguish myself from structuralism, insofar as the latter would like to integrate language into semiology – and that seems to me one of the numerous lights Jean-Claude Milner shed on things. As is indicated by the little book that I had you read entitled The Title of the Letter, what is at stake in everything I have put forward is the sign's subordination with respect to the signifier.

I must also take the time to render homage to Recanati who, in his intervention, certainly proved to me that I had been heard (entendu).[32] This can be seen in all the cutting-edge questions he raised – they are, in a sense, the questions for which I have the rest of the year to provide you with what I now have by way of a response. The fact that he ended on the question of Kierkegaard and Regine is absolutely exemplary. As I had hitherto made but a brief allusion to them, it was certainly his own contribution. One cannot better illustrate the way in which the ground-breaking I am engaging in before you resonates, than when someone grasps what is at stake. The questions he asked me will certainly be helpful in what I will say to you in what follows. I will ask him for the written text of his talk so that I can refer to it when I am about to respond.

[32] Entendu also means "understood."

He also referred to Berkeley, and it is insofar as there wasn't the slightest allusion to Berkeley in what I have enunciated before you that I am still more grateful to him. To tell you the whole story, I even took the trouble quite recently to find a first edition – you see I'm a bibliophile, but it's only books I want to read that I try to find first editions of – and thus, last Sunday, I again came across the Minute Philosopher, also known as Alciphron. It is clear that if Berkeley hadn't been among my earliest reading, many things, including my freewheeling use of linguistic references, probably wouldn't have been possible.

I would nevertheless like to say something concerning the schema Recanati had to erase earlier.[33] To be hysterical or not – that is truly the question. Is there One or not? In other words, this not-whole (pas-toute), in classical logic, seems to imply the existence of the One that constitutes (fait) an exception. Henceforth, it would be there that we would see the emergence in an abyss – and you will see why I qualify it thusly – of that existence, that at-least-one existence that, with regard to the function Φx, is inscribed in order to speak it (s'inscrit pour la dire).[34] For the property of what is said is 94 being, as I said earlier. But the property of the act of saying is to ex-sist in relation to any statement (dit) whatsoever.[35]

The question then arises whether, given a not-whole, an objection to the universal, something can result that would be enunciated as a particular that contradicts the universal – you can see that I am remaining here at the level of Aristotelian logic.[36]

In that logic, on the basis of the fact that one can write "not-every (pas-tout) x is inscribed in Φx," one deduces by way of implication that there is [33] Recanati apparently spoke at Lacan's seminar four months earlier, and thus it seems there may be an error in the French text here. Recanati had also mentioned Berkeley when he spoke at Lacan's Seminar the year before (June 14, 1972).

[34] La here could refer either to "existence" or "function," but "function" seems most likely.

[35] The French here reads exister, but the context seems to require ex-sister.

[36] As Aristotelian logic is usually understood, $\sim\forall x\Phi x$ (that is, not all x's such that phi of x) would normally imply $\exists x\sim\Phi x$ (that is, the existence of a particular x to which the phi function does not apply, of an x that denies universality).

an x that contradicts it. But that is true on one sole condition, which is that, in the whole or the not-whole in question, we are dealing with the finite. Regarding that which is finite, there is not simply an implication but a strict equivalence.[37] It is enough for there to be one that contradicts the universalizing formula for us to have to abolish that formula and transform it into a particular. The not-whole becomes the equivalent of that which, in Aristotelian logic, is enunciated on the basis of the particular. There is an exception. But we could, on the contrary, be dealing with the infinite. Then it is no longer from the perspective of extension that we must take up the not-whole (pas-toute). When I say that woman is not-whole and that that is why I cannot say Woman, it is precisely because I raise the question (je mets en question) of a jouissance that, with respect to everything that can be used[38] in the function Φx, is in the realm of the infinite.

Now, as soon as you are dealing with an infinite set, you cannot posit that the not-whole implies the existence of something that is produced on the basis of a negation or contradiction. You can, at a pinch, posit it as an indeterminate existence. But, as we know from the extension of mathematical logic, that mathematical logic which is qualified as intuitionist, to posit a "there exists," one must also be able to construct it, that is, know how to find where that existence is.

I base myself on that when I produce this quartering (écartèlement)[39] that posits an existence that Recanati has very well qualified as eccentric to the truth. This indetermination is suspended between $\exists x$ and $\overline{\exists x}$, between an existence that is found by affirming itself and woman insofar as she is not found,[40] which is confirmed by the case of Regine.

In closing, I will tell you something that will constitute, as is my wont, a bit of an enigma. If you reread somewhere something I wrote entitled "The Freudian Thing," you should find therein the following, that there is only one way to be able to write Woman without having to bar it – that is at the level at which woman is truth. And that is why one can only half-speak of her.

The article on which Jean-Claude Milner's exposé was based can be found in his book, Arguments linguistiques, pages 179–217 (Paris: Seuil, 1973).

April 10, 1973

[37] In other words, $\sim\forall x\Phi x = \exists x\sim\Phi x$.

[38] If the French here, se sert, is changed to the identically pronounced se serre, the words "can be used" could read "is encompassed."

[39] The French here means splitting up or quartering (as by horses), and refers no doubt to Lacan's four formulas of sexuation. The last few words of this sentence, excentrique à la vérité, could also be translated as "eccentric with respect to the truth."

[40] Elle ne se trouve pas can also mean "she does not find herself."

95

IX

On the Baroque

WHERE IT SPEAKS, IT ENJOYS, AND IT KNOWS NOTHING.

I think of you (Je pense à vous). That does not mean that I conceptualize you (je vous pense).

Perhaps someone here remembers that I once spoke of a language in which one would say, "I love to you" (j'aime à vous),[1] that language modeling itself better than others on the indirect character of that attack called love.

"I think of you" (Je pense à vous) already constitutes a clear objection to everything that could be called "human sciences" in a certain conception of science – not the kind of science that has been done for only a few centuries, but the kind that was defined in a certain way with Aristotle. The consequence is that one must wonder, regarding the crux (principe) of what analytic discourse has contributed, by what pathways the new science that is ours can proceed.

That implies that I first formulate where we are starting from. We are starting from what analytic discourse provides us, namely, the unconscious. That is why I will first refine for you a few formulations that are a bit tough going concerning where the unconscious stands with respect to traditional science. That will lead me to raise the following question: how is a science still possible after what can be said about the unconscious?

I will announce to you already that, as surprising as it may seem, that will lead me to talk to you today about Christianity.

1

I will begin with my difficult formulations, or at least I assume they must be difficult: "The unconscious is not the fact that being thinks" – though that is implied by what is said thereof in traditional science – "the unconscious is the fact that being, by speaking, enjoys, and," I will add, "wants to know nothing more about it." I will add that that means "know nothing about it at all."

[1] See Seminar XIX, February 9, 1972.

To immediately show you a card I could have made you wait a little while for – "there's no such thing as a desire to know," that famous Wissentrieb Freud points to somewhere.[2] 96

Freud contradicts himself there. Everything indicates – that is the meaning of the unconscious – not only that man already knows all he needs to know, but that this knowledge is utterly and completely limited to that insufficient jouissance constituted by the fact that he speaks.

You see that that implies a question regarding the status of the actual science we clearly possess that goes by the name of a physics. In what sense does this new science concern the real? The problem with the kind of science I qualify as traditional, because it comes to us from Aristotle's thought, is that it implies that what is thought of (le pensé)[3] is in the image of thought, in other words, that being thinks.

To take an example that is close to home for you, I will state that what makes what we call "human relations" bearable is not thinking about them.

It is on that point that what is comically called "behaviorism"[4] is ultimately based – behavior, according to behaviorism can be observed in such a way that it is clarified by its end. People hoped to found human sciences thereupon, encompassing all behavior, there being no intention of any subject presupposed therein. On the basis of a finality posited as the object of that behavior, nothing is easier – that object having its own regulation – than to imagine it in the nervous system.

The hitch is that behaviorism does nothing more than inject therein everything that has been elaborated philosophically, "Aristotlely," concerning the soul. And thus nothing changes. That is borne out by the fact that behaviorism has not, to the best of my knowledge, distinguished itself by any radical change in ethics, in other words, in mental habits, in the fundamental habit. Man, being but an object, serves an end. He is founded on the basis of his final cause – regardless of what we may think, it's still there – which, in this case, is to live or, more precisely, to survive, in other words, to postpone death and dominate his rival.

It is clear that the number of thoughts implicit in such a world view, such a "Weltanschauung" as they say, is utterly incalculable. What is at stake is the constant equation of thought and that which is thought of.[5]

[2] See, for example, SE VII, 194, where it is translated as "instinct for knowledge," and SE X, 245 where it is translated as "epistemophilic instinct."

[3] Le pensé (unlike la pensée, thought) is "that which is conceptualized."

[4] Whenever Lacan mentions behaviorism here, he uses the English term instead of the French comportementalisme.

[5] That is, of thought and the "reality" thought "thinks" or conceptualizes.

What is clearest about traditional science's way of thinking is what is called its "classicism" – namely, the Aristotelian reign of the class, that is, of the genus and the species, in other words, of the individual considered as specified. It is also the aesthetic that results therefrom, and the ethics that is ordained thereby. I will qualify that ethics in a simple way, an overly simple way that risks making you see red, that's the word for it, but you would be wrong to see too quickly – "thought is on the winning side (du côté du manche), and that which is thought of is on the other side," which can be read in the fact that the winner is speech – only speech explains and justifies (rend raison).[6]

97 In that sense, behaviorism does not leave behind the classical. It is the said winner (dit-manche) – the Sunday (dimanche)[7] of life, as Queneau says,[8] not without at the same time revealing therein being as abased.

It's not obvious at first. But what I will point out is that that Sunday was read and approved of by someone who, in the history of thought, knew quite a bit, namely, Kojève, and who recognized in it nothing less than absolute knowledge such as it is promised to us by Hegel.

2

As someone recently noticed, I am situated (je me range) – who situates me? is it him or is it me? that's a subtlety of llanguage[9] – I am situated essentially on the side of the baroque.

That is a reference point borrowed from the history of art. Since the history of art, just like history and just like art, is something that is related not to the winning side but to the sleeve (la manche),[10] in other words, to sleight of hand, I must, before going on, tell you what I mean by that – the subject, "I," being no more active in that "I mean" than in the "I am situated."

And that is what is going to make me delve into the history of Christianity. Weren't you expecting it?

[6] Du côté du manche also means "thought has the whiphand (or the upper hand)." Le manche literally means "handle," and the expression seems to imply "holding the reins." Rendre raison is usually used in the expression rendre raison de quelque chose à quelqu'un, "to explain or justify something to someone."

[7] With this neologism, dit-manche, Lacan is playing on the identical pronunciation of dimanche, "Sunday," and the combination of dit ("the said" or "spoken") and manche, "the winning side" (which also means "set" in tennis and "handle," as mentioned above).

[8] Le dimanche de la vie (literally, "The Sunday of Life") is the title of one of Raymond Queneau's novels.

[9] In French, je me range, could equally well mean "I situate myself" or "I am situated" (by someone else).

[10] La manche is a rubber (or round), as in the card game of bridge, or a sleeve; la Manche is the English Channel.

The baroque is, at the outset, the "storyette"[11] or little tale of Christ. I mean what history recounts about a man. Don't blow a fuse trying to figure it out – he himself designated himself as the Son of Man. That is reported by four texts said to be "evangelical," not so much because they bore good news as because (their authors) were announcers who were good at propagating their sort of news. It can also be understood that way, and that strikes me as more appropriate. They write in such a way that there is not a single fact that cannot be challenged therein – God knows that people naturally ran straight at the muleta. These texts are nonetheless what go right to the heart of truth, the truth as such, up to and including the fact I enunciate, that one can only say it halfway.

That is a simple indication. Their shocking success would imply that I take up these texts and give you lessons on the Gospels. You see what that would lead to.

I would do that to show you that those texts can best be grasped in light of the categories I have tried to isolate in analytic practice, namely, the symbolic, imaginary, and real.

To restrict our attention to the first, I enunciated that truth is the "dit-mension," the "mension" of what is said (la mension du dit).[12]

In this vein, you can't say it any better than the Gospels. You can't speak any better of the truth. That is why they are the Gospels. You can't even bring the dimension of truth into play any better, in other words, push away 98 reality in fantasy (mieux repousser la réalité dans le fantasme).[13]

After all, what followed demonstrated sufficiently – I am leaving behind the texts and will confine my attention to their effect – that this dit-mension stands up. It inundated what we call the world, bringing it back to its filthy truth (vérité d'immondice). It relayed what the Roman, a mason like no other, had founded on the basis of a miraculous, universal balance, including baths of jouissance sufficiently symbolized by those famous thermal baths of which only crumbled bits remain. We can no longer have the slightest idea to what extent, regarding jouissance, that took the cake. Christianity rejected all that to the abjection considered to be the world. It is thus not without an intimate affinity to the problem of the true that Christianity subsists.

That it is the true religion, as it claims, is not an excessive claim, all the more so in that, when the true is examined closely, it's the worst that can be said about it.

[11] The term Lacan uses here, historiole, seems to be a neologism.

[12] Mension is a neologism, combining the homonyms mansion (from the Latin mansio, "dwelling," which in French was the term for each part of a theater set in the Middle Ages) and mention ("mention," "note," or "honors," as in cum laude). It is also the last part of the word "dimension."

[13] Or "back reality into fantasy."

Once one enters into the register of the true, one can no longer exit it. In order to relegate the truth to the lowly status it deserves, one must have entered into analytic discourse. What analytic discourse dislodges[14] puts truth in its place, but does not shake it up. It is reduced, but indispensable. Hence its consolidation, against which nothing can prevail – except what still subsists of the wisdom traditions, though they have not confronted it, Taoism, for example, and other doctrines of salvation in which what is at stake is not truth but the pathway, as the very name "Tao" indicates, and to manage to prolong something that resembles it.

It is true that the storyette of Christ is presented, not as the enterprise of saving men, but as that of saving God. We must recognize that he who took on this enterprise, namely Christ, paid the price – that's the least we can say about it.

We should be surprised that the result seems to satisfy people. The fact that God is indissolubly three is such as to make us prejudge that the count "1-2-3" pre-existed him. One of the two following statements must be true: either he takes into account only the retroactive effect (l'après-coup) of Christian revelation, and it is his being that suffers a blow – or the three is prior to him, and it is his unity that takes a hit. Whence it becomes conceivable that God's salvation is precarious and ultimately dependent upon the goodwill of Christians.

What is amusing is obviously – I already told you this, but you didn't catch it – that atheism is tenable only to clerics.[15] It is far more difficult for lay people, whose innocence in that realm remains utter and complete. Recall poor Voltaire. He was a clever, agile, devious, and extraordinarily quick-witted guy, but was altogether worthy of being placed in the umbrella stand[16] across the way known as the Pantheon.

Freud fortunately gave us a necessary interpretation – it doesn't stop (ne 99 cesse pas) being written, as I define the necessary – of the murder of the son as founding the religion of grace.[17] He didn't say it quite like that, but he clearly noted that this murder was a mode of negation (dénégation) that constitutes a possible form of the avowal of truth.

That is how Freud saves the Father once again. In that respect he imitates Jesus Christ. Modestly, no doubt, since he doesn't pull out all the stops.

[14] This is, perhaps, a reference to Marie Bonaparte's reductionistic translation of Freud's Wo Es war, soll Ich werden: Le moi déloge le ça ("The ego dislodges the id").

[15] The French here, soutenable que par les clercs, could also be translated as "bearable only to clerics."

[16] The French here, vide-poches, literally refers to a small piece of furniture into which one empties one's pockets. Seminar XX was held in the law school across the square from the Pantheon.

[17] See SE XXI, 136.

But he contributes thereto, playing his little part as a good Jew who was not entirely up-to-date.

There are plenty like that.[18] We must regroup them in order to get them moving. How long will it last?

There is something that I would nevertheless like to get at concerning the essence of Christianity. You're going to have to bust your asses to follow me here.

First I will have to back up a bit.

3

The soul – you have to read Aristotle – is obviously what the winning thought leads to.

It is all the more necessary – that is, it doesn't stop being written – since what the thought in question elaborates are thoughts about (sur) the body.

The body should impress you more. In fact, that is what impresses classical science – how can it work like that? A body, yours or any other one besides, a roving body, must suffice unto itself.[19] Something made me think of it, a little syndrome that I saw emerge from my ignorance, and that I was reminded of – if it so happened that one's tears dried up, the eye wouldn't work very well anymore. I call such things miracles of the body. That can be grasped immediately. What if the lachrymal gland didn't cry or drip anymore? You would run into trouble.

On the other hand, the fact is that it snivels, and why the devil does it when, corporally, imaginarily or symbolically, someone steps on your foot? Someone affects you – that's what it's called. What relation is there between that sniveling and the fact of parrying the unexpected, in other words, getting the hell out of there (se barrer)? That's a vulgar formulation, but it says what it means, because it precisely reconverges with the barred subject (sujet barré), some consonance of which you hear therein. Indeed, the subject gets the hell out of there (se barre),[20] as I said, and more often than it is his turn to do so.

Observe here simply that there are many advantages to unifying the expression for the symbolic, imaginary, and real – I am saying this to you in parentheses – as Aristotle did, who did not distinguish movement from αλλοίωσις. Change and motion in space were for him – though he didn't [18] It is not at all clear to me what Lacan is referring to in this paragraph. C'est excessivement répandu could also be translated as "That's all too common." The only plural noun "them" could refer to in the next sentence seems to be Freud and Voltaire (lay people) or the three that God is, mentioned four paragraphs back.

[19] The French, il faut que ça se suffise, could also be translated as "it must be self-sufficient (or self-contained)."

[20] The French here literally means "bars himself."

realize it – the fact that the subject gets the hell out of there. Obviously 100 Aristotle didn't have the true categories, but, all the same, he sensed things very well.

In other words, what is important is that all that hang together well enough for the body to subsist, barring any accident, as they say, whether external or internal. Which means that the body is taken for what it presents itself to be, an enclosed body (un corps fermé).

Isn't it plain to see that the soul is nothing other than the supposed identicalness (identité) of this body to everything people think in order to explain it? In short, the soul is what one thinks regarding the body – on the winning side.

And people are reassured by thinking that the body thinks in the same way. Hence the diversity of explanations. When it is assumed to think secretly, there are secretions. When it is assumed to think concretely, there are concretions. When it is assumed to think information, there are hormones. And still further, it gives itself over (s'adonne) to DNA (ADN), to Adonis.

All of that to bring you to the following, which I announced at the beginning regarding the subject of the unconscious – because I don't speak just casually, to waste my breath[21] – it is truly odd that the fact that the structure of thought is based on language is not thrown into question in psychology. The said language – that's the only thing that's new in the term "structure," others do whatever they feel like with it, but what I point out is that – the said language brings with it considerable inertia, which is seen by comparing its functioning to signs that are called mathematical – "mathemes" – solely because they are integrally transmitted. We haven't the slightest idea what they mean, but they are transmitted. Nevertheless, they are not transmitted without the help of language, and that's what makes the whole thing shaky.

If there is something that grounds being, it is assuredly the body. On that score, Aristotle was not mistaken. He sorted out many of them, one by one – see his history of animals. But he doesn't manage, if we read him carefully, to link it to his affirmation – naturally you have never read De Anima (On the Soul), despite my supplications – that man thinks with – instrument – his soul, that is, as I just told you, the presumed mechanisms on which the body is based.

Naturally, you have to watch out. We are the ones who introduce mechanisms because of our physics – which is already, moreover, on a dead end path because, ever since the rise of quantum physics, mechanisms don't work. Aristotle didn't enter into the narrow straits of mechanisms. Thus, "man thinks with his soul" means that man thinks with Aristotle's thought. In that sense, thought is naturally on the winning side.

[21] The French here, comme on flûte (literally, "the way people play the flute"), recalls the expression, c'est comme si je flûtais, meaning "as if I were talking to a brick wall, to no purpose, to myself," etc.

It is obvious that people have nevertheless tried to do better. There is still something else prior to quantum physics – "energetism" and the idea of homeostasis. What I called inertia in the function of language is such that all speech is an energy not yet taken up in an energetics, because that energetics is not easy to measure. Energetics means bringing out, in energy, not 101 quantities, but numbers chosen in a completely arbitrary fashion, with which one arranges things in such a way that there is always a constant somewhere. We are forced to take up the inertia in question at the level of language itself.

What possible relationship can there be between the articulation that constitutes language and the jouissance that reveals itself to be the substance of thought, of that thought so easily reflected in the world by traditional science? That jouissance is the one that makes it such that God is the Supreme Being and that that Supreme Being can, as Aristotle said, be nothing other than the locus in which the good of all the others is known. That doesn't have much to do with thought – does it? – if we consider it to be dominated above all by the inertia of language.

It's not very surprising that no one knew how to grasp or catch jouissance, how to make it squeal, by using what seems to best prop up the inertia of language, namely, the idea of a chain, in other words, bits of string – bits of string that constitute rings and hook onto each other, though we're not too sure how.

I already presented this notion to you once before, and I will try to do better. Last year – I myself am surprised, as I get older, that last year's things seem a hundred years away to me – I took as my theme a formulation that I felt I could base on the Borromean knot: "I ask you to refuse what I offer you because that's not it" (parce que ce n'est pas ça).[22]

That formulation is carefully designed to have an effect, like all those I proffer. See "L'Étourdit." I didn't say "the saying remains forgotten" and so on – I said "the fact that one says." Similarly here, I did not say "because that's all it is" (parce que ce n'est que ça).

"That's not it" is the very cry by which the jouissance obtained is distinguished from the jouissance expected. It is here that what can be said in language is specified. Negation certainly seems to derive therefrom. But nothing more.

Structure, which connects up here, demonstrates nothing if not that it is of the same text as jouissance, insofar as, in marking by what distance jouissance misses – the jouissance that would be in question if "that were it" – structure does not presuppose merely the jouissance that would be it, it also props up another.

[22] See Seminar XIX, . . . ou pire, class given on February 9, 1972.

Voilà. This dit-mension – I am repeating myself, but we are in a domain where law is repetition – this dit-mension is Freud's saying (dire).

Indeed, that is the proof of Freud's existence – in a certain number of years we will need one. Earlier I associated him with a little friend, Christ. The proof of Christ's existence is obvious: it's Christianity. Christianity, in fact, is attached to it. Anyway, for the time being, we have the Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality that I asked you to look at, because I will have to 102 use it again concerning what I call la dérive to translate Trieb, the drift of jouissance.[23]

All of that, I insist, is precisely what was covered over (collabé) during the whole of philosophical antiquity by the idea of knowledge.

Thank God, Aristotle was intelligent enough to isolate in the intellect-agent what is at stake in the symbolic function. He simply saw that the symbolic is where the intellect must act (agir). But he wasn't intelligent enough – because he hadn't benefited from (joui de) Christian revelation – to think that speech (une parole),[24] even his own, by designating the νοῦς that is based only on language, concerns jouissance, the latter nevertheless being designated metaphorically throughout his work.

The whole business of matter and form – what a lot of old claptrap it suggests concerning copulation! It[25] would have allowed him to see that that's not it at all, that there isn't the slightest knowledge (connaissance), but that the jouissances that prop up the semblance thereof are something like the spectrum of white light – on the sole condition that one see that the jouissance at stake is outside the field of that spectrum.

It's a question of metaphor. Regarding the status of jouissance, we must situate the false finality as corresponding to the pure fallacy of a jouissance that would supposedly correspond to the sexual relationship.[26] In this respect, all of the jouissances are but rivals of the finality that would be constituted if jouissance had the slightest relationship with the sexual relationship.

[23] Dérive literally means "drift," but is very close in spelling to the English term for Trieb, "drive."

[24] Or "a word."

[25] "It" here seems to refer back to "Christian revelation" or to the notion that speech concerns jouissance.

[26] The French here, adéquate au rapport sexuel, implies a number of things that English cannot adequately render in a word: a jouissance that is supposedly "adequate to the sexual relationship," "sufficient for a sexual relationship (to be constituted)," and "appropriate." It would answer to it or correspond to it.

4

I'm going to add a little more frosting on the Christ, because he is an important personage, and because it fits into my commentary on the baroque. It's not without reason that people say that my discourse has something baroque about it.

I am going to raise a question – of what importance can it be in Christian doctrine that Christ have a soul? That doctrine speaks only of the incarnation of God in a body, and assumes that the passion suffered in that person constituted another person's jouissance. But there is nothing lacking here, especially not a soul.

Christ, even when resurrected from the dead, is valued for his body, and his body is the means by which communion in his presence is incorporation – oral drive – with which Christ's wife, the Church as it is called, contents itself very well, having nothing to expect from copulation.

In everything that followed from the effects of Christianity, particularly in art – and it's in this respect that I coincide with the "baroquism" with which I accept to be clothed – everything is exhibition of the body evoking jouissance – and you can lend credence to the testimony of someone who has just come back from an orgy of churches in Italy – but without copulation. If copulation isn't present, it's no accident. It's just as much out of place there as it is in human reality, to which it nevertheless provides sustenance with the fantasies by which that reality is constituted. 103

Nowhere, in any cultural milieu, has this exclusion been admitted to more nakedly. I will even go a bit further – don't think I don't mete out what I say (mes dires) to you – I will go so far as to tell you that nowhere more blatantly than in Christianity does the work of art as such show itself as what it has always been in all places – obscenity.

The dit-mension of obscenity is that by which Christianity revives the religion of men. I'm not going to give you a definition of religion, because there is no more a history of religion than a history of art. "Religions," like "the arts," is nothing but a basket category, for there isn't the slightest homogeneity therein.

But there is something in the utensils people keep fabricating to one-up each other. What is at stake, for those beings whose nature it is to speak, is the urgency constituted by the fact that they engage in amorous diversions (déduits)[27] in ways that are excluded from what I could call "the soul of copulation," were it conceivable, in the sense that I gave earlier to the word "soul," namely, what is such that it functions. I dare to prop up with this word that which – effectively pushing them to it if it were the soul of copula-

[27] Déduits amoureux could also be translated as "amorous pursuits."

tion – could be elaborated by what I call a physics, which in this case is nothing other than the following: a thought that can be presupposed in thinking.[28]

There is a hole there and that hole is called the Other. At least that is what I felt I could name (dénommer) it, the Other qua locus in which speech, being deposited (déposée)[29] – pay attention to the resonances here – founds truth and, with it, the pact that makes up for the non-existence of the sexual relationship, insofar as it would be conceptualized (pensé), in other words, something that could conceivably be conceptualized (pensé pensable),[30] and that discourse would not be reduced to beginning solely from semblance – if you remember the title of one of my seminars.[31]

The fact that thought moves in the direction of a science[32] only by being attributed to thinking[33] – in other words, the fact that being is presumed to think – is what founds the philosophical tradition starting from Parmenides. Parmenides was wrong and Heraclitus was right. That is clinched by the fact that, in fragment 93, Heraclitus enunciates οὔτε λέγει οὔτε κρυπτει ἀλλὰ σημαίνει, "he neither avows nor hides, he signifies" – putting back in its place the discourse of the winning side itself – ὁ ἄναξ οὗ τὸ μαντεῖόν ἐστλ τὸ ἐν Δελφοῖς, "the prince" – in other words, the winner – "who prophecizes in Delphi."[34]

You know the crazy story, the one that arouses my delirious admiration? I roll on the floor laughing when I read Saint Thomas (Aquinas), because it's awfully well put together. For Aristotle's philosophy to have been reinjected by Saint Thomas into what one might call the Christian conscience, if that had any meaning, is something that can only be explained by the fact that Christians – well, it's the same with psychoanalysts – abhor what was revealed to them. And they are right.

104 The gap inscribed in the very status of jouissance qua dit-mension of the

[28] The French here, une pensée supposable au penser, could also be translated as "a thought attributable to thinking."

[29] Déposée also means registered (as in a marque déposée, "a registered trademark") and deposed (as when a monarch is stripped of power).

[30] The awkwardness of this formulation is based on the fact that Lacan shifts from a verb form, pensé (thought of, conceived of, or conceptualized) in il serait pensé, to a noun form, pensé (what is thought of or conceptualized) in pensé pensable, which could perhaps also be rendered as "thinkable matter for thought."

[31] Seminar XVIII was entitled, D'un discours qui ne serait pas du semblant ("On a Discourse That Would Not Be Based on Semblance").

[32] Que la pensée n'agisse dans le sens d'une science could also be translated as "The fact that thought acts in the sense of a science" or "stirs only in the direction of a science."

[33] Or "presupposed in thinking."

[34] This fragment is number 247 in The Presocratic Philosophers by Kirk and Raven (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1957); the authors give ἐστι where the original French text of the Seminar has ἐστλ; the English translation they provide is: "The Lord whose oracle is in Delphi neither speaks out nor conceals, but gives a sign" (211).

body, in the speaking being, is what re-emerges with Freud – and I'm not saying anything more than him – through the test constituted by the existence of speech. Where it speaks, it enjoys (Là où ça parle, ça jouit). And that doesn't mean that it knows anything because, as far as I've heard, the unconscious has revealed nothing to us about the physiology of the nervous system, the process of getting a hard-on, or early ejaculation.

To once and for all put an end to this business about the true religion, I will, while there is still time, point out that God is manifested only in writings that are said to be sacred. Sacred in what respect? In that they don't stop repeating the failure – read Salomon, the master of masters, the master of feeling (senti-maître),[35] someone of my own ilk – the failure of the attempts made by a wisdom tradition to which being is supposed to testify.

None of that implies that there weren't things from time to time thanks to which jouissance – without it, there could be no wisdom – could believe that it had reached the goal of satisfying the thought of being (la pensée de l'être). But that goal has never been satisfied, except at the price of a castration.

In Taoism, for example – you don't know what it is, very few do, but I have worked at it, by reading the texts, of course – this is clear in the very practice of sex. In order to feel good, one must withhold one's cum. Buddhism is the trivial example by its renunciation of thought itself. What is best in Buddhism is Zen, and Zen consists in answering you by barking, my little friend. That is what is best when one wants, naturally, to get out of this infernal business, as Freud called it.

The fantasizing (fabulation) of antiquity, mythology as you call it – Claude Lévi-Strauss also called it by that name – of the Mediterranean region – which is precisely the one we don't touch because it's the most profuse and, above all, because such a big to-do has been made of it that one no longer knows by what strand to approach it – mythology has also come to something in the form of psychoanalysis.

There were shovelfuls of gods – all one had to do was find the right one. Which led to this contingent thing that is such that sometimes, after an analysis, we manage to achieve a state in which a guy correctly fucks his "one gal" (un chacun baise convenablement sa une chacune).[36] They were gods [35] Senti-maître is a neologism that combines "master" (maître) and "sentimental" or "feeling" (sentir is "to feel"), and is also a homonym for centimètre ("centimeter").

[36] Lacan is modifying a well-known French expression, À chacun sa chacune, loosely translated, "A gal for every guy" or "Every guy has his gal." He inserts un before chacun and une after sa (rendering it grammatically incorrect) and before chacune. The une chacune is perhaps Lacan's way of insisting that women cannot be taken as a whole or set (that is, as Woman), but only one by one. A similar expression is found in Seminar XIX (May 4, 1972).

all the same, that is, rather consistent representations of the Other. Let us pass over here the weakness of the analytic operation.

Oddly enough, that is so completely compatible with Christian belief that we saw a renaissance of polytheism during the era known by the same name.

I am telling you all that precisely because I just got back from the museums, and because the Counter-Reformation was ultimately a return to the sources and the baroque the parading thereof.

105 The baroque is the regulating of the soul by corporal radioscopy.

I should sometime – I don't know if I'll ever have the time – speak of music, in the margins. For the time being, I am only speaking of what we see in all the churches in Europe, everything attached to the walls, everything that is crumbling, everything that delights, everything that is delirious.[37] It's what I earlier called obscenity – but exalted.

I wonder what effect this flood of representations of martyrs must have on someone who comes from backwoods China. That formulation can be reversed – those representations are themselves martyrs. You know that "martyr" means witness – of a more or less pure suffering. That was what our painting was about, until the slate was wiped clean when people began to seriously concern themselves with little squares.

There is a reduction of the human species here – that word, "human" (humaine), resounds like "unhealthy humor" (humeur malsaine), and there is a remainder that creates "misfortune" (malheur). That reduction is the term by which the Church intends to carry the species – that's the word for it – right up to the end of time. And it is so well grounded in the gap peculiar to the sexuality of speaking beings that it risks being at least as well grounded, let's say – because I don't want to give up on anything – as the future of science.

The Future of Science is the title of a book by that other priestling named Ernest Renan, who was also an all-out servant of the truth.[38] He only required one thing of truth – but it was absolutely capital, failing which, he panicked – that it have no consequence whatsoever.

The economy of jouissance is something we can't yet put our fingertips on. It would be of some interest if we managed to do so (qu'on y arrive). What we can see on the basis of analytic discourse is that we may have a slight chance of finding out something about it, from time to time, by pathways that are essentially contingent.

[37] Délirer literally means "to have delusions," "to be delirious," or "to imagine things." Figuratively it means "to go nuts," "to proliferate like mad," and so on.

[38] Renan's book was written in 1848–1849 and finally published in French in 1890 by Calmann-Lévy. It was translated into English by Albert Vandam and C. B. Pitman (London: Chapman, 1891).

If my discourse today hadn't been absolutely and entirely negative, I would tremble at having lapsed into philosophical discourse. Nevertheless, since we have already seen several wisdom traditions that have lasted quite a while, why shouldn't we find, with analytic discourse, something that gives us a glimpse of something precise? After all, what is energetics if it is not also a mathematical thing (truc)?[39] The analytic thing will not be mathematical. That is why the discourse of analysis differs from scientific discourse.

Well, let us leave that chance to lady luck – encore.[40]

May 8, 1973

[39] Truc can also mean "gizmo," "thingamabob," etc.

[40] Lacan transforms the usual expression here, au petit bonheur la chance, used when you try to get or do something haphazardly – you leave it to lady luck. He says, Enfin, cette chance, mettons-la sous le signe d'au petit bonheur – encore.

107

X

Rings of string

I dreamt last night that when I arrived, no one was here.

That confirms the wishful character of the dream. Despite the fact that I was rather outraged, that it would all be for naught, since I also remembered in the dream that I had worked until 4:30 in the morning, it was nevertheless the satisfaction of a wish, namely, that then I would have but to twiddle my thumbs.

1

I am going to say – that is my function – I am going to say once again – because I repeat myself – something that I say (ce qui est de mon dire), which is enunciated as follows, "There's no such thing as a metalanguage."

When I say that, it apparently means – no language of being. But is there being? As I pointed out last time, what I say is what there isn't. Being is, as they say, and nonbeing is not. There is or there isn't. Being is merely presumed in certain words – "individual," for instance, and "substance." In my view, it is but a fact of what is said (un fait de dit).[1]

The word "subject" that I use thus takes on a different import.

I distinguish myself from the language of being. That implies that there may be verbal fiction (fiction de mot) – I mean, fiction on the basis of the word. And as some of you may recall, that is what I began with when I spoke of ethics.[2]

Just because I have written things that serve the function of forms of language doesn't mean I assure the being of metalanguage. For I would 108 have to present that being as subsisting by itself, all alone, like the language of being.

[1] Or "a spoken fact."

[2] Lacan is referring here to Jeremy Bentham's Theory of Fictions (the first chapter of which is entitled "Linguistic Fictions"), mentioned in Seminar VII, The Ethics of Psychoanalysis.

Mathematical formalization is our goal, our ideal. Why? Because it alone is matheme, in other words, it alone is capable of being integrally transmitted. Mathematical formalization consists of what is written, but it only subsists if I employ, in presenting it, the language (langue) I make use of. Therein lies the objection: no formalization of language is transmissible without the use of language itself. It is in the very act of speaking that I make this formalization, this ideal metalanguage, ex-sist. It is in this respect that the symbolic cannot be confused with being – far from it. Rather, it subsists qua ex-sistence with respect to the act of speaking (ex-sistence du dire). That is what I stressed, in my text called "L'Étourdit," by saying that the symbolic bears only ex-sistence.

In what respect? This is one of the essential things I said last time – analysis can be distinguished from everything that was produced by discourse prior to analysis by the fact that it enunciates the following, which is the very backbone of my teaching – I speak without knowing it. I speak with my body and I do so unbeknownst to myself. Thus I always say more than I know (plus que je n'en sais).

This is where I arrive at the meaning of the word "subject" in analytic discourse. What speaks without knowing it makes me "I," subject of the verb. That doesn't suffice to bring me into being. That has nothing to do with what I am forced to put in being (mettre dans l'être) – enough knowledge for it to hold up, but not one drop more.

That is what was hitherto called form. In Plato's work, form is the knowledge that fills being. Form doesn't know any more about it than it says. It is real in the sense that it holds being in its glass, but it is filled right to the brim. Form is the knowledge of being. The discourse of being presumes that being is, and that is what holds it.

There is some relationship of being that cannot be known. It is that relationship whose structure I investigate in my teaching, insofar as that knowledge – which, as I just said, is impossible – is prohibited (interdit) thereby. This is where I play on an equivocation – that impossible knowledge is censored or forbidden, but it isn't if you write "inter-dit"[3] appropriately – it is said between the words, between the lines. We have to expose the kind of real to which it grants us access.

We have to show where the shaping (mise en forme)[4] of that metalanguage – which is not, and which I make ex-sist – is going. Something true can still be said about what cannot be demonstrated.[5] It is thus that is opened up that sort of truth, the only truth that is accessible to us and that bears on, for example, the non-savoir-faire.

[3] Interdit, in French, means "prohibited" or "forbidden," and is sometimes rendered in English as "interdicted."

[4] The French here usually means "formatting" or "editing," and also includes the Platonic "form."

[5] This is a reference to Gödel's Incompleteness Theorem.

I don't know how to approach, why not say it, the truth – no more than woman. I have said that the one and the other are the same thing, at least to man. They constitute the same conundrum (embarras). As it turns out, I relish the one and the other, despite what people say.

109 The discordance between knowledge and being is my subject. One can also say, notwithstanding, that there isn't any discordance regarding what still (encore) – according to my title this year – directs the game. We are still (encore) caught up in the insufficiency of knowledge. It is what directs the game of encore – not that by knowing more about it, it would direct us better, but perhaps there would be better jouissance, agreement between jouissance and its end.

Now, the end of jouissance – as everything Freud articulates about what he unadvisedly calls "partial drives" teaches us – the end of jouissance does not coincide with (est à côté de) what it leads to, namely, the fact that we reproduce.

The "I" is not a being, but rather something attributed to[6] that which speaks. That which speaks deals only with solitude, regarding the aspect of the relationship I can only define by saying, as I have, that it cannot be written. That solitude, as a break in knowledge, not only can be written but it is that which is written par excellence, for it is that which leaves a trace of a break in being.

That is what I said in a text, certainly not without its imperfections, that I called "Lituraterre."[7] "The cloud of language," I expressed myself metaphorically, "constitutes writing." Who knows whether the fact that we can read (lire) the streams I saw over Siberia as the metaphorical trace of writing isn't linked (lié) – beware, lier (to link) and lire consist of the same letters – to something that goes beyond the effect of rain, which animals have no chance of reading as such? It seems rather to be linked to that form of idealism that I would like you to get into your heads – certainly not that professed by Berkeley, who lived at a time when the subject had acquired its independence, not the idealism that holds that everything we know is representation, but rather that idealism related to the impossibility of inscribing the sexual relationship between two bodies of different sexes.

An opening, by which it is the world that makes us into its partner, is created thereby. It is the speaking body insofar as it can only manage to reproduce thanks to a misunderstanding regarding its jouissance. That is to say that it only reproduces thanks to missing[8] what it wants to say, for what it wants to say (veut dire) – namely, as French clearly states, its meaning (sens)[9] – is its effective jouissance. And it is by missing that jouissance that it reproduces – in other words, by fucking.

[6] Or "presumed in."

[7] "Lituraterre" originally came out in Littérature 3 (1971), a French journal published by Larousse. It was reprinted in Ornicar? 41 (1987), pp. 5–13.

That is precisely what it doesn't want to do, in the final analysis. The proof is that when one leaves it all alone, it sublimates with all its might, it sees Beauty and the Good – not to mention Truth, and it is there, as I just told you, that it comes closest to what is at stake. But what is true is that the partner of the opposite sex (l'autre sexe) remains the Other. It is thus by missing its jouissance that it manages to be reproduced yet again (encore) without knowing anything about what reproduces it. And in particular – 110 and this is perfectly tangible in Freud's work, though of course it's nothing but gibberish, even if we can't do any better – it doesn't know whether what reproduces it is life or death.

I must nevertheless say what there is qua metalanguage, and in what respect it coincides with the trace left by language. For this is where the subject returns to the revelation of the correlate of language (langue), which is the extra knowledge of being,[10] and constitutes for him his slim chance of going to the Other, to its being, about which I noted last time – and this is the second essential point – that it wants to know nothing. It is a passion for ignorance.

That is why the other two passions are those that are called love – which has nothing to do with knowledge, despite philosophy's absurd contentions – and hatred, which is what comes closest to being, that I call "ex-sisting." Nothing concentrates more hatred than that act of saying in which ex-sistence is situated.

Writing is thus a trace in which an effect of language can be read (se lit). That is what happens when you scribble something.

I certainly don't deprive myself of doing so, for that is how I prepare what I have to say. It is worth noting that one must ensure things by writing (de l'écriture, s'assurer).[11] The latter certainly is not metalanguage, nevertheless,

[8] Ratage means "missing," "failing," "backfiring," "misfiring," "messing up," "botching up," "spoiling," and "flunking," as well as "scratching out," "crossing out," etc.

[9] Sens also means "sense" and "direction"; it is pronounced exactly like the last syllable in jouissance. Veut dire literally means "wants to say" but is usually translated as "means." "Effective" here (as elsewhere) could also be rendered as "actual."

[10] The French here, ce savoir en plus de l'être, could also be translated as "being's extra knowledge."

[11] The French here could be understood in a number of different ways: "check over writing" or "capture or keep an eye on writing" is what the grammar would dictate, but Lacan's eccentric use of de suggests "assure oneself of things by using writing (or by writing things down)."

though one can make it fulfill a function that resembles it. That effect is nevertheless secondary with respect to the Other in which language is inscribed as truth. For nothing I could write on the blackboard for you based on the general formulas that relate energy and matter, at the present point in time – Einstein's last formulas, for example – none of it would stand up if I didn't prop it up with an act of speaking that involves language (langue), and with a practice which is that of people who give orders in the name of a certain knowledge.

But let me back up. When you scribble and when I too scribble, it is always on a page with lines, and we are thus immediately enmeshed in this business of dimensions.

2

What cuts a line is a point. Since a point has zero dimensions, a line is defined as having one dimension. Since what a line cuts is a surface, a surface is defined as having two dimensions. Since what a surface cuts is space, space has three dimensions.

The little sign I wrote on the blackboard (figure 1) derives its value therefrom.

It has all the characteristics of writing – it could be a letter. However, since you write cursively, you never think of stopping a line before it crosses 111 another in order to make it pass underneath, or rather in order to assume that it passes underneath, because in writing something completely different than three-dimensional space is involved.

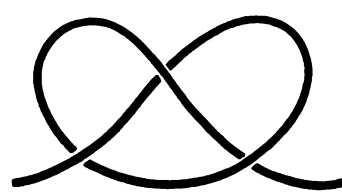

Figure 1

In this figure, when a line is cut by another, it means that the former passes under the latter. That is what happens here, except that there is only one line. But although there is only one, it is distinguished from a simple ring, for this writing represents for you the flattening out (mise-à-plat) of a knot. Thus, this line or string is something other than the line I defined earlier with respect to space as a cut and that constitutes a hole, that is, separates an inside from an outside.

This new line is not so easily incarnated in space. The proof is that the ideal string, the simplest string, would be a torus. And it took a long time for people to realize, thanks to topology, that what is enclosed in a torus has absolutely nothing to do with what is enclosed in a bubble.

Regardless of what you do with the surface of a torus, you cannot make a knot. But, on the contrary, with the locus of a torus, as this shows you, you can make a knot. It is in this respect, allow me to tell you, that the torus is reason, since it is what allows for knots.

It is in that respect that what I am showing you now, a twisted torus, is as neat (sec) an image as I can give you of the trinity, as I qualified it the other day – one and three in a single stroke.[12]

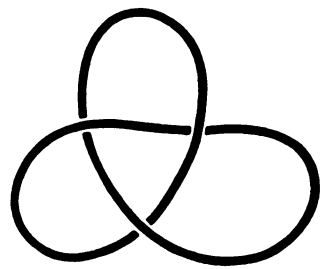

Figure 2

Nevertheless, it is by making three toruses out of it, using a little thingamabob I already showed you called the Borromean knot, that we shall be able to operate on the first knot. Naturally, there are people here today who weren't here last year in February when I spoke about the Borromean 112 knot.[13] I will try today to give you a sense of its importance and of how it is related to writing, inasmuch as I have defined writing as what language leaves by way of a trace.

With the Borromean knot, we are dealing with something that cannot be found anywhere, namely, a true ring of string. You should realize that, when you lay out a string, you never manage to join the two ends together in the woof (trame). In order to have a ring of string, you have to make a knot, preferably a sailor's knot. Let's make a sailor's knot with this string.

That's it. Thanks to the sailor's knot, we have here, as you see, a ring of string. I will make two more. The problem that is then raised by the Borromean knot is the following – once you have made your rings of string, how can you get these three rings of string to hang together in such a way that if you cut one, all three are set free?

[12] The overhand knot depicted in figure 2 is often referred to in English as a "clover-leaf knot." See Introduction to Knot Theory by Richard H. Crowell and Ralph H. Fox (New York: Blaisdell, 1963), 4.

[13] See Seminar XIX, . . . ou pire, class given on February 9, 1972.

Three is really nothing. The true problem, the general problem, is to work things out in such a way that, with any number of rings of string, when you cut one, every single one of the others becomes free and independent.

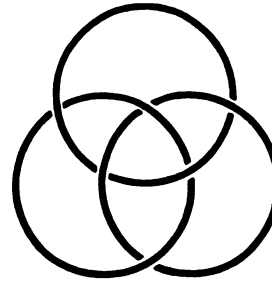

Figure 3

Here is the Borromean knot – I already put it up on the blackboard last year. It is easy for you to see that no two rings of string are knotted to each other, and that it's only thanks to the third that they hang together.

Pay close attention here – don't let yourself remain captivated by this image. I'm going to show you another way to solve the problem.

Here is a ring of string. Here is another. You insert the second ring into the first, and you bend it (see figure 4).

It suffices then to take up the second ring in a third for the three to be knotted together – knotted in such a way that it suffices for you to cut one for the other two to be set free (see figure 5).

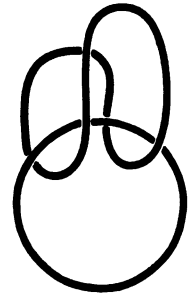

Figure 4

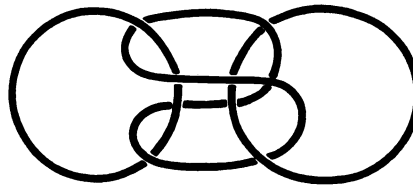

Figure 5

After the first bending, you could also bend the third ring and take it up in a fourth. With four, as with three, it suffices to cut one of the rings[14] for 113 all the others to be set free. You can add an absolutely infinite number of rings and it will still be true. The solution is thus absolutely general, and the line of rings can be as long as you like.

In this chain, whatever its length, the first and last links differ from the others: while the intermediary rings, in other words, the bent ones, are all ear-shaped, as you see in figure 4, the extremes are simple rings.

Nothing stops us from making the first and last rings coincide, by bending the first and taking it up in the last. The chain is thereby closed (see figure 6).

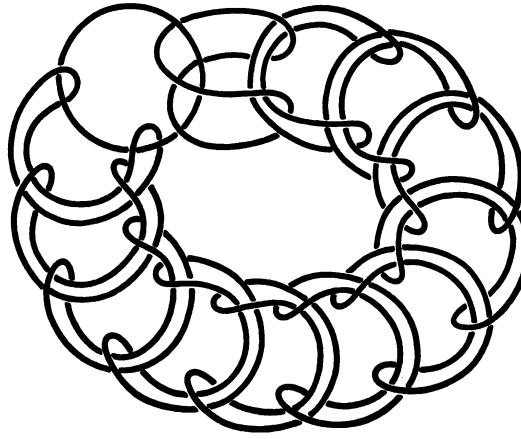

Figure 6

The collapse (résorption) of the two extremes into one nevertheless leaves a trace: in the chain of intermediary links, the strands are juxtaposed two [14] The French here reads noeuds, "knots," which seems erroneous.

by two, whereas, when the chain closes on a simple, single ring, four strands on each side are juxtaposed to one strand, the circular ring.

That trace can certainly be effaced – you then obtain a homogeneous chain of bent rings.

114

3

Why did I formerly bring in the Borromean knot? It was to translate the formulation "I ask you" – what? – "to refuse" – what? – "what I offer you" – why? – "because that's not it." You know what "it" is; it's object a. Object a is no being. Object a is the void presupposed by a demand, and it is only by situating demand via metonymy, that is, by the pure continuity assured from the beginning to the end of a sentence, that we can imagine a desire that is based on no being – a desire without any other substance than that assured by knots themselves.

Enunciating that sentence, "I ask you to refuse what I offer you," I could only motivate it by the "that's not it" that I took up again last time.

"That's not it" means that, in the desire of every demand, there is but the request for object a, for the object that could satisfy jouissance. The latter would then be the Lustbefriedigung presupposed in what is improperly called the "genital drive" in psychoanalytic discourse, that drive[15] in which the full, inscribable relationship of the one with what remains irreducibly the Other is supposedly inscribed. I stressed the fact that the partner of this "I" that is the subject, the subject of any sentence that constitutes a demand, is not the Other, but that which is substituted for it in the form of the cause of desire – that I have diversified into four causes, insofar as the cause is constituted diversely, according to the Freudian discovery, on the basis of the object of sucking, the object of excretion, the gaze, and the voice. It is as substitutes for the Other that these objects are laid claim to[16] and made into the cause of desire.

It seems that the subject calls (se représente)[17] inanimate objects to mind as a function of the following – that there's no such thing as a sexual relation. It's only speaking bodies, as I said, that come up with an idea of the world as such. The world, the world of being, full of knowledge, is but a dream, a dream of the body insofar as it speaks, for there's no such thing as a knowing subject (il n'y a pas de sujet connaissant). There are subjects who give themselves correlates in object a, correlates of enjoying speech qua

[15] The French here, celle, could also possibly refer to "jouissance" or "Lustbefriedigung."

[16] The French here, réclamés, could also be translated as "clamored for" or even "requisitioned."

[17] Se représenter literally means "to represent to oneself," and figuratively means "to think, imagine, conceive in one's mind," etc.

jouissance of speech (parole jouissante en tant que jouissance de parole). What does it wedge (coince-t-elle)[18] but other Ones?

I pointed out to you earlier that bilobulation – the transformation by bending of the ring of string into two ears – can be carried out in a strictly symmetrical fashion. Indeed, that is what happens as soon as one gets to the level of four. Well, similarly, the reciprocity between the subject and object a is total.

For every speaking being, the cause of its desire is, in terms of structure, strictly equivalent, so to speak, to its bending, that is, to what I have called its division as subject. That is what explains why the subject could believe for so long that the world knew as much about things as he did. The world is symmetrical to the subject – the world of what I last time called thought 115 is the equivalent, the mirror image, of thought. That is why there was nothing but fantasy regarding knowledge until the advent of the most modern science.

This mirroring is what allowed for the chain[19] of beings that presupposed in one being, said to be the Supreme Being, the good of all beings. Which is also equivalent to the following, that object a can be said to be, as its name indicates, a-sexual (a-sexué). The Other presents itself to the subject only in an a-sexual form. Everything that has been the prop, substitute-prop, or substitute for the Other in the form of the object of desire is a-sexual.

It is in that sense that the Other as such remains a problem in Freudian theory – though we are able to take it a step further – a problem that is expressed in a question Freud repeated – "What does a woman want?" – woman being, in this case, equivalent to truth. It is in that sense that the equivalence I produced is justified.

Does that enlighten you as to why it is of interest to work with the ring of string? The said ring is certainly the most eminent representation of the One, in the sense that it encloses but a hole. Indeed, that is what makes a true ring of string very difficult to produce. The ring of string I make use of is mythical, since people don't manufacture closed rings of string.

But still, what are we to do with this Borromean knot? My answer to you is that it can serve us by representing a metaphor that is so often used to express what distinguishes the use of language – the chain metaphor.

Let us note that, unlike rings of string, the elements of a chain can be forged. It is not very difficult to imagine how – one bends metal to the point where one can solder it. No doubt, it's not a simple prop, for, in order to be able to adequately represent the use of language, links would have to be made in that chain that would attach to another link a little further on, with two or three floating intermediate links. We would also have to understand why a sentence has a limited duration. The metaphor cannot tell us that.

[18] Elle could refer either to speech or jouissance here. On wedging, see the section entitled "Answers" at the end of this chapter. "Wedge" here could also be replaced by "grab hold of" or "corner."

[19] The (great) chain of being, as it is known in English, doesn't include the word "chain" in French: échelle means "ladder" or "scale."

Do you want an example that can show you what purpose can be served by this line of folded knots that become independent once again as soon as you cut one of them? It's not very difficult to find such an example in psychosis, and that's no accident. Recall what hallucinatorily fills up Schreber's solitude: "Nun will Ich mich . . .," "Now I shall . . .," or again "Sie sollen nämlich . . .," "You were to. . . ."[20] These interrupted sentences, which I called code messages,[21] leave some sort of substance in abeyance. We perceive here the requirement of a sentence, whatever it may be, which is such that one of its links, when missing, sets all the others free, that is, withdraws from them the One.[22]

116 Isn't that the best basis we can provide for that by which mathematical language proceeds?

The nature of mathematical language, once it is sufficiently isolated in terms of its requirements of pure demonstration, is such that everything that is put forward there – not so much in the spoken commentary as in the very handling of letters – assumes that if one of the letters doesn't stand up, all the others, due to their arrangement, not only constitute nothing of any validity but disperse. It is in that respect that the Borromean knot is the best metaphor of the fact that we proceed only on the basis of the One.

The One engenders science. Not in the sense of the one of measurement. It is not what is measured in science that is important, contrary to what people think. What distinguishes modern science from the science of antiquity, which is based on the reciprocity between the νοῦς and the world, between what thinks and what is thought of, is precisely the function of the One, the One insofar as it is only there, we can assume, to represent solitude – the fact that the One doesn't truly knot itself with anything that resembles the sexual Other.[23] Unlike the chain, the Ones of which are all made in the same way, being nothing other than One (de n'être rien d'autre que de l'Un).[24]

When I said, "There's such a thing as One" (Y a d' l'Un), when I stressed [20] See Écrits 539–540 and Daniel Paul Schreber's Memoirs of My Nervous Illness (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1988), 172.

[21] See Écrits 807. Messages de code could also be translated as "messages made of (or based on) code."

[22] That is, takes away their unity or oneness.

[23] There seems to be a mistake here in the French text, which reads, qui semble à l'Autre sexuel, literally "that seems to the sexual Other" or "that seems sexual to the Other." I have assumed, on the basis of Lacan's argument here, that the French should read ressemble instead of semble.

[24] Or "being based on nothing but One."

that, when I truly pounded that into you like an elephant all of last year, you see what I was introducing you to.

How then can we situate the function of the Other? How – if, up to a certain point, what remains of any language when it is written is based simply on knots of the One – are we to posit a difference? For it is clear that the Other cannot be added to the One. The Other can only be differentiated from it. If there is something by which it participates in the One, it is not by being added. For the Other – as I already said, but it is not clear that you heard me – is the One-missing (l'un-en-moins).[25]

That's why, in any relationship of man with a woman – she who is in question (en cause) – it is from the perspective of the One-missing (l'Une-en-moins) that she must be taken up. I already indicated that to you concerning Don Juan, but, of course, there was only one person who noticed – my daughter.

4

It is not enough to have found a general solution to the problem of Borromean knots, for an infinite number of Borromean knots. We must find a way to demonstrate that it is the only solution.

But, as of our point in time today, there is no theory of knots. Currently, there is no mathematical formalization applicable to knots, apart from a few little constructions like those I showed you, that allows us to foresee 117 that a solution like the one I just gave is not simply ex-sistent, but necessary, in other words, that it doesn't stop – as I define the necessary – being written. I'm going to show it to you right away. It suffices for me to do this.

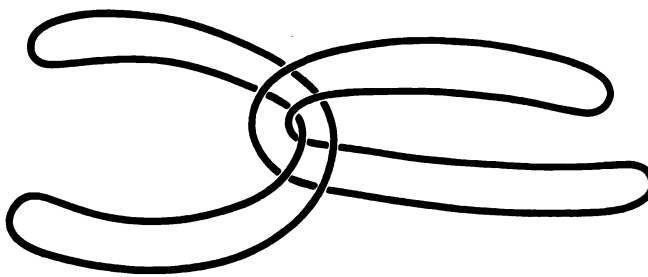

Figure 7

I just passed one of these rings around the other in such a way that they form, not the kind of bending I showed you earlier but simply a sailor's knot. You immediately see that I can, without any difficulty, pursue the operation on either side by making as many sailor's knots as I like, with all the rings of string in the world.

[25] This could also be translated as the "One-less" or "One-too-few."

Here too I can close the chain, thereby eliminating the separability these elements had hitherto retained. I use a third ring to join the two ends of the chain.

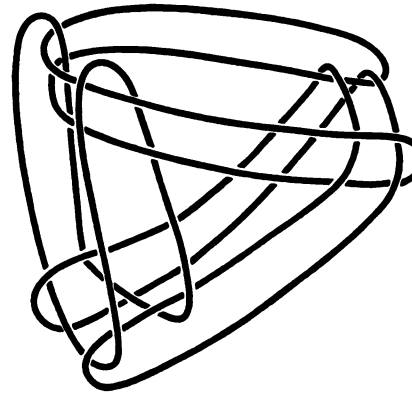

Figure 8

Here, without any doubt, we have a solution which is just as valid as the first. The knot enjoys the Borromean property that if I cut any one of the rings that I have arranged in this way, all the others are set free.

118 None of the rings here is any different from the others. There is no privileged point and the chain is strictly homogeneous. You realize that there is no topological analogy between the two ways of knotting the rings of string I showed you. In the case of the sailor's knots, there is what might be called a topology of twisting compared to the preceding one, which is simply one of bending. But it wouldn't be contradictory to use bent rings in a sailor's knot.

Hence you see that the question arises of knowing how to set a limit to the solutions of the Borromean problem. I will leave the question open.

What is at stake for us, as you have realized, is to obtain a model of mathematical formalization. Formalization is nothing other than the substitution of what is called a letter for any number of ones. What does it mean when we write that inertia is if not that, whatever the number of ones you place under each of those letters, you are subject to a certain number of laws – laws of grouping, addition, multiplication, etc.

$$\frac{mv^2}{2}$$

Those are the questions that I am opening up, that are designed to announce to you what I hope to transmit to you concerning that which is written.

That which is written – what would that be in the end? The conditions of jouissance. And that which is counted – what would that be? The residues of jouissance. Isn't it by joining that a-sexual up with what she has by way of surplus jouissance – being, as she is, the Other, since she can only be said to be Other – that woman offers it to man in the guise of object a?

Man believes he creates – he believes believes believes, he creates creates creates. He creates creates creates woman. In reality, he puts her to work – to the work of the One. And it is in that respect that the Other – the Other insofar as the articulation of language, that is, the truth, is inscribed therein – the Other must be barred, barred on the basis of (de) what I earlier qualified as the One-missing.[26] That is what S(Ⱥ) means. It is in that respect that we arrive at the point of raising the question how to make the One into something that holds up, that is, that is counted without being.

Mathematization alone reaches a real – and it is in that respect that it is compatible with our discourse, analytic discourse – a real that has nothing to do with what traditional knowledge has served as a basis for, which is not what the latter believes it to be – namely, reality – but rather fantasy.

The real, I will say, is the mystery of the speaking body, the mystery of the unconscious.

May 15, 1973

Answers

119

I have transcribed here the answers Jacques Lacan gave to certain questions I asked him while I was establishing the text of this lecture. (J.A.M.)

It is remarkable that a figure as simple as that of the Borromean knot has not served as a point of departure for – a topology.

Indeed, there are several ways to approach space.

Being captivated by the notion of dimensions, that is, by cuts, is the characterology of a saw technique.[27] It is even reflected in the notion of the point, for the fact that it qualifies as one that which has, as is clearly stated, zero dimensions – that is, that which doesn't exist – says it all.

On the basis, on the contrary, of rings of string, a wedging (coinçage)

[26] The French here, perhaps erroneously, fails to capitalize the u of l'un-en-moins.

[27] See the beginning of section 2 of this chapter, where Lacan talks about a point cutting a line, a line cutting a plane, and a plane cutting a space.

occurs, since it is the crossing of two continuities that stops a third continuity. Doesn't it seem that this wedging could constitute the initial phenomenon of a topology?

It is a phenomenon that has going for it the fact of being in no point localizable. Consider but the Borromean knot – it is immediately clear that one can number three "spots" (endroits), put that word in quotes, where the rings that create the knot can become wedged together.

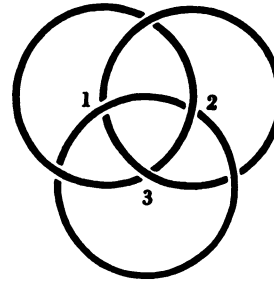

Figure 9

That assumes in each case that the two other spots get reduced to that one. Does that mean that there is only one? Certainly not. Though the expression "threefold point" is used, it cannot in any way satisfy the notion of a point. This point is not constituted here by the convergence of three lines, if nothing else because there are two different points – a right and a left.

For my part, I am surprised that it seems to be widely accepted that we cannot, by a message said to be informative, convey to the subject supposed by language the notion of right and left. People certainly realize that we can 120 communicate the distinction between them, but then how are we to specify them? As opposed to a certain argument, it seems quite possible to me, precisely by dictating a flattening out that is quite conceivable on the basis of the experience of knots, if a knot is, as I believe it is, a logical fact.

Note that the flattened out (knot) is something other than a surface.

It presupposes an entirely different dit-mension than the continuity implicit in space. And that is why I use a written form of the word that designates therein the "mension" of what is said (dit). That is permitted only by the llanguage that I speak – but it is not such that I need deprive myself of it inasmuch as I speak. Quite the contrary, given what I think about it – I dare say.

In other words, what is important is not that there are three dimensions in space. What is important is the Borromean knot and that for the sake of which we accede to the real it represents to us.

The illusion that we could not transmit anything to transplanetary beings regarding the specificity of right and left always seemed felicitous to me, insofar as it founds the distinction between the imaginary and the symbolic.

But right and left have nothing to do with what we learn (appréhendons) of them aesthetically, which means – in the relation founded by our bodies – of its two apparent sides.

What the Borromean knot demonstrates is not the fact that it is made of a ring of string, around which it suffices to bend another ring like two ears such that a third, linking the two loops, cannot become unbuckled due to the first ring. It is the fact that, of these three rings, any one of them can function as first and last, the third functioning thus as the intermediate link, that is, as the bent ears – see figures 4 and 5.

On the basis of that, the fact can be deduced that whatever the number of intermediate links – that is, of double ears – any of them can function as first and last, the others coupling them with their infinity of ears.

Those ears are thus laid out or constructed, not on the basis of a 1–2, 2–1 juxtaposition, but, in the interval between those two, on the basis of a 2–2 juxtaposition repeated as many times as there are rings minus three, namely, the number of rings in the Borromean knot.

Nevertheless, it is clear that, as the privileged links between the first ring and the second and the second to last and the last continue to be valid, the introduction of the first and the last in the central link leads to singular entanglements.

Dispensing with these, one can nevertheless refind the initial arrangement.

In their complexity, knots are well designed to make us relativize the supposed three dimensions of space, founded solely on the translation we give 121 for our body in a solid volume.

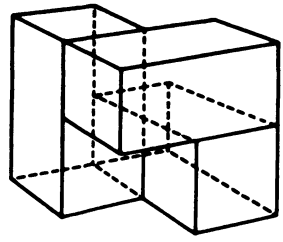
Not that it doesn't lend itself anatomically to that translation. But we have here the whole question of the necessary revision – namely, of that for the sake of which it takes on that form – apparently, that is, for the sake of our gaze.

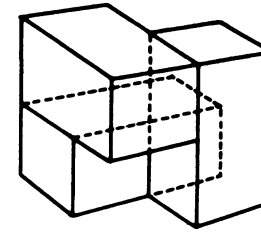
I indicate here where the mathematics of wedging, in other words, knots, could come in.

Let us take a cube and break it down into eight (2^3) little cubes, regularly stacked, the side of each little cube being half the size of that of the first cube.

Let us remove two little cubes whose vertices are at two of the diametrically opposed vertices of the large cube.

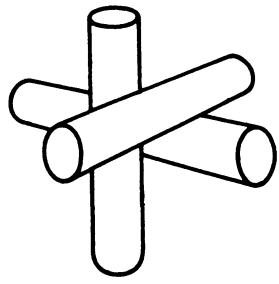
There are then two ways, and only two ways, to join the six little cubes [two by two] along their common sides.

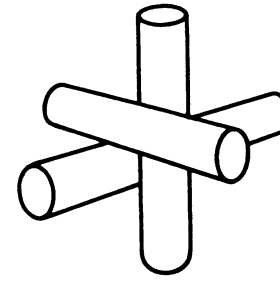




Figures 10 and 11

These two ways define two different arrangements by which to couple three full axes, according, let's say, to the directions of space distinguished by Cartesian coordinates.





Figures 12 and 13

For each of the three axes, the two empty cubes that were removed at first allow us to define in a univocal way the inflection we can impose upon them.

122 That is the inflection required by the wedging in the Borromean knot.

But there is more. We can require the jettisoning of the privilege constituted by the existence of the first and last circle – any of them being able to play that role – in the Borromean knot, namely, that the first and the last in the said knot be constituted by providing them with a bend (reploiement) with the same structure as the central link – in other words, that the 2–2 link be univocal there. That is figure 8.

That which inextricably results therefrom for any attempt at flattening out (mise-à-plat) felicitously contrasts with the elegance of the flatness (à- plat) of the original presentation (figure 3). And nevertheless, you will notice that nothing is easier than to once again isolate therein two rings, in the same positions said to be first and last in the original knot. This time, any of them can fill those roles absolutely, since the privilege has disappeared that, as I said, so seriously complicated the arrangement of the intermediary links when we were dealing with the original Borromean knot, but raised to a number greater than four.

Indeed, the links in this case are no longer constituted by the simple bending of a ring, such as we imagine it having two ears, but by bending it such that four strands of the connected link are taken up by the rings I designated with the terms "first" and "last," but not in an equivalent fashion, one of the two taking them up simply, the other – which, by dint of this very fact, is definable as different – hugging the four strands in a double loop.

Everywhere in a central link the four strands allow for a certain number of typical crossings that are subject to variation.

In short, these links are four times shorter than the extreme rings.

I conclude from this that space is not intuitive. It is a mathematician – which is what everyone can read in the history of mathematics itself.

That means that space knows how to count, not much higher than we do – and for good reason – since it is only up to six, not even seven. That is why Jahve distinguished himself with his iron-clad rule of the week.

Of course, the man in the street goes up to ten, but that's because he counts on his fingers. He has had to back off, since with the zero, that is, he is wrong – one mustn't count on anything that is an apparent body or an animal movement. What is amusing is that science did not at first detach itself except at the cost of a 6 x 10, that is, a sexagisimal system – see the Babylonians.

To return to space, it seems to be part and parcel of the unconscious – structured like a language.

And if it counts up to six, it is because it can only refind the two via the three of revelation.

One more word – one must invent nothing. That is what the revelation of the unconscious teaches us. But there is nothing to be done – invention itches until we scratch. Because what is necessary is to turn away from the real and from what the presence of number signifies. 123

One word to finish. You might have noticed that collapsing (homogénéisation) the extreme links into one is not the same thing as hooking them together end to end, which, strangely enough, had no more effect on the chain than to leave them independent, except for the number of links, which it reduces by one.

What result can we expect from the original chain with three links when we operate thereupon as well? Its reduction to two links that would assuredly come apart if either of them is cut.

But how will they be wound?

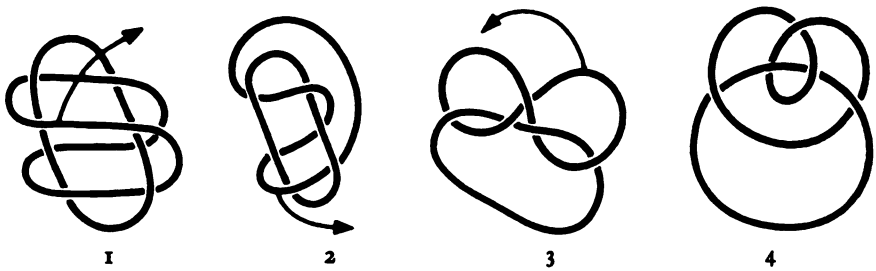

Figure 14

There will be a simple ring with an inner eight wound around it,[28] the same inner eight with which I symbolize the subject – allowing us hence to recognize in the simple ring, which, moreover, can be transposed into (s'intervertit avec) the eight, the sign of object a – namely, the cause by which the subject identifies with his desire.

October 22, 1973

[28] What I have translated here as the "inner eight" is rendered in Alan Sheridan's 1978 translation of Seminar XI, The Four Fundamental Concepts of Psychoanalysis, as the "interior eight."

XI

125

The rat in the maze

LANGUAGE IS KNOWLEDGE'S HAREBRAINED LUCUBRATION ABOUT LLANGUAGE.
THE UNITY OF THE BODY.
THE LACANIAN HYPOTHESIS.
LOVE, FROM CONTINGENCY TO NECESSITY.

Thanks to someone who is willing to polish up what I tell you here, four or five days ago I received the nicely scrubbed truffle in my elocutions this year.

With this title, Encore, I wasn't sure, I must admit, that I was still in the field I have cleared for twenty years, since what it said was that it could still (encore) go on a long time. Rereading the first transcription of this Seminar, I found that it wasn't so bad, especially given that I began with a formulation that seemed a tad trivial to me, that the Other's jouissance is not the sign of love. It was a point of departure I could perhaps come back to today in closing what I opened at that time.

I spoke a bit of love. Yet the crux of or key to what I put forward this year concerns the status of knowledge, and I stressed that the use (exercice)[1] of knowledge could but imply (représenter) a jouissance. That is what I'd like to add to today by a reflection concerning what is done in a groping manner in scientific discourse with respect to what can be produced by way of knowledge.

1

To get right to the point – knowledge is an enigma.

That enigma is presented to us by the unconscious, as it is revealed by analytic discourse. That enigma is enunciated as follows: for the speaking being, knowledge is that which is articulated. People could have noticed that a long time ago, because in tracing out the pathways of knowledge they were doing nothing but articulate things, centering them for a long time on 126 being. Now it is obvious that nothing is, if not insofar as it is said that it is.

[1] Exercice could also be translated as "implementation," "putting into use," "putting into effect," "exercising," or "exercise."

I call that S_2. You have to know how to hear that – is it of them-two (est-ce bien d'eux)[2] that it speaks? It is generally said that language serves to communicate. To communicate about what, one must ask oneself, about which them (eux)? Communication implies reference. But one thing is clear – language is merely what scientific discourse elaborates to account for what I call llanguage.

Llanguage serves purposes that are altogether different from that of communication. That is what the experience of the unconscious has shown us, insofar as it is made of llanguage, which, as you know, I write with two l's to designate what each of us deals with, our so-called mother tongue (lalangue dite maternelle), which isn't called that by accident.

If communication approaches what is effectively at work in the jouissance of llanguage, it is because communication implies a reply, in other words, dialogue. But does llanguage serve, first and foremost, to dialogue? As I have said before, nothing is less certain.

I just got hold of an important book by an author named Bateson about which people had talked my ears off, enough to get on my nerves a bit. I should say that it was given to me by someone who had been touched by the grace of a certain text of mine he translated into his language, adding some commentary to it,[3] and who felt he had found in Bateson's work something that went significantly further than "the unconscious structured like a language."

Now Bateson, not realizing that the unconscious is structured like a language, has but a rather mediocre conception of it. But he creates some very nice artifices he calls "metalogues." They're not bad, insofar as they involve, if we take him at his word, some internal, dialectical progress, being produced only by examining the evolution of a term's meaning. As has always been the case in everything that has been called a dialogue, the point is to make the supposed interlocutor say what motivates the speaker's very question, in other words, to incarnate in the other the answer that is already there. It's in that sense that dialogues, classical dialogues – the finest examples of which are represented by the Platonic legacy – are shown not to be dialogues.

If I have said that language is what the unconscious is structured like, that is because language, first of all, doesn't exist. Language is what we try to know concerning the function of llanguage.

[2] Lacan is playing off of the homophony between d'eux, of them, and deux, two, and between S and est-ce.

[3] Anthony Wilden translated Lacan's "Function and Field of Speech and Language in Psychoanalysis" in The Language of the Self (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins, 1968); he talked to Lacan about Gregory Bateson's book, Steps to an Ecology of Mind (New York: Ballantine, 1972). The whole discussion of "learning" (above all, of rat research based on "trial and error") in this chapter of the Seminar seems to be a response to Bateson's work.

Certainly, it is thus that scientific discourse itself approaches language, except that it is difficult for scientific discourse to fully actualize language, since it misrecognizes the unconscious. The unconscious evinces knowledge that, for the most part, escapes the speaking being. That being provides the occasion to realize just how far the effects of llanguage go, in that 127 it presents all sorts of affects that remain enigmatic. Those affects are what result from the presence of llanguage insofar as it articulates things by way of knowledge (de savoir)[4] that go much further than what the speaking being sustains (supporte) by way of enunciated knowledge.

Language is, no doubt, made up of llanguage. It is knowledge's harebrained lucubration (élucubration) about llanguage. But the unconscious is knowledge, a knowing how to do things (savoir-faire) with llanguage. And what we know how to do with llanguage goes well beyond what we can account for under the heading of language.

Llanguage affects us first of all by everything it brings with it by way of effects that are affects. If we can say that the unconscious is structured like a language, it is in the sense that the effects of llanguage, already there qua knowledge, go well beyond anything the being who speaks is capable of enunciating.

It is in that regard that the unconscious, insofar as I base it on its deciphering, can only be structured like a language, a language that is always hypothetical with respect to what supports it, namely, llanguage. Llanguage is what allowed me to turn my S_2 into a question earlier and ask – is it truly a question of them-two (d'eux) in language?

Stated otherwise, it has become clear, thanks to analytic discourse, that language is not simply communication. Misrecognizing that fact, a grimace has emerged in the lowest depths of science that consists in asking how being can know anything whatsoever. My question today regarding knowledge will hinge on that.

2

How can being know? It's amusing to see how this question is supposedly answered. Since the limit, as I have posited it, is constituted by the fact that there are beings who speak, people wonder what the knowledge of those who do not speak could be. They wonder about it. They don't know why they wonder about it. But they wonder about it all the same. So they build a little maze (labyrinthe) for rats.

They hope thereby to be on the right track by which to determine what knowledge is. They believe a rat is going to show the capacity it has to learn

[4] The French, de savoir, could also be translated as "by knowing," "since it knows," "qua knowledge," or "regarding knowledge."

(apprendre). To learn (A-prendre)[5] to do what? What interests it, of course. And what do they assume interests it?

They do not take the rat as a being, but rather as a body, which means that they view it as a unit, a rat-unit. Now what thus sustains the rat's being? They don't wonder about that at all. Or rather, they identify its being with its body.

People have always imagined that being had to contain a sort of fullness that is characteristic of it. Being is a body. That is where people began in 128 first approaching being, and they laboriously concocted (élucubré) a whole hierarchy of beings. Ultimately, they began with the notion that each one should know what keeps it in being (maintenait à l'être)[6] – that had to be its good, in other words, what gives it pleasure.

What change thus came about in discourse in order for people to suddenly question that being regarding the means it might have to go beyond itself, that is, to learn more than it needs to know in its being to survive as a body?

The maze leads not only to nourishment but to a button or flap that the supposed subject of this being must figure out how to use to obtain nourishment. Or it has to recognize a feature, a lit or colored feature, to which the being is capable of reacting. What is important is that the question of knowledge is transformed here into that of learning. If, after a series of trials and errors – "trials and errors" was left in English (in the translation) considering the people who carved out this approach to knowledge – the rate diminishes sufficiently, they note that the rat-unit is capable of learning something.

The question that is only secondarily raised – the one that interests me – is whether the rat-unit can learn how to learn. Therein lies the true mainspring of the experiment. Once it has taken one of these tests, will a rat, faced with another test of the same kind, learn more quickly? That can be easily attested to by a decrease in the number of trials necessary for it to know how it must behave in such a montage – let us call the maze, taken in conjunction with the flaps and buttons that function here, a "montage."

The question has been so rarely raised, though it has been raised, that people haven't even dreamt of investigating the differential effect of having

[5] By breaking apprendre ("to learn") down into a-prendre, Lacan seems to be pointing to the taking or grasping in learning, the taking by the rat of what interests it.

[6] Lacan's French here is quite idiosyncratic, since maintenir is a transitive verb. Lacan seems to construct his phraseology here along the lines of the expression se tenir à quelque chose (to hold onto or cleave to something); a more idiomatic translation would be "everyone should know what keeps him going (or alive)." Alternatively, the phrase could be understood as "everyone should know what keeps him alive as a body," for l'être could be taken as "to be it," it referring to the body.

the themes one proposes to the rat – by which it demonstrates its ability to learn – come from the same source or from two different sources, and of having the experimenter who teaches the rat to learn be the same or different. Now, the experimenter is the one who knows something in this business, and it is with what he knows that he invents this montage consisting of the maze, buttons, and flaps. If he were not someone whose relation to knowledge is grounded in a relation to llanguage, in the inhabiting of llanguage or the cohabitation with llanguage, there would be no montage.

The only thing the rat-unit learns in this case is to give a sign, a sign of its presence as unit. The flap is recognized only by a sign and pressing its paw on this sign is a sign. It is always by making a sign that the unit accedes to that on the basis of which one concludes that there is learning. But this relation to signs is external. Nothing confirms that the rat grasps the mechanism to which pressing the button leads. That's why the only thing that counts is to know if the experimenter notes that the rat has not 129 only figured it out, but learned (appris) how a mechanism is to be grasped (se prend), in other words, learned what must be grasped (à-prendre). If we take the status of unconscious knowledge into account, we must examine the maze experiment in terms of how the rat-unit responds to what has been thought up by the experimenter not on the basis of nothing, but on the basis of llanguage.

One doesn't invent just any old labyrinthine composition, and whether it comes from the same experimenter or two different experimenters is worth investigating. But nothing that I have been able to gather to date from this literature indicates that any such question has been raised.

This example thus leaves the questions regarding the status of knowledge and the status of learning (apprentissage) completely intact and distinct. The status of knowledge raises another question, namely, how it is taught.

3

It is on the basis of the notion of a kind of knowledge that is transmitted, integrally transmitted, that a sifting occurred in knowledge, thanks to which the discourse called scientific discourse was constituted.

It wasn't constituted without numerous misadventures. Hypotheses non fingo, Newton believed he could say, "I assume nothing." But it was on the basis of a hypothesis that the famous revolution – which wasn't at all Copernican, but rather Newtonian – hinged, substituting "it falls" for "it turns." The Newtonian hypothesis consisted in positing that the astral turning is the same as falling. But in order to observe that – which allows one to eliminate the hypothesis – he first had to make the hypothesis.

To introduce a scientific discourse concerning knowledge, one must investigate knowledge where it is. That knowledge, insofar as it resides in the shelter of llanguage, means the unconscious. I do not enter there, no more than did Newton, without a hypothesis.

My hypothesis is that the individual who is affected by the unconscious is the same individual who constitutes what I call the subject of a signifier. That is what I enunciate in the minimal formulation that a signifier represents a subject to another signifier. The signifier in itself is nothing but what can be defined as a difference from another signifier. It is the introduction of difference as such into the field, which allows one to extract from llanguage the nature of the signifier (ce qu'il en est du signifiant).

Stated otherwise, I reduce the hypothesis, according to the very formulation that lends it substance, to the following: it is necessary to the function-130 ing of llanguage. To say that there is a subject is nothing other than to say that there is a hypothesis. The only proof we have that the subject coincides with this hypothesis, and that it is the speaking individual on whom it is based, is that the signifier becomes a sign.

It is because there is the unconscious – namely, llanguage, insofar as it is on the basis of the cohabitation with llanguage that a being known as speaking being is defined – that the signifier can be called upon to constitute a sign (faire signe).[7] You can take "sign" here as you like, even as the English "thing."

The signifier is a subject's sign. Qua formal medium (support), the signifier hits something other (atteint un autre) than what it is quite crudely as signifier, an other that it affects and that is made into a subject of the signifier, or at least which passes for such (pour l'être). It is in that respect that the subject turns out to be – and this is only true for speaking beings – a being (un étant) whose being is always elsewhere, as the predicate shows.[8] The subject is never more than fleeting (ponctuel) and vanishing, for it is a subject only by a signifier and to another signifier.

It is here that we must return to Aristotle. In a choice guided by we know not what, Aristotle decided not to give any other definition of the individual than the body – the body as organism, as what maintains itself as one, and not as what reproduces. We are still hovering around the difference between the Platonic idea and the Aristotelian definition of the individual as grounding being. The question that arises for the biologist is to know how a body reproduces. What is in question in any work in so-called molecular chemistry is to know how something can be precipitated thanks to the combination of a certain number of things in a special soup[9] – for example, the fact that a bacterium begins to reproduce.

[7] Faire signe, like faire l'homme, has several meanings: "to play the part of a sign"; "to make, create, or constitute a sign"; and to "signal or give a sign (of life, for example)."

[8] The predicate here is presumably "speaking" in the expression "speaking being."

What then is the body? Is it or isn't it knowledge of the one?

Knowledge of the one turns out (se révèle) not to come from the body. The little we can say about knowledge of the one comes from the signifier "One." Does the signifier "One" derive from the fact that a signifier as such is never anything but one-among-others, referred to those others, being but its difference from the others? The question has been so little resolved to date that I devoted my whole seminar last year to accentuating this "There's such a thing as One" (Y a d' l'Un).

What does "There's such a thing as One" mean? From the one-among-others – and the point is to know whether it is any old which one – arises an S_1, a signifying swarm,[10] a buzzing swarm. If I raise the question, "Is it of them-two that I am speaking?", I will write this S_1 of each signifier, first on the basis of its relation to S_2.[11] And you can add as many of them as you like. This is the swarm I am talking about.

$$S_1(S_1(S_1(S_1 \rightarrow S_2)))$$

S_1, the swarm or master signifier, is that which assures the unity, the unity of the subject's copulation with knowledge. It is in llanguage and nowhere else, insofar as llanguage is investigated qua language, that what a primitive linguistics designated with the term στοιχεῖον,[12] element – and that was no 131 accident – can be discerned. The signifier "One" is not just any old signifier. It is the signifying order insofar as it is instituted on the basis of the envelopment by which the whole of the chain subsists.

I recently read the work of a person who investigates the relation of S_1 to S_2, which that person takes to be a relation of representation. S_1 is supposed [by that person] to be related to S_2 insofar as it represents a subject. Whether that relation is symmetrical, antisymmetrical, transitive, or other, whether the subject is transferred from S_2 to an S_3 and so on and so forth, these questions must be taken up on the basis of the schema that I am once again providing here.

The One incarnated in llanguage is something that remains indeterminate (indécis) between the phoneme, the word, the sentence, and even the whole of thought. That is what is at stake in what I call the master signifier. It is the signifier One, and it was no accident that, in order to illustrate the [9] Likely to be referred to now as the primal ooze or soup, instead of as a "unique bath" (bain unique).

[10] Essaim, which I have translated here as "swarm," is pronounced in French exactly like S_1.

[11] Recall that S_2 and est-ce d'eux are homonyms in French.

[12] This Greek term means "constituent," "element," "first principle," "primary matter," "letter of the alphabet," or "element of knowledge."

One, I brought to our last meeting[13] that bit of string, insofar as it constitutes a ring, whose possible knot with another ring I began to investigate.

I won't pursue that point any further today, since we have been deprived of a class due to exams at this university.

4

To change the subject, I will say that what is important in what has been revealed by psychoanalytic discourse – and one is surprised not to see its thread everywhere – is that knowledge, which structures the being who speaks on the basis of a specific cohabitation, is closely related to love. All love is based on a certain relationship between two unconscious knowledges.

If I have enunciated that the subject supposed to know is what motivates transference, that is but a particular, specific application of what we find in our experience. I'll ask you to look at the text of what I enunciated here, in the middle of this year, regarding the choice of love. I spoke, ultimately, of recognition, recognition – via signs that are always punctuated enigmatically – of the way in which being is affected qua subject of unconscious knowledge.

There's no such thing as a sexual relationship because one's jouissance of the Other taken as a body is always inadequate – perverse, on the one hand, insofar as the Other is reduced to object a, and crazy and enigmatic, on the other, I would say. Isn't it on the basis of the confrontation with this impasse, with this impossibility by which a real is defined, that love is put to the test? Regarding one's partner, love can only actualize what, in a sort of poetic flight, in order to make myself understood, I called courage – courage with respect to this fatal destiny. But is it courage that is at stake or pathways of recognition? That recognition is nothing other than the way in which the relationship said to be sexual – that has now become a subject-132 to-subject relationship, the subject being but the effect of unconscious knowledge – stops not being written.

"To stop not being written" is not a formulation proffered haphazardly. I associated it with contingency, whereas I delighted in [characterizing] the necessary as that which "doesn't stop being written," for the necessary is not the real. Let us note in passing that the displacement of this negation raises for us the question of the nature of negation when it takes the place of a non-existence. I have also defined the sexual relationship as that which "doesn't stop not being written." There is an impossibility therein. It is also that nothing can speak it – there is no existence of the sexual relationship in the act of speaking. But what does it mean to negate it (nier)? Is it in any way legitimate to substitute a negation for the proven apprehension of the non-existence? That too is a question I shall merely raise here. Does the word "interdiction" mean any more, is it any more permitted? That cannot be immediately determined either.

[13] The French here erroneously reads "second to last meeting."

I incarnated contingency in the expression "stops not being written." For here there is nothing but encounter, the encounter in the partner of symptoms and affects, of everything that marks in each of us the trace of his exile – not as subject but as speaking – his exile from the sexual relationship. Isn't that tantamount to saying that it is owing only to the affect that results from this gap that something is encountered, which can vary infinitely as to level of knowledge, but which momentarily gives the illusion that the sexual relationship stops not being written? – an illusion that something is not only articulated but inscribed, inscribed in each of our destinies, by which, for a while – a time during which things are suspended – what would constitute the sexual relationship finds its trace and its mirage-like path in the being who speaks. The displacement of the negation from the "stops not being written" to the "doesn't stop being written," in other words, from contingency to necessity – there lies the point of suspension to which all love is attached.

All love, subsisting only on the basis of the "stops not being written," tends to make the negation shift to the "doesn't stop being written," doesn't stop, won't stop.

Such is the substitute that – by the path of existence, not of the sexual relationship, but of the unconscious, which differs therefrom – constitutes the destiny as well as the drama of love.

Given the time, which is that at which I normally desire to take leave of you, I won't take things any further here – I will simply indicate that what I have said of hatred is not related to the level at which the hold (prise) of unconscious knowledge is articulated.

The subject can't not desire not to know too much about the nature of the eminently contingent encounter with the other. Thus he shifts [his focus] from the other to the being that is caught up therein.

The relation of being to being is not the relation of harmony that was 133 prepared for us throughout the ages, though we don't really know why, by a whole tradition in which Aristotle, who saw therein only supreme jouissance, converges with Christianity, for which it is beatitude. That gets us bogged down in a mirage-like apprehension. For it is love that approaches being as such in the encounter.

Isn't it in love's approach to being that something emerges that makes being into what is only sustained by the fact of missing each other (se rater)?[14] I spoke of rats earlier – that was what was at stake. It's no accident people chose rats. It's because one can easily make a unit of it – the rat can be "eraticated."[15] I already saw that at a time when I had a concierge, when I lived in the rue de la Pompe – the concierge never missed (ratait) a rat. His hatred for rats was equal to the rat's being.

Doesn't the extreme of love, true love, reside in the approach to being? And true love – analytic experience assuredly didn't make this discovery, borne witness to by the eternal modulation of themes on love – true love gives way to hatred.

There – I'm leaving you.

Shall I say, "See you next year"? You'll notice that I've never ever said that to you. For a very simple reason – which is that I've never known, for the last twenty years, if I would continue the next year. That is part and parcel of my destiny as object a.

After ten years, my podium (parole) was taken away from me. It turns out, for reasons wherein destiny played a part, as did my inclination to please certain people, that I continued for ten more (encore) years. I have thus closed the twenty-year cycle. Will I continue next year? Why not stop the encore now?

What is truly admirable is that no one ever doubted that I would continue. The fact that I am making this remark nevertheless raises the question. It could, after all, happen that to the encore I add – "That's enough."

Well, I'll leave it for you to place bets on. There are many who believe they know me and who think that I find herein an infinite satisfaction. Next to the amount of work it involves, I must say that that seems pretty minimal to me. So place your bets.

And what will the result be? Will it mean that those who have guessed correctly love me? Well – that is precisely the meaning of what I just enunciated for you today – to know what your partner will do is not a proof of love.

June 26, 1973

[14] "Missing" should be understood here in the sense of missing the mark, not missing someone who is far away.

[15] The French here, ça se rature, literally means "can be erased, struck out, crossed out," etc.

INDEX

a. See Object a
A. See Other
Ⱥ. See Barred Other, (Ⱥ)
Achilles, 8
Amour, âmer (soulove), 84–85, 88
Analysis, 90–91, 107, 115–16, 146 desire and, 5, 6, 11, 32, 34–37, 92–94, 99, 126 ethics and, 3
  linguistics and, 96, 100–101, 139 mathematics and, 48, 93, 117, 131 saying everything, 119 science and, 81, 88, 95
  status of, 42–44
  stupidity in, 11–13, 14–16, 20–21 subject in, 1–2, 50, 119 truth of, 12, 65, 91, 95, 108 understanding in, 30
  See also Analyst Analyst, 85–86 discourse of, 13*n*, 16–17, 48, 95 knowledge of, 95–96, 114 role of, 2, 95
Anxiety, 6–7
Aquinas, 70, 99, 114
Arbitrariness, 19, 29–30, 40
Aristotle, 3, 24, 31, 40–41, 53, 60, 67, 69, 71, 75, 82, 84–85, 87–88, 89, 91, 95, 99, 104, 105, 106, 109–12, 114, 142, 145
  See also specific works
Asexuality, 5*n*
Assemblages, 47–48
Aufhebung (sublation), 86
Augustine, Saint, 18, 100

Bar, 33–34
Baroque, the, 106–7, 113, 116
Barred Other, (Ⱥ) 28, 131
  See also Signifier of the lack in the Other, S(Ⱥ)
Barred subject, (Ⱪ), 63, 72, 80, 81, 109
Bateson, G., 138
Behaviorism, 105–6, 139–41
Being, 3, 10, 11, 22, 39, 43, 44–45, 48, 92, 95, 144
  Aristotle on, 3, 40
  as a body, 5–6, 71, 140
  Richard of St. Victor on, 40 and thinking, 84
Bentham, 3, 58, 118*n*
Berkeley, 102, 120
Bernini, 76
Borromean knots, 111, 123–36
Bourbaki, N., 28, 47
Briseis, 8

Capitalism, 36, 97
Castration, 7, 72, 77, 99
Cause
  Aristotelian, 24
  desire and, 6
Chain. See Signifying chain Child, 35
  reality and, 55–56
Christianity, 75–77, 82, 96, 99, 104, 106–9, 112–16, 145
Class logic, 106
Cogito, 21
Contingency, 59, 93–94, 145
Copernicus, 41–43, 141
Copulation, 112–15, 121
Cosmology, 41–43, 88
Cratylus (Plato), 19, 29

Demand, 126
  language and, 92
  Other and, 126
Descartes, René, 6, 21*n*, 96
Desire, 5, 50
  analysis and, 5, 6, 11, 32, 34–37, 92–94, 99, 126
  cause and, 6
  demand and, 100 lack and, 6
  language and, 127
  love and, 4, 6, 72
  man's desire as (for) the Other's desire, 4*n* object a and, 6, 72, 80, 92–93, 95, 99–100, 126, 136
  Other and, 4, 69, 80, 92, 98–100, 121, 126
  satisfaction and, 6
  See also Demand; Jouissance; Object a Dialectization, 93
Diary of a Seducer (Kierkegaard), 77
Ding (thing), 100
"Direction of the Treatment" (Lacan), 4*n* Discourse, 26, 37, 44, 114 analytic, 2, 3, 6–7, 9–11, 12–13, 14, 16–17, 21, 26–29, 30, 32, 34–37, 39, 41, 42–44, 48, 50, 68,

Discourse (continued)
83, 88, 91, 95, 108, 116–17, 126, 131, 137, 139, 144 change in, 54–55, 58–60, 65 four types, 16–17, 78
hysteric's, 16–17, 41
love and, 12, 16–17, 39–40, 66–68, 83 master's, 16–17, 29, 31–32, 39, 69 science and, 29, 33, 36, 81–82, 83, 86, 88, 117, 137, 138–39, 141–42
subject in, 16–17
university (academic), 16–17, 48
See also Language
Don Juan, 10, 129
Dreams, 56, 96, 107

Écrits (Lacan), 4*n*, 24*n*, 26, 28*n*, 34, 48, 65, 77
See also specific articles
Ecstasy, 75–77
Ego, 56, 108*n*
Ego psychology, 55*n*
"Enjoy!," 3, 7–8
Ethics of Psychoanalysis, The (Lacan), 1, 52–53, 57, 69, 100, 118*n*
Étourdit (Lacan), 9, 15, 100, 111, 119
Existence, 34, 121
Ex-sistence, 22, 43, 121, 129

Failure, 55, 56–63
Fantasy, 95, 107, 115
equivalence of subject and object in, 88 fundamental, 127
jouissance and, 86
matheme of, 94–95, 131
Father, 108
father (paternal) function of, 77, 79
See also Name-of-the-Father
Faut, Faudrait, Fauxdrait, 59–60
Feminine jouissance, 73–77, 87, 103
Fictions, The Theory of (Bentham). See Theory of Fictions, The Finite set, 9–10
Finnegans Wake (Joyce), 37
Form/matter distinction, 119
Formalization, 93, 130
Four Fundamental Concepts of Psychoanalysis, The (Lacan), 27, 95, 136
Frege, G., 5–6
Freud, S., 3*n*, 11*n*, 15, 37*n*, 50, 53, 55, 61–62, 66, 77, 80, 89, 91, 96, 100, 105, 108–9, 112, 115, 120, 121, 126
Lacan and, 41, 47, 97 on perversion, 86–87 on reality, 55–56
women and, 72, 74–75, 80, 86–87, 99, 127
See also specific works and concepts "Function and Field of Speech and Language" (Lacan), 27–28

Gaze, 49, 95, 100, 126
Gilson, E., 75
God, 45, 68, 70–71, 76, 77, 82–85, 88–89, 98–99, 108, 111, 115, 127, 135
Gödel's theorem, 119*n*
Grigg, Russell, 44

Hadewijch d'Anvers, 76
Hate, 4*n*, 67, 89, 91, 98–100, 121, 145–46
Hateloving, 90, 98
Hegel, G.F.W., 93, 106
Heidegger, M., 22*n*, 91
History, 45–47, 86, 93, 106
Hommosexualité, 84–85, 86
Homosexuality, 10, 25, 71, 85
Hysteria, 85, 102
Hysteric's discourse, 16–17, 41

Id, 87, 108*n*
Ignorance, 4*n* Imaginary register, 90, 95, 107, 133
object a and, 92–94
Imperfect tense, 31*n*-32*n*
Impossibility, 16, 59, 94
Impotence, 16, 56–57
Infinitude, 7–8, 10, 103
"Instance of the Letter in the Unconscious" (Lacan), 34, 65, 68
Interrupted sentences, 128

Jakobson, R., 14–15, 18
Jealouissance, 100
John of the Cross, Saint, 76
Jouissance, 1–11, 24–25, 35, 50, 70, 71, 76, 97, 107, 111–16, 121, 126, 131, 137, 145 discourse and, 39, 51, 54, 58–63, 83, 105, 126–27
fantasy and, 86
of the idiot, 81, 94 law and, 2–3, 92
mother's, 35
the Other jouissance, 4, 7–8, 17, 24, 38, 39, 73, 74, 75, 76–77, 83–84, 87, 137, 144
phallic jouissance, 7–9, 24, 35, 59–60, 64, 73, 74, 81 surplus jouissance (plus-de-jouir), 16–17, 131
Joyce, J., 36–37

Kant, E., 23, 87, 92
Kepler, J., 43
Kierkegaard, S., 77, 102
Knot theory, 122–36, 144
Knowledge, 1, 16–17, 49, 67, 78, 82, 91, 96–98, 104–5, 112, 119–22, 127, 131, 137, 139, 141–45
Kojève, A., 106
Koyré, A., 82

Lack, 113
desire and, 6
Lack in the Other feminine jouissance and, 73–77
signifier of, 28, 113
Lacoue-Labarthe, 65, 67, 68, 69
Language, 2–3, 10, 14–25, 28–36, 44–46, 54, 67, 80, 101, 111, 118–19, 122, 138
desire and, 127
as Other, 131
signifier, 30
unconscious and, 15, 21, 48, 51, 55, 96, 100, 110, 135
See also Discourse; Llanguage; Signifier(s)
Letter, 26, 36, 44, 46–48, 84, 97
Lévi-Strauss, C., 115
Libido, 80
Linguistics, 14–17, 18, 22, 29, 33, 34, 101–2
Linguistricks, 15–17, 101
Llanguage (lalangue), 44, 84, 101, 106, 132, 138–39, 141–42, 143
Logic, 10, 28
Aristotelian, 69, 102–3

classical, 102
intuitionist, 103
Port Royal, 17, 20
symbols of, 93, 95
"Logical Time and the Assertion of Anticipated Certainty" (Lacan), 48–49
Love, 4–6, 11–12, 16–17, 24–25, 38–40, 45, 47, 49, 56–57, 66–68, 70–71, 72, 75, 77, 83, 85, 87, 89, 91–92, 98, 104, 121, 137, 144–46
courtly love, 69, 74, 86
as mutual (reciprocal), 4, 6, 85 subject-to-subject, 50, 144
Lust-Ich (pleasure ego), 55–56
Lustprinzip (pleasure principle), 55–56, 62, 84, 94–95

Marx, K., 30, 97
Masculine structure. See Men
Mas d'Azil, 46
Master's discourse, 16–17, 29, 31–32, 39, 69
Master signifier, 16–17, 39*n*
Masturbation, 81
Mathematics, 22, 28, 44, 47–48, 93, 95, 103, 117, 119, 128–29, 130–31, 133, 135
Mathemes, 74*n*, 110, 119
Maupassant, G., 85
Meaning, 42–43, 45–46, 50, 78, 79
Men, 32–33, 35, 38, 73, 120, 131
desire and, 72, 86, 98–99
masculine structure, 80 symbolic order and, 79–80
See also Castration; Father
Metalanguage, 118–19, 121
Metaphor, 112, 120, 127, 128
Miller, J.-A., 1*n*, 27*n*
Milner, J.-C., 101, 103
Mother: and child, 35
as woman, 99

Naming, 10
Nancy, J.-L., 65, 67, 68, 69
Necessity, 59, 94
Needs, 51
Negation, 34
"Negation" (Freud), 55*n*
Neurosis, 86–87
Newtonian physics, 141–42
Nicomachean Ethics (Aristotle), 3, 51–55, 52*n*, 58, 62–63, 64, 70
Nygren, A., 75

Object. See Object a Object a, 28, 35, 49, 83–84, 131 as cause, 105
desire and, 6, 72, 80, 92–93, 95, 99–100, 126–27, 136
fantasy and, 80, 82, 86
as gaze, 49, 100, 126
hysteric's discourse and, 16–17 imaginary and, 92–94
as object of sucking, 126
Other and, 63, 92–93, 144
real and, 95
sexual relationship and, 58, 80, 86, 127 subject and, 127
as voice, 126
Object relations theory, 105
One, the, 5–7, 10, 47, 49, 50, 66–67, 102, 127–29, 131, 143
One-less, the, 129, 131
Organ pleasure, 7
Other, (A), 7–8, 9, 10, 17, 23–24, 28, 39–40, 45, 49, 68, 77, 81, 86, 87, 93, 96–97, 99, 116, 122, 128, 129, 131
desire and, 4, 69, 80, 92, 98–100, 121, 126–27
discourse of, 89
as lacking, 63, 114, 127 language as, 68
subject and, 87–88
symbolic order and, 4, 83, 97–98
See also Barred Other, (Ⱥ); Signifier of the lack in the Other, S(Ⱥ)
Other jouissance, 4, 7–8, 17, 24, 38, 39, 73, 74, 75, 76–77, 83–84, 87, 137, 144
Other of the Other, 4, 81, 89

Paradox, 45
Parapraxis, 37*n*
See also Slips of the tongue
Parmenides (Plato), 10, 22, 47, 114
Paul, Saint, 12
Paulhan, 18
Péguy, C., 76
Penis, 7, 76
Petit a. See Object a Petrie, F., 36
Phallic function, 39, 71, 76, 79 as contingent, 59, 94 negation and, 72
woman and, 17, 73–74
See also Phallus; Phallic jouissance
Phallic jouissance, 64
Phallus, (Φ), 7–8, 9, 28–29, 81, 94
and man, 7, 71, 76
woman and, 7, 73–74
See also Phallic function; Phallic jouissance
Philosophy, 11, 22, 30, 39, 44, 68, 70, 75, 86, 93, 105, 117
Physics, 24, 110–11
Plato, 4*n*, 29, 60, 82, 138, 142
Port Royal logic, 17, 20
Possibility, 85
Premature ejaculation, 115
Pronouns, 74*n*
Proper names, 10
Psychosis, 128
Publication, 26*n*

Quantifiers, 72, 78–80
Queneau, R., 106

Rabelais, 6*n*, 73
Reading, 26–29, 33, 36–37, 65–66, 67, 73 and understanding, 65
Real, 43, 48, 55, 95, 107, 131
object a and, 91–93
reality vs., 90, 94–95 symbolic and, 93–95
truth and, 91, 107, 119
Real-Ich (reality ego), 55–56
Reality principle, 55, 80
Recanati, F., 13, 17, 20, 101–3
Regine, 77, 102, 103
Religious ecstasy, 75–77
Repression, 61
Rhetoric (Aristotle), 70
Richard of St. Victor, 40
Rimbaud, 16

Rivalry, 100
Rougemont, D., 75
Rousselot, 70, 75
Russell, B., 93

S(Ⱥ). See Signifier of the lack in the Other, S(Ⱥ)
Sade, M., 23, 87
Sailor's knot, 123, 129–30
Sainte-Ann Hospital, 4, 36, 68
Satisfaction, 6, 51, 54, 61
Saussure, F. de, 17, 19, 29, 34, 40, 65, 96
Schreber, 128
Science, 17, 105–6, 116, 127, 135, 139
  cause and, 88, 109, 128, 142–43
  discourse of, 29, 33, 36, 81–82, 83, 86, 88, 117 psychoanalysis and, 95, 117 Set theory, 9–10 on assemblages, 47–48
  Bourbaki and, 28, 47
  symbols and, 36
Sexuation, 5–7, 103*n*
Signifier(s), 5, 17–21, 24–25, 28–35, 38–41, 42, 43, 49–50, 78, 96, 141–42 binary, (S_2), 13, 16–17, 91, 143 body and, 4–5, 23 chain of, 50
  letter, 93, 94
  master, 16–17, 39*n*
  signification, 29, 57, 73
  signified and, 18, 20, 29, 33–34, 37, 42, 80, 81, 88, 101, 142 signifierness (signifiance), 18–19, 71, 77, 93 and subversion of meaning, 19
  topology of, 9, 11, 18
  unary, (S_1), 13, 16–17, 80, 91, 94, 143–44
Signifier of the lack in the Other, S(Ⱥ), 28, 73, 81, 94–95 confusion with object a, 83 and women, 80, 83–84, 131
  See also Barred Other, (Ⱥ)
Signifying chain, 111, 125–28, 135
Silesius, A., 76
Slips of the tongue, 37
Soul (l'âme), 82, 84–88, 109–10, 113, 116
Speaking being(s), 2, 24, 55, 66, 80, 116, 137, 139, 142, 144
Speech, 10, 27–28, 29, 64, 112, 114–15, 119, 126–27, 132
Structuralism, 101
Stupidity (la bêtise), 11–13, 14–16, 20–21, 25, 27
Subject, 65, 69, 127, 136
  analysis and, 11, 13, 16–17
  analyst's discourse and, 16–17, 126 castration and, 7, 72, 77, 99
  cause and, 109
  fantasy and, 88
  hysteric's discourse and, 16–17 knowledge and, 16–17, 67, 126 logical time of, 142 represented by a signifier to another signifier, 49–50, 142 temporal status, 142
  topology of, 11
  unconscious and, 21, 37, 96, 98, 142
  university discourse and, 16–17
  See also Barred subject
Sublimation, 121
Substance, 107
  enjoying, 23, 24 extended, 21, 23 thinking, 21–22
Superego, 3, 7–8
Surplus jouissance, 16–17
Symbolic order, 90, 94, 95, 107, 119, 133 incompleteness, 119
  Other and, 83, 94
  See also Language; Letter; Signifier(s) System, 70

Temporality, 142
Theory of Fictions, The (Bentham), 3*n*, 58, 118*n*
Thinking, 84, 104–5
Third person, 74*n*
Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality (Freud), 87, 112
Title of the Letter, The (Nancy and Lacoue-Labarthe), 62, 67, 69, 101
Topics (Aristotle), 70
Topology, 9, 11, 18, 131–32
Transference, 67, 144
Truth, 12, 53, 65, 90, 91–95, 103, 107–8, 119–22, 127, 131

Unary signifier, 143–44
Unary trait, 47
Unconscious, 4, 14, 21–22, 34, 99, 104–5, 115, 131, 135, 137, 139, 141, 144–45 as language, 15, 48, 56, 67, 96, 100, 135, 139, 142 language of, 51, 110 meaning and, 88
  signifying chain and, 135 subject and, 21, 37, 81, 87–88
Understanding, 68
Universals, 53, 60
University discourse, 16–17, 48
Urverdrängung (primal repression), 61
Utilitarianism, 3, 58, 60

Verneinung. See "Negation" Voice, 126
Voilquin, 52
Voltaire, 108

Wèltanschauung. See World view Wissentrieb, 105
Woman, 10, 32, 35, 38, 63, 73, 120, 131 no essence of, 7, 33, 57, 60, 61, 72, 73, 76, 80, 103
  as open set, 9–10, 80
  Other to herself, 81, 85, 89
Women, 85
  desire and, 80, 98–99
  Freud and, 74–75, 80, 86–87, 127 and the Other jouissance, 7–8, 17, 76–77, 83–84, 87, 89, 103
  phallic function and, 71, 72, 73
  See also Sexuation
Women's liberation movement, 57, 74
World view, 30–31, 41, 43*n*, 49, 105
Writing, 26–29, 33, 35, 40, 44–45, 46–47, 49, 93, 115, 120–21, 122, 132, 144–45
Written, the, 26–29, 33–36, 59

Zeno, 8

LES NON-DUPES ERRENT

Seminar 1: Wednesday 13 November 1973

I begin again. I am beginning again because I had thought I might have been able to finish. This is what I call elsewhere the passe: I believed that it had passed. Only there you are: this belief – 'I believed that it had passed' – this belief gave me the opportunity to notice something. This is even what I call the passe is like. It gives the opportunity all of a sudden to see a certain relief, a relief of what I have done up to now. And it is this relief that is exactly expressed by my title for this year, the one that you have been able to read, I hope, on the notice and which is written:

as in a relief map. Lights flows.

– or to ASTRAY

Les non-dupes errent: The unduped wander/are mistaken.

That has a funny sound, huh? It is my kind of little air. Or to put things better, a little erre –e, double r, e. You know perhaps what is meant by an erre? It is something like the initial impetus. The impetus of something when what is propelling it stops and it still continues to move on. It nevertheless remains that this sounds strictly the same as les noms du père (the names of the father). Namely, what I promised to never speak about again. There you are. This because of certain people that I no longer need to describe, who, in the name of Freud, precisely, made me suspend what I had planned to state about the names of the father. Yeah. Obviously, it is in order not to give them in any way a consolation for the fact that I could have brought them some of these names that they are ignorant of because they repress them. It could have been of use to them. Which is what I

Direct allusion to Lyotard who was an analysand of Lacan's. Lyotard's doctoral thesis was on 'In the Name of the Father' Lacan and Lyotard did not Read what he was talking about.

In 1964 after he was dumped from the IPA

http://www.lacaninireland.com

would have precisely nothing to do with. In any case, I know that (10) they will not find them all by themselves, that they will not find them, given the way they have started, under Freud's impetus. Namely, under the way psychoanalytic societies are set up. There you are.

So then les non-dupes errent and les noms du père are so consonant, are all the more consonant that contrary, like that, to a certain leaning that people who believe themselves to be literate have in making liaisons even when it is a matter of an 's', you do not say les non-dupes z'errent, you do not say either les cerises z'ont bon goût, you say: les cerises ont bon goût and les non-dupes errent". They are consonant. That's the richness of the tongue. And I would even go further – it is a richness that not all tongues have, but this indeed is why they are varied. But what I am putting forward, from these encounters that are described as witticisms, perhaps I will manage before the end of this year to make you sense it – to make you sense a little better what the witticism is.

This is debatable

And I am even right away going to put forward something about it.

In these two terms put into words, les noms du père and les non-dupes qui errent, it is the same knowledge. In the two. It is the same knowledge in the sense that the unconscious is a knowledge from which the subject can decipher himself. It is the definition of the subject that I am giving here. Of the subject as the unconscious constitutes him. It deciphers him, the one who by being a speaker is in a position to set about this operation, who is even up to a certain point forced until he reaches a meaning. And that is where he stops, because... one has to stop. One even asks for nothing but that! One asks only for that because one does not have the time. So then he stops at a meaning, but the meaning at which one ought to stop, in the two cases, even though it is the same knowledge, is not the same meaning.

Very dense
The terms sound
the same in French.
It's the same word.
knowledge. It's part of the langue as in a dream of the whole field Joyce etc.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Which is curious.

And which allow us to put our finger right away on the fact that it is not the same meaning, simply by reason of the spelling. Which allows us to suspect something. Something whose indication, in fact, you can see in what in some of my previous seminars, I noted about the relationships of writing to language.

Do not be too astonished, anyway, that here I am leaving the thing as a riddle, since the riddle, is the fullness of meaning. And you should not even believe that on occasion, it remains there, in connection with (11) this rapprochement, of this phonematic identity, of les noms du père and les non-dupes errent, you must not believe that there is no riddle there for me myself – and this indeed is what is at stake.

This indeed is what is at stake, and also this: that there is no difficulty in the fact that I imagine I comprehend. It illuminates the subject in the sense that I said earlier, and it gives you work. It must indeed be said, that for me, there is nothing more deadly than to give you work...but anyway, it's my role!

Work (le travail), everyone knows where that comes from, in the tongue, in the tongue that I am chatting to you in. You have perhaps heard talk of it, it comes from tripalium, which is an instrument of torture. And which was made of three stakes. At the Council of Auxerre it was said that it was not appropriate for priests or deacons to be alongside this instrument by means of which torquentur rei, the guilty are tortured. It is not fitting that either the priest or the deacon should be there (it would perhaps give them a hard-on).

It is in effect quite clear that work, as we know it through the unconscious, is what makes relationships, relationships to this knowledge by which we are tormented is what makes these relationships to enjoyment.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then I said: there is no objection to me imagining. I did not say 'I imagine myself'. It is you who imagine that you comprehend. Namely, that in this 'you-you', you imagine that it is you who comprehend, but I did not say that it was me, I said 'I imagine'. As regards what you imagine, I am trying to temper the matter. I am doing everything I can in any case, to prevent you. Because one must not comprehend too quickly, as I have often underlined.

What I put forward, nevertheless, with this 'I imagine', in connection with meaning, is a remark that I will put forward this year. It is that the imaginary, whatever you may have heard about it, because you imagine you comprehend – the fact is that the imaginary, is a dit-mansion, as you know I write it, just as important as the others. This can be very clearly seen in mathematical science. I mean in the one that is teachable because it concerned the real that the symbolic conveys. Which moreover only conveys it because of the fact that what constitutes the symbolic is always enciphered (chiffré). The imaginary is what stops the deciphering, it is meaning. As I told you, one must indeed stop somewhere, and even as soon as one can.

(12) The imaginary, is always an intuition of what is to be symbolised. As I have just said, something to chew on, to think, as they say. And in a word a vague enjoyment. Human wanking is more varied than is believed, even though it is limited by something that stems from the body, the human body, namely what, in the present state of things – but precisely it has not finished, something else may perhaps arrive – in the present state of things, assures the dominance of the opsis [appearance] in the little that we know about it, about this body, namely, anatomy.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

This dominance of the opsis, is what ensures that...is what ensures that all the same there is always intuition in what the mathematician starts from. I will perhaps this year make you sense the knot (make no mistake), the knot of the affair, in connection with what they call – I am talking about mathematicians, I am not one of them, I regret – of what they call 'vector space'.

It is very nice to see how this business, which is perhaps anyway, some of you must have heard it vaguely spoken about, I can in any case affirm to them, that it is truly the last great step in mathematics, it starts like that from a philosophical intuition Ausdehnungslehre: the maths (Lehre is what is taught), the maths of extension, as Grassmann calls it. And then it comes out of that vector space and the calculus of the same name, is that not so, namely, something that is mathematically quite teachable, as I might say, something strictly symbolised, and which, at the limit, anyway, can.....can function with a machine, huh?

It does not need to comprehend anything about it.

Why would it be necessary to return to comprehending – we will speak again about vector space, allow me simply to be satisfied today with an announcement – why is it necessary to return to comprehending, namely to imagining, in order to know where to apply the system?

More geometrico. Anyway, the most stupid geometry on earth, the one that you were taught at school, the one that proceeds from the cutting up of space with a saw: you saw a space in two, then after that you cut the shadow of the sawing along a line, and after that you mark a point... good. It is all the same amusing that more geometrico should have appeared like that throughout the centuries to be the model of logic. I mean that this is what Spinoza wrote at the head of the Ethics. Anyway that is how it was before logic, all the same.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(13) learned certain lessons, lessons which mean that we have all the same arrived at emptying out intuition, is that not so, and that, at present, it has even gone to the extremes in a book of mathematics, of these modern mathematics that according to some people are execrable, for many chapters one can do without the slightest figure. But all the same – and this is what is strange – one gets there. One always finishes by getting there.

So then I am putting forward, I am putting forward this for you this year: one always gets there, and it is not because geometry is done in space, in the intuitive, is that not so, the geometry of Greeks, anyway, of which one can say that... it was not bad, but in the end it was no great shakes. One gets to it for a different reason. Singularly, I will tell you: the fact is that there are three dimensions of the space inhabited by the speaking being (le parlant), and that these three dit-mansions, as I write them, are called the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real. This is not quite like Cartesian co-ordinates; it is not just because there are three of them, do not be misled. Cartesian co-ordinates belong to the old geometry. It is because....it is because it is a space of mine, as I define it from these three dit-mansions, it is a space whose points are determined quite differently. And this is what I tried – since this went beyond perhaps my capacities, it is perhaps this that gave me the idea of dropping the matter – it is a geometry where the points – for those who were there, I hope, last year – whose points are determined from the squeezing (coincage) of what you remember perhaps, what I called my 'rings of string'.

Because there is perhaps another way of making a point than beginning by sawing space, then afterwards tearing the page, then with the line which, one does not know from where, floats between the two, breaking this line, and saying: that is the point, namely nowhere, namely nothing, it is perhaps by noticing that, simply by taking three of them, of these rings of strings, as I explained it for you, when there are three, even though if you cut one of them, the two others are not linked, they can, simply because they are three (before this three the two remaining separate), simply by being three, they squeeze one another in such a way as to be inseparable. Hence the squeezing. The squeezing is written something like that: namely, if you pull somewhere on any one of these rings of string, you see that there is a point, a point which is somewhere around there where the three are squeezed.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

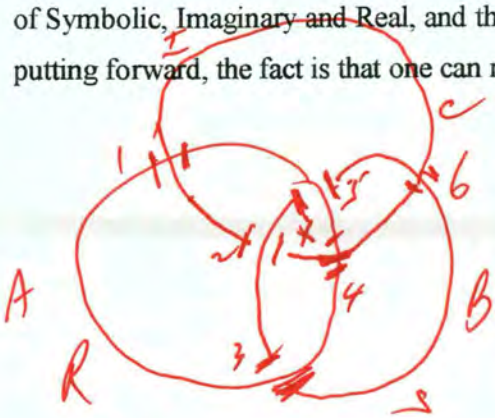
(14) It is a little bit different to everything that has been lucubrated up to now more geometrico, because it requires that there should be three rings, three rings of string, something much more consistent than this void with which one operates on space; three of them are required always, in any case to determine a point. I will re-explain that for you still better, namely per longum et latum, but I am pointing out to you that it starts, it starts, this notion, from a different way of operating with space, with the space that we really inhabit...if the unconscious exists. I am starting from a different way of considering space; and that in qualifying these three dimensions, in pinpointing them by the very terms that I appeared up to now to strongly differentiate in terms of Symbolic, Imaginary and Real, and that I am in the process of putting forward, the fact is that one can make them strictly equivalent.



Space for your own version of the Borromean Knot !

This is a question which Freud asks himself at the end of The interpretation of dreams on the second last page: he asks the question of how what he calls – and one clearly sees that he does not any longer call it with such certainty, that he no longer pinpoints it by

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Freud talks about psychical + material reality.

something that would separate it out – what he calls reality, that he describes as psychical: what does that have to do with the real?

So here then, he vacillates, he vacillates again a little, and he catches hold of material reality, but what does material reality mean in its relationships with psychical reality?

He is going to spend time on the last two pages of the 'Interpretation' of Dreams.

We are going then, we are going then to try to distinguish them, to still keep an ounce of distinction between these three categories, while marking what I am putting on the agenda, namely, clearly marking that, as dimensions of our space – our space inhabited qua speaking beings – these three categories are strictly equivalent.

We already know the knack for that, huh? They are designated by (15) letters. This is the quite new path that has been opened up by algebra, and you see there the importance of the written. If I write R.I.S. (Real, Imaginary, Symbolic), or better: Real, Symbolic, Imaginary (you will see later why I am correcting it), you write them in capital letters, you cannot do otherwise, and they remain for you like that, sticking, in a way to the thing, simply a question of writing, it is quite heterogeneous, you continue like that because you have always comprehended – you have always comprehended, but wrongly – that the progress, the forward step was to have marked the overwhelmingly importance of the Symbolic with respect to this misfortunate Imaginary with which I began, I began by firing bullets at it, anyway, under the pretext of narcissism; only you know it is altogether real that the mirror image is inverted. And that even with a knot, especially with a knot, and despite appearances, because you imagine perhaps that there are knots whose mirror image can perhaps be superimposed on the knot itself, that is not at all the case.

Space – I mean like that intuitive, geometrical space – is orientable. There is nothing more specular than a knot. And that indeed is why (that indeed is why...) that it is something completely different if you make the choice of writing this same capital RSI – you see where the trick lies – of writing them a, b, c. Here everyone senses that, at the very least that brings them together, huh, an a is worth a b, a b is worth a c, and...and it turns around, like that. It is even on this that the combinatorial was founded. It was on this that the combinatorial was founded and that is why when you put the three letters in a sequence, well then, there are no more than six ways to order them. Namely, according to the factorial law that presides over this business, it is 1 multiplied by 2 multiplied by 3: that gives 6, huh? Once you have 4, there are 24 ways of ordering them.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Only if, if you submit yourself to a conception of space in which the point is defined in the way that I have just showed, by squeezing – excuse me today for not writing all of that in figures on the board, I will do it afterwards – you notice that it is not by reason, like that, of a scansion that goes from the better to the worse, from the Real to the Imaginary, putting the Symbolic in the middle, it is not by reason of some preference or other, that you should notice that, in taking things (16) from the angle of squeezing, in other words by the Borromean knot: one ring of string is the Real, one ring of string is the Symbolic, one ring of string is the Imaginary, well then, you must not believe that all the ways of making this knot are the same.

There is a laevogyratory knot and a dextrogyratory knot. (as in polarised light)

And even this, even if you have written the three dimensions of space that I define as being the space inhabited by the speaking being, even if you have not defined these dimensions by small letters, even if you define these dimensions by a, b, c, that you do not put here any emphasis on a diversely preferential content, you notice that, if you write a, b, c, there is a first series, and despite yourself, you will qualify it as the right one: the series that I call laevogyratory, which will be a, b, c, then b, c, a, then c, a, b, namely, that there is the series – the laevogyratory series which always leaves a certain order, which is precisely the order a, b, c,: it is the same one that is conserved in b, c, a. And that the c comes first is of no importance. It is legitimate for you to imagine, since it was the capital 'I' that I pinpointed with a small c, to imagine the reality of the Symbolic.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is sufficient if the Real remains before it. And you must not believe for all that that this 'before' of the Real with respect to the Symbolic, is all by itself some kind of guarantee of anything whatsoever! Because if you re-transcribe the a, b, c, of the first formula you will have R. S. I., namely: what produces (réalise) the Symbolic from the Imaginary.

Well then, what produces the Symbolic from the Imaginary, what else is it except religion... for me? What produces in proper terms the Symbolic from the Imaginary, is indeed what ensures that religion is not about to end. And that puts us, us analysts, on the same side, on the laevogyratory side, by means of which imagining what has to be done, imagining the Real from the Symbolic, our first step taken a long time ago, is mathematics, and the final one, is what the consideration of the unconscious leads us to, in so far as it is from that that there is opened up – I have always professed it – it is from there that linguistics is opened up.

Namely, that it is by spreading the mathematical procedure which consists in noticing the fact that there is some Real in the Symbolic, that it is by this that a new passage is outlined for us.

The Imaginary does not need then to be placed at any rank (17) whatsoever. It is the order that is important, and in the other dextrogyratory order, curiously, you have the formula a, c, b, as a result of which it is in the second phase that c comes first, but b is before a, and in the third phase, it is b, a, c, namely, three terms which we will see are of no little importance in discourse, it is from there no less that there emerged some distinct structures, which are precisely

http://www.lacaninireland.com

all those by which other discourses are supported, only those that the laevogyratory discourses permit to demonstrate by the space that they determine – certainly not as having had at one time their efficaciousness, but as properly speaking put in question by the other discourses. And here I am not showing any partiality, since I am putting us on the same side as where religion functions.

I will say no more about it today. But what I am putting forward is this: if in the tongue, the structure, it must be imagined, is this not what I am putting forward by the formula: les non-dupes errent? Since this is not immediately accessible, I am going to try to show it to you.

There is something in the idea of dupery, which is that it has a support: it is the dupe. There is something absolutely magnificent in this business of the dupe, it is that the dupe, if you will allow me, the dupe is considered to be stupid. One must really ask why. If the dupe is truly what we are told – I am speaking etymologically, this has no importance – if the dupe is this bird called the hoopoe (huppe) the hoopoe because it is smart (huppée), naturally nothing justifies that smart should be called hoopoe, it nevertheless remains that that is how it is summed up in the dictionary, the dupe, it appears, is the bird one can trap, precisely because it is stupid. We can absolutely not see why a hoopoe should be more stupid than any other bird, but the remarkable thing for me, is the accent the dictionary puts on specifying that it is feminine. Dupe is la.

There is somewhere a thing that I picked out, that I picked out in Littré: that it was a mistake for La Fontaine to make the dupe masculine. He dared write somewhere:

Du fil et du soufflet pourtant embarrassé,
Un des dupe un jour alla trouver un sage Embarrassed by the thread and the snub,
One of the dupes went one day to find a wise man.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(17) 'This is quite wrong', Littré says clearly, 'one does not say, un dupe, anymore that one can say un linnotte (a linnet, a featherbrain) to describe un etourdi (a scatterbrain).' That's a powerful reason.

The interesting thing is to know what gender the (le) non-dupe is. You see? I say right away: le non-dupe. Is it because what is highlighted by a non is neutral? I am not going to decide this: but there is one thing that in any case is clear, it is that the plural, by not being marked, makes this reference to the feminine completely uncertain. And there is something, anyway, which is still funnier that I – I cannot say that I found it in Chamfort – I found it also in the dictionary, in another one, this quotation of Chamfort, but it's not bad all the same, anyway, that it should be at the word dupe that I picked out this: 'One of the best reasons', writes Chamfort, 'that one can have for never marrying' (ah!) 'is that one is not completely la dupe of a woman as long as she is not your own'. La vôtre! Your wife or your dupe. Now there's something, all the same, that appears, anyway... illuminating, huh?

Marriage as reciprocal dupery.

This indeed why I think marriage is love: feelings are always reciprocal, I have said. So then... if marriage is such at this point...it's not sure, huh! Anyway, if I let myself go with the flow a little, I would say that – this is what Chamfort means – also no doubt – a woman never makes a mistake. Not in marriage in any case. This is why the function of spouse has nothing human about.

We will explore that another time.

I spoke about the non-dupe. And I seemed to have marked him, in fact by an irremediable weakness, in saying that...he errs. Only we must clearly see what is meant by: ça erre.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I pointed out to you earlier that errer (anyway you are going all the same to consult the dictionary of Bloch et von Wartburg, because I am not going to spend my time doing etymology with you, which means simply highlighting the usage throughout the ages, that etymology makes perfectly obvious, does it not?) the fact is that exactly as in my title les Non-dupes errent and les Noms du père, huh, it is exactly the same thing for the word erre, or more exactly for the word errer.

Errer results from the convergence of 'error', erreur, with something (19) that has strictly speaking nothing to do with it, and which is akin to this erre of which I spoke to you earlier, which is strictly the relationship with the verb iterare. Iterare, what's more (because if it were only that, it would be nothing) is there uniquely for iter which means a journey. This indeed is why the knight errant is simply an itinerant knight.

Only, all the same, errer comes from iterare, which has nothing to do with a journey, since it means to repeat, from iterum (re!). Nevertheless, this iterare is only used for what it does not mean, namely itinerare, as is proved by the developments that have been given to this very errer in the sense of wandering, namely, by making of the knight errant an itinerant knight.

Well then, that is the point of what I have to say to you, considering the difference, the difference that is... pinpointed from the fact that there are non-dupes. If the non-dupes are those (ceux ou celles) that refuse to be captured by the space of the speaking being, if they are those who keep their hands free of it, as I might say, there is something that we must know how to imagine, which is the absolute necessity that results from it, not wandering but error.

Namely, that as regards everything that is involved in life and at the same time in death, there is an invention (imagination) that cannot but

http://www.lacaninireland.com

support all those who want to be non-dupes in structure. It is this: that their life is only a journey.

Life is a journey . . . . Where is her conflict in the world of the speaking being!

Life is that of the viator. Those who in this lower world – as they say – are in a foreign land.

The only thing that they do not notice, is that simply by bringing out this function of foreigner, they give rise at the same time to the third term, the third dimension, the one thanks to which they will never get out of the relationships of this life, unless it is to be then still more duped than the others, by this locus of the other that with their Imaginary they nevertheless constitute as such.

The idea of genesis, of development, as they say, of what is supposed to be some norm or other, thanks to which a being which is only specified by being speaking, in everything that is involved about its effects, precisely, will be commanded by something or other that no one is capable of defining, which is called development. And that is why, by wanting to reduce analysis, one fails, one makes the complete error, the radical error as regards what is involved in what the unconscious uncovers.

(20) There is something that Freud says to us, and here it is unambiguous: Und (it is the final paragraph of the Traumdeutung) der Wert des Traums für die Kenntnis der Zukunft?. Re value of dreams for the knowledge of the future.

And this is why it is very nice. Because people believe that in writing this, Freud is making an allusion to the famous divinatory value of dreams. But can we not read it differently? Namely, to say to us, and the value of the dream for the knowledge (connaissance) of what is going to result from it in the world, from the discovery of the unconscious, to see, whether, by chance, a discourse ensured that in a more and more widespread way, it is known – it is known – what the end of Freud's paragraph says, namely that this future held by the

This is the last paragraph of the dream book. L. says this not that dreams predict the future.

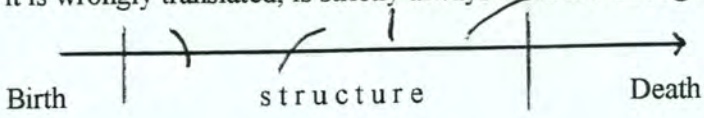
http://www.lacaninireland.com

dreamer to be present, is gestaltet, structured by the indestructible demand in so far as it is always the same: zum Ebenbild. Namely, that if you wish, I am going to put something for you here:

Birth ——————————→ Death

which is supposed to be this journey, namely this development, like that, punctuated between birth and death.

What does Freud indicate to us from the emergence of the unconscious? It is that at whatever point one is at of this so-called journey, the structure, of something that I am sketching here, it does not matter: the structure, namely, the relationship to a certain knowledge, the structure, for its part never lets go. And the desire, as it is wrongly translated, is strictly always the same throughout life.



Simply the relationships of a particular being in his emergence, in his emergence into a world where already it is this discourse that reigns, his desire is completely determined from the beginning to the end.

This indeed is why it is only by... by no longer wishing to be a dupe of the structure, that one imagines in the maddest way, that life is woven from some contraries or other of life drives and death drives, is already all the same to float a little bit higher, anyway, than the notion – the age old notion of a journey.

(21) Those who are not dupes of the unconscious, namely, who do not spend their whole effort sticking to it, is that not so, who only see life from the point of view of the viator – this indeed is how moreover, that there arose... anyway...a whole stage of logic, the one from which subsequently, of course, and with I do not know what consequences, there appeared these things which one does not even see the degree to produces: there are some very funny things. I do not want to compromise God too much in this business, everyone knows that I consider that...he is rather of the order of the super cherished; so then (22) why would he always tell the truth, when it works out just as well if he is totally deceptive, huh? Admitting that he made the Real, he is all the more subject to it in that precisely, if it is he who made it, so then, why not? I believe that, when all is said and done, this is how there must be interpreted the famous business of Descartes, is that not so, the evil genius (le malin génie). Well then, he is the evil genius and things work out like that. The smarter (malin) he is, the better things will go. That is even why it is necessary to be a dupe.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is necessary to be a dupe, namely to stick, to stick to the structure.

Good, well listen, I've had my bellyful of this!.

Definitions

Errer: 1. To roam, wander about. 2. To err; to be mistaken

Erre: the speed acquired by a ship when what is propelling it is no longer acting; something or someone that slides on after its initial impetus has been removed.

OR THE IMPETUS WHICH A DIVER HAS WHEN HE DIVES INTO A POOL.

Lancee: the initial impetus

Les non-dupes errent

The unduped wander / are mistaken

http://www.lacaninireland.com

which they are paradoxes, is that not so: all men are mortal. Namely, what I said, travellers, huh.

Socrates is a man – and he is a man, he is a man, if he wishes, huh, he is a man if he throws himself into it, is that not so, this indeed moreover is what he does, and this indeed is why moreover, the fact that he should have asked for death, there is all the same quite a little difference; but this difference did not prevent what followed being absolutely fascinating. Nor was it any worse because of that.....with his hysteria, he allowed a certain shadow of science, the one that precisely is founded on this categorical logic. It was a very bad example.

But this must [spread], huh. In any case this essentially imaginary function of the viator, ought to put us on our guard against any metaphor that comes from the way. I know well that the way, the way that is at stake, the Tao, imagines itself as being in the structure. But is it quite sure that there is only one Way? Or even that the notion of the way, of the method, is worth anything at all? Might it not be in forging for ourselves a quite different ethic, an ethic that would be founded on the refusal of being unduped, on the way of being always more strongly the dupe of this knowledge, of this unconscious which, when all is said and done, is our only lot in terms of knowledge.

I know well that there is this blessed question of the truth, huh. We are not going like that, after what I have said to you about it, returning to it and turning around it, set about sticking to it without knowing that it is a choice, since it can only be half-said. And after all, behind what we choose to say about it, behind there is always a desire, an intention, as they say.

It is on this that there was founded, in any case, all phenomenology, I am talking about that of Husserl. According, like that, as you vary the 'bits to say' of the truth, of course, to see the sort of things it

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 2: Wednesday 20 November 1973

There is a little book, there that..... I am going to begin like that in a confidential way, huh, because, obviously I ask myself, I ask myself in starting up again, is that not so: am I enough of a dupe – am I enough of a dupe, huh – not to make a mistake (errer)?

To make a mistake in the sense that I specified for you the last time, which means: am I sticking enough to... to the analytic discourse, which does not all the same fail to comprise a certain sort of cold horror. Am I sticking to it enough not to... to be distracted from it, namely, not to truly follow it along its thread, or even, to employ a term that I will use later, there where I am expected, onto vector spaces, I am saying this to you right away; anyway, I will not tackle that today, but spaces introduces a notion, like that, another space in space. That is called fibred space (espace fibré).

But anyway, this analytic discourse, this must not all the same be forgotten, to excuse myself if I do not completely stick to it, the fact is that I founded it. I founded it in a written elaboration, the one that writes the small o and the S_2 superimposed on the left, and then the $ and the S_1 on the right.

$$\frac{\mathbf{o}}{S_2} \longrightarrow \frac{$}{S_1}$$

http://www.lacaninireland.com

When what is at stake is being dupe, is that not so, it is not a matter on this occasion of being the dupe of my ideas, because these four little letters are not ideas. They are not even ideas at all, the proof, is that it (24) is very, very difficult to give them a meaning. Which does not mean that... one cannot make something of them. This is what is inscribed from a certain elaboration of what I will call, it is the same thing to say that it is inscribed as to say what I am going to say now namely,: the mathematics of Freud, what is locatable in the logic of his discourse, in his own wandering. Namely, the way he tried to render this analytic discourse adequate to the scientific discourse. That was his erre. This is what – I cannot say prevented him in a word – to construct the mathematics of it; since the mathematics that he did like that, needed a second step in order to be able to be inscribed subsequently.

So then, while I was speaking to you the last time, there came back to me, like that, blasts of memories, of something which of course did not happen to me here, which had worried me that morning in preparing what I had to say to you.

There you are, it is called – let us say it right away – it is called die Grenzen der Deutbarkeit. It is something which has a close relationship, in fact, with the inscription of the analytic discourse; the fact is if this inscription is indeed what I am saying about it, namely, the beginning, the key kernel of its mathematics, there is every chance that it can be used for the same thing as mathematics. Namely, that it carries in itself its own limit. I knew that I had read that, because I had it in an old yoke that I had bought like that, second hand, in the debris of what survived from the story of Freud, after the Nazi business, so then I had this debris... and I said to myself that all the same that must have been collected somewhere, given the date. It's true. It had been collected in volume III of the Gesammelte Schriften. But! But nowhere else, namely, where it ought to have appeared, being already edited in 1925, in fact, and even already appeared, in fact, the first time, if I remember correctly, in... Well then, it had not appeared at all before... before that, before what I had then.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then it was then – it came out in the Gesammelte Schriften but it did not appear where it should have appeared at the time it came out, namely, in the 8th edition of the Traumdeutung. And it did not appear because, in the additional notes in question, there is a third chapter – the first being constituted by these Grenzen der Deutbarkeit, the second I will skip over, I will talk to you about it again – and the third signifies Die okkulte Bedeutung des Traumes. Namely, the occult significance. That is why it did not appear.

(25) What remained in my mind, what worried me, was die Grenzen. But because of the fact that these Grenzen were associated to the occult significance, it did not come out. Jones says that somewhere: there is an objection in fact to the occult. There is an objection from the side of scientific discourse. And in effect, as it is presented now, the occult, is defined very precisely, anyway, as what scientific discourse cannot stand. This is even one might say its definition. So then, it is not astonishing that it should object to it. This objection came, like that, conveyed by Jones, and this may appear a quite simple explanation of the fact that it did not appear where it should have appeared, namely, in the 8th edition.

Freud, as you know, there was nothing new, in fact, in that he worried about the occult. He did so, like that, by... by an erre. By an erre concerning scientific discourse. Yes, because he imagined that scientific discourse ought to take all the facts into account. It was a pure erre. And a still more serious erre: an erre that was pushed to the point of being an error. Scientific discourse does not take into account the facts that do not stick to its structure, namely, where it began to advance, its relationship with its own mathematics. But for it not to stick to it, it is still necessary that it should come within reach of this mathematical structure.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So that it takes into account all the facts which create a hole in its, let us say, I am going quickly, here, because it is not a valid word... but which create a hole because it is more tangible, right away, to say it like that, which make a hole in its system! But it wants to know nothing about what does not belong at all to its system. So then, in worrying himself like that, about occult phenomena – ones described as occult, that does not at all mean that they are occult, that they are hidden, because, what is hidden is what is hidden by the form of the discourse itself, but what has absolutely nothing to do with the form of the discourse is not hidden, it is elsewhere.

You there, such as you are, like that – I am appealing to your feeling, in fact – there is nothing in common between the unconscious and the occult. In any case at the level that you are at here to hear me, I think that all the same you have been sufficiently broken to the idea that the unconscious... belongs fundamentally to language, huh. And if you were able the other day to look at what I had begun to do like that, (26) vaguely on the board with the line described as a journey, and then that you have simply been able to admit what I have been drumming into you for 20 years – indeed even more – namely, what closes, what finishes the Traumdeutung: what I recalled the other day, namely, this famous indestructible desire which travels along, which, on the line of the journey, once the entry into the field of language has occurred, accompanies from one end to the other and, Ebenbild always the same, without variation, accompanies the subject structuring his desire.

As Freud says, Ebenbild, (it is translated as in the image [SE: perfect likeness], but it is not in the image, it is Ebenbild, it is a fixed image, always the same!) in the image der Vergangenheit, namely, what in the image of this Ebenbild cannot even be called the past: it is always the same thing, there is no past once what is at stake is spatial function, the crossing of the line with this network of the structure which is displaced, for its part, according to the line, but of which one can say at the same time is not displaced since the line does not vary. It is with respect to life as journey that one can say that there is a part that is past and another which remains, like that, to be consumed, which is called the future. These inscriptions of the indestructible desire go with the flow. But in going with the flow, at the same time they stop it, they fix it, is that no so, since all movement is relative, is that not so. And the flow within it is only a flow, it does not constitute a point of reference, huh. There you are.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then the symbolic structure, is that not so, is at the end of this Traumdeutung perhaps still to be discovered, but it is on this that Freud concludes his notion in this title, in this conclusion that comes here like the very point of everything he had ever stated about the dream in the Traumdeutung: his notion is there. This indeed is why that what retroact in it, is that – this is what he explained about the dream, is that not so – is that there is something of the unconscious, and that the unconscious is that: that he was able to say on occasion that the unconscious is the irrational, but that simply means that its rationality is to be constructed, that even if the principle of contradiction, the yes or the no, do not play the role that is believed in classical logic, is that not so – since classical logic has been superseded for a long time, at that very moment, well, it is necessary to construct another one... Yeah...

And I, I suspect, that if the die Grenzen der deutbarkeit, the limits of interpretation, (that's what that means) did not come out in the (27) following edition of The interpretation of dreams, it is not simply because it was in the shadow of the occult, it is because all the same here, that... that relied on it (en remettait). This went a little beyond the business about the affirmation that desire is indestructible, it showed in this structuring of desire itself something which precisely would have allowed its nature to mathematicised differently. That is why it is worth the trouble, all the same, for me to give you like that – it is obvious that before such an audience it is not possible for me to give a commentary on the 25 pages of Freud, there are no more, there are even fewer – but I could all the same tackle the first paragraph, that will encourage you to go to find it because all the same it finished up by being published, as was pointed out to me by my dear friend Nicole Sels, whom after the last session I got into this business, I said to her: 'But where the devil in fact is this thing?', this thing which nevertheless in the Gesammelte Schriften, is indicated immediately after this point on which I terminated about the indestructible and invariable desire, because this is what was at stake.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then as she commented to me – that is worth the trouble, is it not, commenting to me - as my dear Nicole who knows something about what is involved in searching for the edition of a text (who knows a bit about it and who can really do something about it, in fact, it is unimaginable how I make her run around, I mean, that she runs around, and that she brings it back to me within two hours; here she spent longer: she spent at least three days), yes, this supplementary chapter does not figure, because I had said to her: "All the same, it would be curious if I were not to find it in the Gesammelte Werke. And I can't find it!" She replied to me that it is not in any logical place in this work, nor in the volume that corresponds – about the Traumdeutung, I had of course noticed, this is even what had enraged me - nor in volume XIV which corresponds to the year 1925. It appeared in extremis and – she added – sneakily in volume I, for this volume was the last one to appear: in 1952. Here she is referring me back to the opinion of Strachey, who had translated it himself in the Standard Edition, is that not so, but in volume XIX – namely, in its normal year, yes, that's true – but he thinks that this fate is due to the grimace everyone made before the okkulte Bedeutung of dreams. This is what Strachey thinks. I do not know what Nicole Sels thinks about it, but it is, with respect - simply - to the facts that she brought me, secondary.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(28) So then I am not going to read the thing for you right away in German.

This is how it is put: 'The question of whether one can give a complete and assured translation of dream life" – vollstandige und gesicherte bersetzung – already this use of Übersetzung is not bad, it is very Lacanian, good – in die Ausdruckweise des Wachslebns: 'into the mode of expression of waking life', and here he puts in brackets: Deutung, namely meaning; Deutbarkeit means interpretation but deutung, means meaning, Traumdeutung, means the meaning of dreams – 'cannot be treated in the abstract but in the Beziehung to Verhaltnisse' – this is another term to express relations – 'with the relations' – designated then by another word, namely, posited differently: Beziehung is something, like that approximate: Verhaltnisse, can be taken in the sense of relations that are written, I mean of what is constituted properly speaking in an articulation proper to the sense of the term, is that not so, as something that may happen to be posited there – 'the relations, unter denen', under whose influence one works at interpreting dreams: man an der Traumdeutung arbeitet. (SE XIV 127 – I have translated from Lacan's French & GW I 561.)

And this is where we go a little further in it.

'Our geistige activities' – those of the spirit, that is how it is put: unsere geistigen Tatigkeiten. For Freud, that means 'what one thinks.' The activities of the spirit are what are generally designated as thoughts.

Streben. Streben, is a word which has different resonances, is that not so, than what it is translated by in English, namely, – on this occasion, is that not so, it is precisely Strachey's translation – pursue. It does not pursue anything at all. It pursues nothing at all, streben when one follows carefully what it is, when one sees the stuff of the word.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

which is done obviously with its previous usages, is something which is, to be inscribed, something like this: you understand if you have a vaulted arch, like that, something in wood: it is the tie-beams (tirants). They appear to support it like that; if you have the slightest notion about architecture, you will know that the tie-beams, in a vaulted arch, well then, they pull. I mean that they pull towards the outside. The tie-beams are not supports. Anyway, it does not matter for the streben what they pull: what they may hold together, is 'either ein nützliches Ziel" and you rediscover the essentially Lacanian functions of the (29) useful and of enjoying (jouir), they are specified as such, it is on this that at the start I made entirely pivot what I said about the ethics of psychoanalysis – 'a useful goal', is, or what they anstreben, what they pull, 'or indeed, oder unmittelbaren Lustgewinn", namely, quite simply my surplus enjoying (plus-de-jouir).

> Die Frage ob man von jedem Produkt des Traumlebens eine vollstandige un de gesichert Ubersetzung in die Ausdrucksweise des Wachlebens (Deutung) geben kann, soll nich abstrakt behandelt warden, sodern unter Beziehung auf die Verhaltnisse unter denen man an der Traumdeutung arbeitet.
>
> Unsere geistigen Tatigkeiten streben entweder ein nützliches Ziel an oder unmittelbaren Lustgewinn. (GW, idem.)

For what is meant by a Lustgewinn? A gain of Lust. If the ambiguity of this term in German, is that not so, does not allow there to be introduced into the Lustprinzip, translated as the pleasure principle, precisely this formidable divergence that there is between the notion of pleasure as it is commented on by Freud himself according to the ancient tradition, the only outcome of Epicurean wisdom, which meant to enjoy the least possible, because what really fucks us up is enjoyment! This is precisely why they were described as swine, because in effect, swine, good God, do not enjoy as much as is imagined, is that not so, they stay in their little pig house, nice and quiet, anyway, they enjoy the minimum possible...

http://www.lacaninireland.com

That is why they are described as swine, because all the others, in fact, were seriously worried by enjoyment. Anyway they had to work at it, in fact: they were slaves of enjoyment. That is even why, listen... I am going to let myself be carried along, huh, that is even why there were slaves, huh. The only civilisation that was really bitten by enjoyment, had to have slaves. Because the ones who enjoyed were them! Without slaves, no enjoyment, huh. You for your part you are all employees. Anyway you do what you can to be employees. You haven't quite arrived at it, but believe me you will get there.

Good, I let myself be carried away a little, there like that. Reflect all the same a little on that, in fact, is that not so, that only slaves enjoy. (30) It is their function. And that is why they are isolated, that people have not even the slightest scruple in transforming free men into slaves, because in making them slaves, one allows them to devote themselves only to enjoying. Free men only aspire to that. And since they are altruistic, they make slaves. It happened like that in history, in our own history. Obviously there were places where it was more civilised: there was no slavery in China. But the result was that, despite what was said, they never managed to do science, huh. Now, they have been touched a little by Marx, so they are waking up. As Napoleon said: Above all, do not wake them up! Now they are awake. They will not have needed to go by way of this affair of slaves. Which proves, all the same that there are grafts, is that not so, that it is not the worst thing to avoid. One may avoid the best. And get there all the same.

Good, anyway, unmittelbaren Lustgewinn, means 'a surplus enjoying, there, immediate'. 'In the first case, huh, that with the goal of usefulness, it is, (these geistigen Tatigkiten, the spiritual operations) they are intellectual decisions, preparations for the manipulation, huh,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Hadlengun, or communications an andere, to others', namely, that one talks in order – as I have just said – to manipulate them, as you say.

'In the other case, we call that – nemmen wir sie (sie, namely, the geistigen Tatigkeiten) Spielen und Phantasieren we call that games and the fact of phantasising. Naturally as he says, bekanntlich, is that not so, the useful, if simply also all the same a detour, ein Umweg, for a satisfaction of enjoyment'. But it is not in itself that it is aimed at, is that not so.

'Dreaming' – he did not say the dream – 'the fact of dreaming is then an activity of the second kind', namely, what he had defined by unmittelbaren Lustgewinn. 'It is an error, irreführend, to say that dreaming strives towards these pressing needs of daily life that are always imminent and tries to bring to a proper end the day's work, Tagesarbeit. That is what concerns preconscious thinking: das vorbewusste Denken. For the dream, this utilisation, this useful intention, is that not so, is just as foreign as the bringing into play, into operation, the preparation, the niggling, is that not so, of a communication einer Mitteilung to another, an einen anderen'. This (31) is why our dear Freud has something Lacanian about him is that not so, since everything that he has just told us about the dream, is uniquely a construction, an enciphering (un chiffrage), this enciphering which is a dimension of language has nothing to do with communication.

The relationship of man to language, which can only be... simply be tackled on the basis of the following: that the signifier is a sign, that is only addressed to another sign: that the signifier, is what makes a sign to a sign, and that that is why it is the signifier. That has nothing to do with communication to someone other, it determines a subject, it has as an effect a subject. And the subject, it is quite enough that he should be determined by that, qua subject, namely, that he should emerge from something which can only have its justification elsewhere. Except for the fact that in the dream, as we see, namely, that the operation of calculation is done for enjoyment. Namely, that things are done in order that in the enciphering one wins this something which is the essential of the primary process, namely, a Lustgewinn. That is what is said there.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

And then it continues. And it does not simply continue, it stresses. And this clearly shows how, why the dream function, namely, that it is only constructed and is in no way constructed, and that is why it functions, for that: it is made for nothing – 'except to protect sleep, den Schlaf verhüten'. It protects sleep. What Freud only said, like that, incidentally in different points, here he insists. I mean that the question that he introduces, this is why precisely what is involved in the dream depends on the unconscious, namely, on the structure, on the structure of desire – what in the dream might well discommode sleep.

As regards sleep, it is clear that we do not know very much. We do not know very much precisely because, because those who study it, like that, as facts, with two little encephalographs, encephalopodes, encephalo-whatever-you're-having-yourself, well, they link things together, but finally...it is all the same curious, is it not, that something so widespread in life, here, as they say, as sleep – in fact I am not putting anything forward here I am simply noting: the question has never been put about what it had to do with enjoyment. All that because enjoyment, anyway, is, it must be clearly said that it has not been made an altogether major mainspring of the conception of the world as it is put.

What is sleep? It is perhaps there that Freud's formula could (32) obviously take on its meaning and rejoin the idea of pleasure: if I spoke about swine earlier, it is because they often take a snooze, yes. They have the least possible enjoyment in the measure that the more

http://www.lacaninireland.com

they sleep the better it is. In any case that would agree with – if my hypothesis is right, namely, that it is in the enciphering that the enjoyment is; one can also see, one can see by that, in any case, something, which is that the enciphering of the dream, after all, is not pushed all that far, as far as people say anyway! It is… I already explained condensation, displacement, it is … it is metaphor, it is metonymy, and then it is all sorts of little manipulations, like that, which expand the thing in the Imaginary. It is in that direction, huh, that enjoyment must be seen. So then one could perhaps raise oneself up, is that not so, to a structure, like that in conformity, in conformity to the history of calculation, the fact is that if it is in the direction of that something which happens….to what? Die Grenzen, the limits. That's the error. The limits der Deutbarkeit, if you read these four pages carefully, because there are no more than that, you will notice that, that what signals this limit, is exactly the same moment when it reaches meaning. Namely, that meaning is, in sum rather bitty. You do not discover ninety-nine meanings at the bi-du-bout of the unconscious: it is the sexual meaning. It is very precisely non-sense meaning. The meaning where the Verhaltnis is in a mess. The Beziehung, for its part, takes place with the following: that there is no sexual Verhaltnisse except that: the Verhaltnis qua written, in so far as it can be inscribed or that it is a matheme, always ~~flunks~~ it.

And this indeed is why there is a moment when the dream collapses namely, that one stops dreaming and sleep remains protected from enjoyment. It is because when all is said and done one can see the end of it (le bout).

But the important thing, the important thing for us, if it is true that this sexual meaning can only be defined by not being able to be written, is to see precisely what in this enciphering – not in the deciphering – that which in the enciphering necessitates die Grenzen, the same word,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

here employed in the title, the same word serves for what in mathematics, is designated as limit. As limit of a function, as limit of a real number. The variable can increase much as it likes – the function will not go beyond certain limits. And language is made like that. It is something which, however far you push its enciphering, will (33) never manage to let go what is involved in meaning, because it is there in the place of meaning; because it is there at that place. And what ensures that the sexual relationship cannot be written, is precisely that hole there, that all language as such fills, the access, the access of the speaking being to something which indeed presents itself, as touching the Real at a certain point, there, at that point here: at that point there, is justified the fact that I define the real by the impossible, because here precisely, it does not manage ever – it is the nature of language – it never arrives, ever at the point where the sexual relationship can be inscribed. Yeah... Yeah...

So then there remains our business with Freud and his occult.

The business of the occult, is very curious, is it not? I spoke to you about the 8th edition, but not the 7th. It is impossible to get one's hands on the 7th, not because of the Nazis, this time, but because it probably appeared in very few copies, anyway, it came out in 1919, can you imagine! The fabulous thing, is that all the same, thanks to another friend (you see that I have nothing but friends) Nanie Bridgman, Nanie Bridgman who is in the B.N. got her hands on the 7th. Well then that relieved me, huh. Because the way in which Freud is translated – it is true that that began especially with Marie Bonaparte, good.....but before that there was Isaac Meverson; I had got to the point, I beg his pardon for this, of thinking that for him it was the same thing, namely, that he wrote in any old way; I had got to that point, and why? Because (I didn't bring it here, like that, it's unfortunate, I forgot it, that's the truth) there is a little sentence, there is a little sentence at the moment when Freud asks the question, this is what culminates in this final paragraph that I spoke to you about, at the moment when Freud asks the question of what is involved, what is the order of reality of this dream – he is forced to call it psychical, but at the same time it worries him to call it psychical, because he clearly feels that the soul, in fact, this business does not hold up, anyway that the soul is all the same no different to the body, good.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

There then he evokes material reality, he had not very clearly seen at that time that he had the material there: it was his whole book, very simply namely, the way in which he had dealt with the dream, dealing with it by the manipulation of deciphering, namely, after all simply with what language involves in terms of a dimension, of enciphering.

(34) So there, he gets involved in what is involved, when all is said and done, in this reality, and he is struck – he is struck only there, it is the only edition in which there is a sentence like that, a sentence where all of a sudden, he repudiates this fact: a savant, a modest savant certainly, he describes him like that, there are all the same two things that in any case – anyway here he puts a barrier, he cannot take it on board – it is the subsistence of what is dead.

This, this is directed at the immortality of the soul. (Lacan does not buy this)

And secondly that all the elements of the future can be calculated. (L. does not buy this either) Which obviously here, rejoins is that not so, rejoins the solid ground of Aristotle, huh. The soul in Aristotle is so defined that it in no way implies its immortality, and it is moreover thanks to that that there can be progress in science, it is starting from the moment when in effect people interest themselves in the body – and then secondly, secondly the following: the maintenance of the contingent as essential. And after all why the contingent, namely, that we cannot predict what is going to happen tomorrow? In many things we can predict it. What does Aristotle use in his definition of the contingent? Knowing who is going to be victorious tomorrow, knowing if from today, in the name of this, that tomorrow something will be called "the victory of

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Mantitheus can we from today write: the victory of Mantitheus. It is this alone that is involved in the arguments of Aristotle about the contingent. It is all the same a nice opportunity for us to question ourselves about why events which are moreover not just any old events, which are let us say human events – I do not see why I would refuse here to state it like that – why is it that this is the contingent? Because after all, there are all the same human events that are all the more predictable because they are constants. For example: I was sure that you would be just as numerous today as the last time – for reasons moreover that are just as obscure – but anyway it can be calculated. Why can a victory not be calculated?

Who is going to answer me? [To Madame Gloria Gonzales, his secretary: Give me a cigar].

Listen: a victory cannot be calculated.....

[Someone in the audience]: Because there must be two...!

(35) There is something in that idea...

There is something in the idea, it's obvious, anyway, it's true, as you say, there must be two, and sometimes even a little more... But by going in that direction, is this not so, you clearly see that, despite everything, you slide gently to the side, to the side where these two, where these two funk it: namely, to the side of the sexual relationship. It is a hole business, huh, to be two. Yes. When I think that I will not have the time today to tell you all the beautiful things that I had prepared for you about love, well then, this disappoints me a little but it was because I dragged things out, and then I dragged things out like that because...because I wanted all the same to make a careful calculation, namely, not to erre too much, huh, so that for the rest, anyway, you can perhaps wait a little bit.

But to refer to something that I already put forward – I said it in a thousand ways, very often, but one day I said it quite crudely, like that, clearly, I said that the effect of interpretation – to limit myself to what, is that not so, I must remain stuck to, I must remain the dupe of, and still more a dupe without forcing myself, because if I am a dupe

http://www.lacaninireland.com

by forcing myself, well then I will write the Discourse on the passions of love precisely what Pascal wrote, and you can really see that he is forcing himself, huh.

After that naturally it slackened, it died, he was never able to come back to it, but anyway, it is probable enough (I am not sure) that he forced himself, all the same when he wrote that. The results are absolutely stupefying, are they not. It is absolutely magnificent in fact: by forcing oneself one manages to say... one manages, one truly manages not to erre. Read that, anyway it works, that is how love happens. Absolutely disconcerting, but that is how it happens. Good.

What is meant by saying that interpretation is incalculable in its effects? That means that its only meaning is enjoyment; it is enjoyment, moreover, that creates a complete obstacle to the sexual relationship being able to be written in any way whatsoever, and that in short, this allows there to be extended to enjoyment this formula that the effect of interpretation is incalculable. If you carefully reflect, in effect, on what is happening at the encounter of these two herds that are called armies, is that not so, and which moreover are discourse, walking discourses, I mean that each of them only holds together because people believe that the captain is S_1. Good... it is all the same quite clear that if the victory of one army over another is strictly (36) unforeseeable, it is because one cannot calculate the enjoyment of a combatant. That that is what its all about in fact: if there are some who enjoy being killed, they have the advantage. There you are. This is a little glimpse concerning what is involved in the contingent, namely, of what is only defined by the incalculable... Yeah.

So then now, all the same, I am not all the same going to leave you without telling you, anyway some few little words about what is completely opposite to the line, like that, with which we are in fact exercised – or indeed I am exercising myself before you – but where all the same – anyway there is some chance, like that – followed a little, at least followed by your silence, is that not so…

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The occult, cannot all the same simply be defined by the fact anyway that it is rejected by science. Because, as I have just told you, it is crazy how much it rejects, I mean science, huh! In principle, everything that we have just said, and which nevertheless exists all the same. Namely, war. There they all are, the savants scratching their heads: Warum Krieg? Ah! Ah! Why war? They cannot manage to understand that, the unfortunates…yeah…They tackle it in twos, huh, Freud and Einstein. It is not in their favour…

1930's

But anyway, the occult, the occult is well and truly surely that: this absence of relationship. And I would even tell you a little bit more about it, in fact, if I did not have all the same to specify clearly how it presented itself in Freud's time. Because there it is quite clear. Everything that he wrote, is that not so, Psychoanalyse und Telepathie, Traum und Telephathie, and God knows we know the bad use that has been made of this by people who have isolated it under the name of psy-phenomena, they are fraudsters, are they not. It must all the same be clearly seen that Freud, then – read the texts, is that not so, those whose title I have just given, all the same, those, they can be found. Contrary to Grenzen der Deutbarkeit, it is quite clear: he says that the dream and telepathy, for example, have strictly nothing to do with one another. It even gets to the point that he goes so far as to say that telepathy, is something of the same order, anyway, I admit it, why not, it is of the order of communication. And in the dream, it is treated like any other, namely, the first part of what I stated for you earlier, namely, etwas nützliches, is that not so, something that is of use for the days scheming. And it is taken up in the same way in the (37) dream, not only does he prefer to admit, but very specifically he demonstrates that in every case where there was so-called dreamt telepathy, there are cases where one can admit the direct fact that there was a message, namely, announced along a special wire if I can express myself like that, because that is what telepathy is, is that not so, it is a special wire. One can, you only have to treat the case, you only have to envisage it, to operate with it, in thinking that, like any other day's residue, there was a telepathic warning. In other words he doesn't give a damn whether it is telepathic or not, the only thing that interests him is that it is taken up in the dream, this (I don't want to be reading it for you because it is too late, is it not) this is stated in Freud: one must consider, to conceive something about the relationships of telepathy to the dream, that the telepathy is produced as a remainder, a residue of the preceding day. He prefers to admit that, even though of course naturally... he prefers to admit the telepathic phenomenon – this is the meaning of his position – than to bring it into the dream. And he underlines, he underlines, namely, he says why: because the dream is made – and he gives the whole list – with a whole series of encipherings and that these encipherings can only be brought to bear on a material which is constituted by the day's residues. He prefers to put telepathy, to range it with current events: in no way to attach it to the mechanisms of the unconscious. It is easy to confirm, it is enough for you to consult it – of course naturally in French it was never translated but all the same, there are some of you who read English, even a lot I hope, and on the other hand a certain number who read German – consult the texts of Freud on the unconscious and telepathy: there is never any ambiguity, he prefers to know everything, in short, not simply what he doubts, but about that... about what he washes his hands of, about which he says: I have no competence in that matter. But he prefers to admit that telepathy exists to simply bringing it close to what is involved in the unconscious. In other words everything that he emits, everything that he advances as remarkable, considering certain dreams, everything that he advances as remarkable consists always in saying: nothing else happened except the relationship to the dream as an enciphering. Or again only the relationship of the unconscious of the occultist or the fortune teller with the unconscious of the subject. In other words he denies any telepathic phenomenon in connection with this – he denies (38) regard to the following: that there was nothing else except a mapping out of desire. This mapping out of desire, he considers as always possible, which means – which means as compared to my inscription of the other day about life as a journey and the structure which is displaced at the same time as the journey is outlined, outlined linearly.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The question can be raised, and how would it not be raised, whether the structure is truly punctuated by the desire of the Other, as such, if already the subject is born included in language, included in language and already determined in his unconscious by the desire of the Other, why would there not be between all of that a certain solidarity? The unconscious does not exclude – if the unconscious is this structure, this structure of language – the unconscious does not exclude, it is only too obvious, the unconscious does not exclude the recognition of the desire of the Other as such, in other words the network, the network of structure of which the subject is specially determined, and it is conceivable that it communicates with the other structures: the structures of parents certainly, and why not on occasion with these structures which are those of an unknown, provided, provided, Freud underlines, his attention is, like that, a little elsewhere.

And the best part, what he underlines, is that not so, is that this diverting of attention, is precisely obtained by the way in which the fortune teller worries himself with all sorts of mythical objects. That sufficiently diverts his attention for him to be able to apprehend something which allows him to make the following prediction to a certain young woman who had taken off her marriage band to make him believe that... anyway to remain anonymous; he tells her that she is going to get married and that she will have two children when she is 32. There is no explanation for this prediction – which moreover does absolutely not happen, but which despite the fact that it does not happen, leaves the subject for whom it was destined, absolutely enchanted. Each time that Freud underlines a telepathic fact, it is always a fact of this order, namely, where the prediction is in no way realised; is in no way realised, but which on the contrary leaves the subject in an absolutely expansive state of satisfaction. He could not have been told anything better. And in effect, this figure of 32 years on this occasion, was inscribed in her desire. If the unconscious is what Freud tells us, if these figures chosen by chance, is that not so, are in reality never chosen by chance, it is precisely by a certain (39) relationship with the desire of the subject: this is what is displayed right throughout The psychopathology of everyday life.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The interest. The interest is something that Freud knows very well how to underline eventually, is that not so, which is, the only remarkable point of these facts that are described as occultism, is that they always concern a person that is important for us, in whom one has an interest. That one loves. But there is nothing more conceivable than that one should have some unconscious relationships with a person that one loves. But it is not, it is not in so far as one loves him, because in so far as one loves him, it is well known, is that not so, one misses her (on la rate). One does not manage it. So then what is at stake all the same are two things, in this so-called telepathic news (information). There is the content of the news. And then there is the fact of the news. The fact of the news, is very properly speaking what Freud rejects. He is quite willing to admit it as possible, but in a world with which he has strictly nothing to do. As regards the content of the news, it has nothing to do with the person that it is a matter of having news about. It is uniquely concerned with the desire of the subject, in so far as love includes only too much this part of desire. It would desire to be possible.

So then, what I would like simply to accentuate in leaving you, is that there is all the same something that is conveyed from the deepest past, and which is called initiation. Initiation is what we have the debris of under the heading of occultism. This proves simply that it is the only thing that, when all is said and done, still interests us in initiation. I do not see why I should not give to initiation, as it was known in

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Antiquity, in fact, a certain status. Everything that we can glimpse about the famous Mysteries – and everything that still remains of it in countries that can be situated ethnologically, as regards something of the order of initiation – is linked to what somewhere, someone like Mauss is that not so, called techniques of the body – I mean that, what we have and what concerns us in this discourse, the analytic as much as the scientific, indeed the university, indeed that of the Master and whatever else you wish ... is that, is that initiation presents itself, when one looks at the thing closely, always as this: an approach, an approach that does not happen without all sorts of detours, of deliberation, and approach of something where what is opened, revealed, is something which strictly, concerns enjoyment. I mean (40) that it is not unthinkable that the body, the body in so far as we believe it to be living, is something that is much more clever than what the anatomical physiologists know. There is perhaps a science of enjoyment, if one can express it thus. Initiation in any case cannot be defined otherwise. There is only one misfortune, which is that in our day, there is no longer a trace, absolutely anywhere of initiation.

Voilà.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 3: Wednesday 11 December 1973

You can say that it is indeed because you are there that I am speaking. Don't tire me. huh. because otherwise I'm off. huh! Here is a little thing that I took the trouble to construct. to show it to you. It is a Borromean knot. Namely – take that one away for me. the blue – you see here the blue. it is taken away. huh. The result is that the two others are free. You have seen that I did not need to dismantle them for them to be free. There you are. There. Gloria can do it again for you. But anyway. I think that it is already sufficiently demonstrative. That is done with cubes. on occasion. it is done with cubes and one can see that there must be three in width and five in length for the minimal Borromean knot. Good.

The idea. is obviously to make something which... which corresponds to three planes. Namely. which are fabricated like the Cartesian coordinates. When you want to fabricate that. you will notice. well then. that you have all the same... some difficulties. You have some difficulties. that are not at all real: you have difficulties in taking into account right away what that is going to lead to. how much of it you have to put into one direction and then into the other. Try yourselves. won't you. Try above all – there was another thing that I did not bring for you. there was another thing which. which for its part corresponded not to the Borromean knot. which has the characteristic of... that each of the two rings (ronds) that this constitutes. they are not round (rond). it is just as if. the two rings that it constitutes are freed if you wish. if you cut one of them. You also have the well (42) known arrangement that I am not going to reproduce for you on the board because. anyway I have it here but I am tired. you only have to think again of the three circles that serve as an emblem for the Olympics. There you can note that it is done differently. namely. that not only are two of these rings knotted. but the third is fastened (se boucle). not to one of the two. that does not make three which would make a chain. but to the two. Well then try. Try to make a montage. a montage of cubes so that it is like that. namely. that the continuity of the montage that you will have made. like that. you will make the yellow. the red and the blue. that this is done. that it is possible that you set up on three planes – the assurance that what is at stake are planes is given by the cubic form precisely. you are forced to. to make them on three planes – try it.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

You will certainly not see right away that in this case. it is necessary that. that the side. as I might say. the side that is going to show itself. should be at a minimum four cubes. But that these four cubes are also found in the other dimension. Namely. instead of having twice 5 + 2. as in this case. which gives 12. you have twice 4 + 2 x 2. which also gives 12 - which is curious. But look. the very difficulty that you will have in making this little construction. will be a good experience of something that I am going to begin with: it is that you will notice here the degree to which we do not sense(nous ne sentons pas) volume. Because you will be very hesitant. You will be very hesitant as I was myself. Because. starting for example from three simple series of 4. when you have fitted them together in such a way that this gives these famous three axes that are used in the Cartesian construction. when you only see four of them. you have moreover for an instant the feeling that it could be fastened. that it could be fastened. for example. like here. as if there were only four of them. and then. only three in width. You will have that feeling.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

This is a way to make you experience the fact that we do not have the sense of volume, whatever we may have succeeded in imagining as three dimensions of space. The sense of... of depth, of thickness, is something we lack, much more than we believe. This to put forward what I want to tell you at the start: that we are beings, you as well as me, of two dimensions, despite appearances. We inhabit the Flat land [in English] as the authors who have produced a little volume on this (43) subject express it, and they seem to have a lot of difficulty, in fact, in imagining two dimensional beings. There is no need to look far. It is all of us.

At least this is how, truly, things present themselves.

The best thing that we can manage to do is in fact what we limit ourselves to – it would all the same be astonishing that in an assembly, here where people are in the process of... of scribbling, that I, that I might not be able to make myself understood: that is what scribbling is, it is the best we can do. And this is what was very well articulated by the fact that, people were found, in fact, to proclaim in a different area than ours, that the ink of the learned is very superior to the blood of martyrs. There are people who have dared say that! They have dared to say this obvious thing. It must indeed be said, this last one, the blood of martyrs, huh, what do we have of it? The subjects of paintings. This with the obsessional structure that Freud was able to recognise in what is a single thing: religion and art. I apologise to the artists, there are perhaps some here, who have wandered into this audience, even though I find it hard to believe. I apologise to the artists if they hear about this: they are worth no more than religion. It is... it is not saying much.

The stupid thing (connerie), and it is not the first time that I evoke it here, so that, I hope, you are not going to think it is directed at you – the stupid thing is our essence, a part of which is the fact that your demand – I have racked my brains for a long time to know why you are so immoderately numerous – anyway through racking my brains finally, a flash emerged from it. Precisely, your demand, the one that herds you in here, is how to have a chance to get out of this stupidity. This is even what you are counting on me for. Except for the fact that this demand forms part of the stupidity.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then, this demand, to which I am yielding for one more day, you should know that it is not because your number is so great that – precisely, I am not going to try to pretend. It is because, not that it is great, but that it is number. And this is why I dedicate myself to the abjection, I must say, with which, in this place I am merged. There is a thing that I called la passe, which is practised in my school, uniquely because I wanted to try to have the testimony of it. It is necessary that I should be or that I am part of it, namely, today, in order to see clearly for myself what it is: to devote oneself to (44) responding to anyone whatsoever, to anything whatsoever – but respond what? What analytic discourse responds is this. What you are doing: everything that you are doing. And of its nature, as one might say, by its structure, more exactly, contrary to everything that was thought up to the present, among the specialists, 'philosophers' they are called, not ignorance – natural ignorance, as Pascal puts it, and I thank someone who, while I was working last Sunday in fact, took the trouble to call me, moreover because I had explicitly charged him to do so... but, it was like that. I will tell you again a little later, in the form of a little suggestion that had come to me from him about Pascal – well then, I had charged him with looking in Pascal at all the stages which go from natural ignorance to true science, with between the what he designates, like that, in his scribbling, the semi-skilled (semi-habiles). It is the person who rendered me this service, in fact, who... who wiped Pascal clean, like that, to avoid me having to do it, because I was wrecked – he thought he could identify these semi-skilled with the non-dupes. I hope I will manage, anyway in this effort, to make you sense that... it is not at all, at all, at all, what I mean. Not that the semi-skilled are not perhaps in effect non-dupes. I believe for my part that they are just as much dupes as the others but, contrary to what you may imagine, it is not enough to be a dupe in order not to err!

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I said: the non-dupes errent, again you must not simply be a dupe of just anything. And even one must be a dupe especially of something that I am going to try, to try, that I would like to try today to get you to reach.

So then, what analytic discourse responds is this: what you do, far from being a matter of ignorance, is always determined. Determined already by something which is knowledge, and that we call the unconscious. What you do, knows (sait), knows what you are, knows you. What... you... do not sufficiently sense – anyway I cannot believe it in such a numerous assembly – is to what point this statement, is new. Never did anyone among the Grand Guignols who busied themselves with the question of knowledge, and God knows it is not without some unease that I rank Pascal there also since he is the greatest of all these Grand Guignols! No one has ever dared to pronounce this verdict that I am pointing out to you here: the response of the unconscious, is that it implies, that it implies no pardon (le sans-pardon), and even in attenuating circumstances. What you do is (45) knowledge, completely determined. Which is why, which is why the fact that it is determined by an articulation supported by the preceding generation in no way excuses you, since this only makes the saying, the saying of this knowledge, more hardened knowledge, as I might say. At the limit, a knowledge that was always there. I separated out this meaning from Freud, because he says it. He says it by his whole work. But I beg you not to comprehend me, you see that there is a reason for it! But for my part I can do nothing but hear it in what Freud says, because there is nothing, nothing to do than to let the consequences flow. Once it is stated, it founds a new discourse. Namely, an articulation of structure which is confirmed to be all that exists in terms of a bond between speaking beings. There are no other bonds between them than the bond of discourse. That does not mean, naturally, that one does not imagine something else.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I told you earlier that... if we do not have volume, we are all the same two dimensional, huh. So then there is the profile, the projection, the silhouette, in fact everything that one adores in a beloved being. One never adores anything more. And since I started from that, huh, in connection with this famous story of the mirror, people imagined that I disparaged it. I did not disparage it at all, huh, because, like everyone else, I am very satisfied with it! As regards volume, thickness, the simple handling of what I advised you earlier, will inform you of the degree to which we are absent. But there is all the same something different huh, that we take for volume. And precisely it is the knot, huh? People have made of it metaphors – not unfounded – the knots of friendship the knots of love. Well then, that comes from the fact, anyway: it is our only way of approaching volume. When we squeeze, like that, someone against us – that happens to me too, yeah, but....are we in short so sure of these knots? For adoration we will remain, will we not, at what I called earlier two dimensions the two dimensions (pretty, pretty) – there is a recent author, like that (I apologise to him if he is there. I have not yet had the time to read him) he calls it the Singe d'or. Since he paid me the homage of his book, I think that it perhaps all the same because he had some echoes of what I talk about, and perhaps even, who knows, he read me – and that... and in order to talk in this way anyway about the Golden monkey, he must have had indeed some echo of what I have just been (46) pushing forward, about what attaches us to the image, to the image in two dimensions. I am far from having disparaged it. Not only am I far from having disparaged it, but it would be completely absurd to say so, because the signifiers themselves, we are forced to pass by the same image, the image of 'flat land', the image in two dimensions, huh, to demonstrate that they are articulated..

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I first showed you the Borromean knot flattened out. Naturally, thanks to artifices, there are places where you see the break appearing, what can only be represented as a break, even though it is a knot, a knot precisely that I tried to put into volume for you, so that you would clearly see that it is not only flattened out that one can tackle it, besides the fact that when you have yourself handled this volume, you will notice that... the volume, here, produced in volume, this does not at all allow there to be distinguished, as I might say, this knot from its specular image. It is no more laevogyratory than dextrogyratory, it is not simply perfectly symmetrical but it is so on three axes, which makes it strictly impossible for its specular image to be different from it.

Writing, for its part, is done in a space that is no less specular than the others. This is even the principle of this very pretty exercise that is called the palindrome. It nevertheless remains that this hotch potch that I have just made between the Imaginary and the Symbolic, does not swamp anything. It does not swamp in particular the difference there is between the Imaginary and the Symbolic, it is well and truly the same thing, once imagined, it is our common notion of space that... that we imagine does not have an end. You should read on this the juicy remarks of Leibniz discussing with Newton: the so-called supposition, in fact, of a limit of space, would become unthinkable Leibniz says, because if there was a limit, then outside of this limit, then, one could... one could make a little hole in the limit with a nail... It is absolutely extraordinary what one can read, what one can read about imagination. And notably about this fact that in order to imagine space – because it would be no less an imagination, but perhaps an imagination that would have opened up to something quite different: people did not start from the fact that in space there are knots. There surely would be an advantage in our seeing, as I might say, that the Imaginary and the Symbolic are only modes of approaching it.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(47) I am taking them from the angle of space. Why are these two styles still not enough? But anyway I underline in passing that the word mode, is to be taken in the sense that this term has in the couple of words modal logic, namely, that there is meaning only in the symbolic, in other words in its grammatical articulation. When you approach certain tongues – I have the feeling that it is not wrong to say it about the Chinese tongue – you will notice that less imaginary than ours, the Indo-European tongues play on the knot. It is not a terrain onto which I am going to venture today, because I have enough to say like that, but perhaps... perhaps I would ask, I would suggest to a Chinese to take things from this angle, and to come to tell you what... what he thinks about it, if perchance what I tell him opens up his thinking about it, because it is not enough even to inhabit a tongue to have an idea of its structure, especially if as is necessarily the case, since I can only address the supposed Chinese in question, if I speak to him in my tongue, namely, that, if he understands me, it is because already with regard to his own, he is in a mess.

What is terrible is that when we distinguish an order, we make a being of it. The word mode on this occasion, ought to be illuminated if we gave its true import to the expression mode of being. Now, there is no other being than one of mode, precisely. And the imaginary mode has proved itself, with respect to what is involved in the being of the symbolic. It proved itself so well that one might well risk... trying to see if the symbolic mode might not illuminate...the being of the Imaginary. This indeed is what I tried to do, whether you are aware of it or not. I would like to say in this third session in the year of this seminar, the place it has at the seminar and in its programme. And that is why I stated it in speaking to your right away, at first, about the Borromean knot. The Borromean knot which, like that, I saw emerging, in fact, I mean that in a kind of a way it invaded me, the Borromean knot has no kind of being. It does not at all have the consistency of geometrical space of which we know that there is no limit to it being cut into slices, is that not so, to its projection, to whatever you wish... and even that this goes further. That... it invades. And this indeed is why it is instructive: it invades the other order. We are so captured by this imaginary mode, that, when we try to (48) manipulate the symbolic order, we arrive, in fact – remember the way in which sets are tackled, we are told about bijection, surjection, injection... all of that does not happen without images, in any case it is with images that you support these modes which nevertheless are designed to free you from the Imaginary. It is with little points that you will notice that between a domain and a co-domain there is an injection, or a bijection, or a surjection.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

But by supporting it with points, you are carrying out nothing but an imaginary lucubration. Why has the flattening out of the Borromean knot not succeeded, did it not first come to evoke for us another start concerning the point... concerning the point, here incarnated, as I might say, because of the fact that at the heart of this little construction you have, whatever you do, an empty cell. Which is no less true than the other knot, not Borromean, huh, the knot that I called earlier Olympic. Except for the fact that there are... more complicated consequences. But let us leave that.

Why did the Borromean knot not evoke another start concerning the point? The point, the point that we are, huh, because even in the best case, this is what we are. Up to the present I am only talking to you about the Imaginary and the Symbolic, but precisely, my discourse tends to show you that these two dimensions must be completed by that of the Real. In other words, there must be three of them. Three for there to be this point, which could all the same perhaps, anyway, if... if one was not what is absurdly called a geometre, because, think about it, what does our geometry really have to do with the earth, anyway? Is the earth not something which is not at all flat? If we did not have a vocation for mapping, for the cadastral in what way would the earth suggest to us something flat? Why would we not have started from this point, on condition of starting from the knot, from the idea that a point sets out. It departs at the start, in its definition, from the tugging point, for example. That means nothing to you? Between your Symbolic, your Imaginary and your Real, given all the times that I have been sifting them for you, do you not sense that your time, your time is spent being pulled in different directions? What is more it has an advantage, huh, it suggests that... that space implies time, and that time is perhaps nothing other, precisely, than a succession of instants of being pulled about. This would in any case express rather well the (49) relationship between time and this swindle... that is designated by the name of eternity.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Time is, it is perhaps that, finally, the trinities of space... what emerges there from a squeezing without remedy. Yeah.

The Borromean knot is definitely not at all something negligible. If you flatten it out, here, you will see everything that can be drawn from it. For example, here I am going to give you one of them like that, like that as a way of manipulating it for you. It is like that, like that as a way of manipulating it for you. It is like that. You can see a little what can be thought about it from the fact that in short to transform it – when it is flat – from a dextrogyratory into a laevogyratory, it is enough in the first position that you have seen here, to do that to any one of them. If you do this subsequently to the other, huh, this is how it must be done, and if you do it subsequently to a third – that is how it must be done – each time you invert it. Namely, that from the laevogyratory first of all you make it dextrogyratory, and when you have tipped over the third, it is laevogyratory again. It is.....it is not without interest. This illuminates the question of this famous business, like that, that the universe is supposed to be ambidextrous, in any case it allows us to throw a little bit of light on it. It is worth the trouble dwelling on it. It gives a different idea of spatialisation. It is in any case a structure which....which completely changes the import of the word space in the sense that it is used in The transcendental aesthetics. Namely, that we can only perceive things from the angle of a space, which in Kant is simply imaginary. If there are three dimensions of space and if we begin to enumerate these three dimensions by the Symbolic and the Imaginary, the test must be carried about what that means for the third, namely, for the Real. There is only one thing to say about it for the moment. There. I cannot say that it is the date of the baptism of this Real: 'I baptise you Real, huh, qua third dimension...' I did that a long time ago. It is even by this that I began my teaching. Except for the fact that I added in my inner forum: 'I baptise you Real because if you did not exist, you would have to be invented.' That indeed is why I invented it. Not at all of course that it had not been denominated for a long time – because this is what is remarkable in the tongue, huh, it is that 'naming' (luckily we have English, huh, to distinguish naming from nomination. 'naming' means 'to name' which means to give a proper name, yes) – it is not for nothing, naturally, that I said: 'I baptise you'. I am not afraid of words which have a savour of religion. I do not sense any taboo for anything that smells of priestlings nor even for anything that they propagate.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

'Naming' qua proper name precedes, in fact, the necessity by which it is no longer going to cease to be written. As long as you do not take – this is the meaning of what I put forward in a mode of apparent underestimation for the Imaginary – as long as you do not take the Symbolic in a hand to hand struggle, you will not get to the end of it. Nor at the same time of what, my God, what I call in my notes the Church, but... but which is Christianity. Because that is where Christianity fucks you up. It is the true religion. This is what should make you look twice at it. It is the true in religion. It is all the same worth the trouble being interested in it (perhaps) if for nothing other than to see what it offers. But nothing of what I say will ensure it (n'y fera). I say – I deafen you with it – the truth can only be half said. That means confirming that there is no truth unless it is mathematicised, namely, written, namely, it can only be suspended, as truth, from axioms. Namely, that there is no truth except about what has no meaning. Namely, of that from which there are no other consequences to be drawn than in its register, the register of mathematical deduction, in this case – and how after that can psychoanalysis imagine that it proceeds from the truth?

http://www.lacaninireland.com

This is only an effect – a necessary effect, even though of course this necessity does not manifest itself anywhere outside my office, the office that I am in the process of serving, is that not so – this is only an effect, this kind… of odour of truth in analysis. Only an effect of the fact that it uses no means other than the word. Strictly none. Do not start telling me, huh, that it uses transference. Because transference, for its part, is not a means. It is a result, that stems from the fact that the words, by its means, the means of the word, reveals something that has nothing to do with it, and very precisely the knowledge that exists in language. There again, I never said that it is language that is knowledge. Language, if you do not mind remembering some of the things that I drew on the board when I had the energy for it, language is an effect of the fact that there is something of the signifier one.

(51) But knowledge is not the same thing. Knowledge is the consequence of the fact that there is another. And so in appearance that gives two. For this second holds its status precisely from the fact that it has no relationship with the first, that they do not form a chain even if I said, somewhere, in my scribblings, the very first ones, huh, Function and field was not all that stupid. In Function and field, I perhaps slipped in that they formed a chain. This is an error. Because to decipher, I had to make some attempts, hence this stupidity. It is what is proper to deciphering. When one deciphers, one confuses things. And this is even how I did indeed manage, all the same, when all is said and done, to know what I was doing. Namely, what it was to decipher. It is to substitute the signifier I for the other signifier. — capital I. The one that only makes two because you add the deciphering to it. Which allows right away to count three. This does not prevent it being written – as I did – S index 2, because that is how it should be read. the formula of the link between S_1 to S_2. It is pure forcing, but it is not the forcing of a notion. This is what puts us under the yoke of knowledge. Since I am in the process of speaking to you about psychoanalysis. I add: the yoke of knowledge, at the very place of truth. At the place moreover of religion, of which I have just told you that it, for its part, is true.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

This is one of the pillars of psychoanalytic discourse.

Even this discourse, like all the others, I described as quadripedal. Perhaps I described it as I have just told you, huh. I described it, precisely – I consider that quadripedal is a qualification and not a quantification, huh, because the further I go the more I am convinced that we only count up to three. And even if it is only because we count three that we can manage to count two – again the true religion, huh, since it is indeed of Christianity that I am speaking looked twice at it. The Orthodox, in particular, which wants nothing to do with the filioque. This is not by chance, huh, it does not want it to be two because a third proceeds from it. Because on the contrary it is from the third that the two emerges. So that it is not for nothing that it calls itself Orthodox, huh, it is right. That does not mean at all that it is successful in it. To succeed, as I have endlessly pointed out to you: is the sign of nothing. But that precisely it fails... I can indeed say that for us analysts this is rather in its favour, huh, which does not prevent it having to be eliminated, huh. Ecumenism is not there for nothing. (52) Good! Anyway I am spreading myself, and I am chatting, I have enough of my old refrains, because, they only amuse you, but again, it is the old refrains (des bateaux) that float, huh. All that is directed, is directed at the fact that... that I am made sweat a little by being always answered by an eternal two. Even though I never produced it except as an index, namely, as a symptom. The word moreover even admits it. What falls together, that is what it means. It does not mean it explicitly, but it means it all the same. The two can be nothing other than what falls together from the three. And that is why this year, I am taking as subject. that is what this means – that means it in any case today when I am insisting on it: the Borromean knot.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is obvious that it is a pedagogical effort. It is because all the same of something of the order of this debility that is called love. in which one can scarcely do better than to get on as best you can. it is because of this that. my God. that Kant's text on pedagogy... - which I opened because I had acquired an original edition. I have to have my little pleasures. huh – but you can find it. it was edited. anyway I believe re-edited by the Presses Universitaires. anyway someone here made me a present of it. and it is... thrilling in fact. It is thrilling. On the subject of... as regards what is involved in debility. nothing better has ever been written. not even what Maude Mannoni wrote. Yeah.

The child is designed to learn something. Here is what Freud states. here is what Kant states – it is all the same. all the same something – anyway. something extraordinary! It is something extraordinary that he had in short the presentiment of it: because how could he justify it? He is designed to learn something, namely, for the knot to be properly made. Because there is nothing easier than for it to fail. especially if you put it in this form namely. the same as this. Look! Here is the green circle and here is the red circle – anyway. the ring – suppose for the third. to construct it. I start from the inside of this one. the red. which is the outer one. In order to construct it. I have plait it and that it goes somewhere. either under or over the green. But if I have started from under the red – you see the red is there. bigger than the green – if I have started from underneath the red. whether I make it pass over or under the green. the result is the same: namely. that there (53) would be no knot. In other words. if I do not start from above the red. together with having to go underneath the green. there would be no Borromean knot. Kant cannot know – because that is not where he started from – in short why the child must learn something. He must learn something so that the knot is properly made. In order that he should not be. as I might say. non-dupe. namely. a dupe of the possible, huh. Dupe, dupe is a little bit too much. The non-dupes are two times dupes. They are precisely dupes because they are two. And it is in short the only objection that... from which I believed I should start like that, because I was dealing with ears, that had not precisely in fact been awakened – it is the objection, the only one, the only objection that I made to the moiety (moi-ité). This is an expression, like that that was attributed to me, rightly or wrongly, because I perhaps said it on one occasion, by one of my analysands, recently, and who has attended my seminar for a long while. The moi-ité as he expresses it, is obviously right away to fall into the two: since the moi-ité is necessarily made of two moieties. And if I said that religion is, is the truest thing that one can do, in religion – I will point out to you something about which I chattered on for a good while, huh: that thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, huh, does that mean that you will be three, yes or no? Yeah...

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The Borromean knot can only be made from three. The Imaginary, the Symbolic, that is not enough, the third element is necessary, and I designate it by the Real.

There must be this determining solidarity of which there is a subject – spoken subject in any case; the loss of any one at all of these three dimensions, the condition for the knot to hold up, is that the loss of any one of these three dimensions must render the two others mad, namely, free from one another.

These three dimensions, how do I represent them for you? With rings of string, as someone decided and very rightly, in a relevant way to entitle my second last seminar of last year. What is a ring of string in terms of dimension huh? I point out to you that a ring of string is not even a knot, huh, because a knot, can be seen, huh, can be made, can be written on the board... on condition of making the necessary little interruptions and God knows that they must be put in, people have such little imagination, huh. There you are, there you see I must correct it again, a knot is that. In other words, a knot can be (54) unknotted. If you unknot it, you are finished, because you cannot do anything else than make another, and because you will never manage to distinguish one knot from another knot. Because they are not all alike, these knots. And that indeed is why a ring of string is necessary. Not that it is a knot, but it is necessary for the theory of knots.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

For in effect, in order to be able to distinguish one knot from another, it must in no case be unknotted, or then when you make another knot you will have the feeling that it is the same one. That is why there are only two things: either to extend the cord that makes the knot to infinity – and so then you cannot unknot, huh – or indeed join the two ends, which is exactly the same thing. And this is what justifies the ring of string. The ring of string is something that allows you to have a theory of the knot. That is what requires it to be cut in order to break it. Cutpability (coulpabilite). This is what is distinguished – but totally, this has perhaps not yet come to your mind but I hope all the same for some – is that it is a topology. A ring of string is a torus. And it is this alone that allows a knot to be elaborated.

You do not knot two spheres together. But the interesting is that you do not knot two rings of string, in this affair, you knot three of them, but in such a way that only the third knots the two others. There is somewhere, in an article called La causalite psychique, a place, a place around which a certain number of people have sparred like that, where I knot – because this is what is at stake, liberty and madness.

The article de Le monde ~1945
& Psychosis

http://www.lacaninireland.com

where I say that the one cannot be conceived of without the other. which. of course disturbs people. because all the same. they think immediately. anyway that I am saying freedom is madness. huh... since in order to make myself comprehended why not. I (55) understand myself in it: only. what I would like to point out to you. is that the interest of joining in this way in the Borromean knot the Symbolic the Imaginary and the Real. is that what results from it. not only results from it. but it must result from it. namely. in the best case (si le cas est bon) – you will allow me this abbreviation given the time that we are getting to – in the best case it is enough. it is enough to cut any one of the rings of string for the two others to be free of one another. In other words. in the best case. allow me to imply that it is the result of good pedagogy. namely. that one has not failed in one's primal knotting; in the best case. when one of these rings of string is missing. you should go mad. And this is why. this is why the best case consists. namely. that if there is something normal. it is because. when one of the dimensions fails you for some reason or other. you should go. you should really go mad.

W.B.

And it is on this that I would like to finish. to show you its importance. Imagine the case of another knot. the knot that I called earlier Olympic. if one of your rings of string... fails you. fails you I might say. because of something that does not concern you. you do not for all that go mad. This because. whether you know it or not. the two other knots hold together. and that is what means that you are neurotic. This is why. always. I affirmed something that is not sufficiently known: neurotics are indefatigable. The only people that I saw behaving in an admirable way... during the last war. to recall it. God knows this does not give me any special pleasure. were my neurotics. those that I had not yet cured. They were absolutely sublime. Nothing disturbed them. Whether it was the Real. the Imaginary or the Symbolic that they lacked. they held up.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I do not know whether some of you, anyway remember, I did something, at one time, about the phobia of Little Hans. It is very curious. I never saw anyone highlighting this, this thing that I not only wrote but repeated, resifted, is that not so. I never saw anything else in trying to find out, anyway, what was, in fact, this blessed story of a horse, because, of course, I asked myself the question, like everyone else: why the horse, is that not so? Why did that make him so afraid... The explanation that I found – because I gave it. I worked on it, I insisted did I not: it was that the horse was the representative – (56) I can all the same say it: of three circuits. I did not underline the truth that they were three, these circuits. But the horse represented a certain number of circuits, that I even went looking for in a map of Vienna, to mark them out clearly, because first of all it is in Freud's text, how would I have found it otherwise? It is in the measure that the phobia, the phobia of little Hans, is very precisely in this triple knot whose three rings hold together, it is because of this that he is neurotic: the fact is that if you cut one, the two others always hold together.

It is not the case certainly, that we attend to this, which is why precisely there are other couples in neurosis which are simple than that of phobia, we will come back to them. The importance, the importance is not even in this, which makes such a pretty image, huh, you were able to say in short that I defined the normal in this sense that it is constructed in such a way that it cannot but drive you mad, when one of these three rings fails. But the important thing is not that at all.

The important thing is that even though they are coloured with different colours with respect to one another, these three rings, these rings of string, are strictly equivalent. I mean that the important thing is that the Real just as much as the Imaginary or the Symbolic can play exactly the same function with respect to the two others. This is not self-evident. If I present you the knot like that: namely, the red

http://www.lacaninireland.com

above the green and squeezing it, and the black – I am calling this one the black provisionally because there are black points (points noirs), and the black in a good position – it is not self-evident that I can easily put the two others into a different position, namely, ensure that the green should be above the red, the Borromean knot being just as correct. Namely, not having to be cut at any moment. One may believe that there is an obstacle to me putting the green in the place of the red, starting from a fixed position of the black, it is nevertheless the case. It is nevertheless the case and it is also what must be said concerning the three dimensions of our Real.

The Real of which there is question at the end of The interpretation of dreams – and what must be said, what must be said is the following: it is that if I bored you the last time with this business of the occult, it is precisely because of something that for Freud is in a way the manifest avowal: the fact is that in three of these dimensions, two of which he (57) exposes so well for us, what is the Real for Freud? Well then, I am going to tell you today: it is precisely the occult. And it is precisely for this reason that he considers it impossible. Because this business of occultism and telepathy, he warns us, he insists, that he in no way believes in it.

How was it that someone like Freud was able to pursue in fact with such obstinacy, this shadow of the occult, that he considered properly speaking as cogitated by imbeciles? Read him carefully and you will see.

Well then, the importance of what I wanted to put forward for you the last time, and that I did not say, except by the sentence at the end, that there is no initiation, which those who have ears were well able to pick out as the only interesting sentence, is precisely that Freud – this is indeed something which deserves us looking at it twice – he was a dupe of the Real.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

He was a dupe of the Real even if he did not believe in it. And this indeed is what is at stake. The good dupe, the one who does not err, must have somewhere a Real of which she is the dupe.

dupe is feminine in French

Seminar 4: Wednesday 18 December 1973

There you are. It is certain that... it is certain that in making me raise my voice to no use there by wanting to shi... tease me, excite me before I begin my thing today, things will not have been improved. Anyway, it will not have been improved, at least I suppose. There you are, because all the same, the last time...I made an effort, and today I would only have wished, anyway, to spread out from these margins, as I might say anyway to say things mezzo voce as they say. Perhaps in order to try to illuminate for you, in fact, I mean for yourselves, its resonance. I presume this resonance after all, because what I said was designed to obtain it. I had echoes of it, but I do not see why moreover I would not say what I was trying to obtain.

What I said (mon dit) was about this knot that I did not introduce yesterday and whose import deserved my insisting on it. That means it could not appear immediately. It is not so much this knot that is important, it is its saying (son dire).

Its saying that in short, the last time, I tried to, to support sufficiently, like that. What is good about this knot, is that not so, is that it precisely makes quite clear that this saying, in so far as it is mine, is implicated in it. That means that, from this quarter where, you should note, I did not say the word, I said the saying. Not every word is a saying, otherwise, otherwise every word would be a happening (un événement), which is not the case, otherwise people would not speak empty words!

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(60) A saying is of the order of a happening. It is not a happening that overflies, it is not a moment of knowing. In a word, it is not philosophy. It is something that is right up with what is going on. Right up with what determines us in so far as it is not quite what people believe. It is not every kind of local condition, like that, of this, or that, of what makes you yawn, of the Real, this is not what determines us speaking beings. And this stems precisely from this pedicle of knowledge, short certainly, but always perfectly knotted, which is called our unconscious, in so far as for each of us this knot has quite particular supports.

It is thus with bits and pieces, as I was able...that I constructed this topology by means of which I dare to split differently what Freud supported by these terms: psychical reality. For in fact my topology is not the same. Someone, someone, who like that, among the people who come chat with me, like that, put my knot, there, the Borromean one, like that, at the same stage, as I might say, is that not so as this famous egg [SE XIX 24?] made up of something which – you know that it is Freud in fact who made that – obviously, one could make a metaphor about nutritional reserves with what it... with what it is supposed to nourish, with enjoyment on the one hand and whatever you want on the other, the... the embryology of the soul. Good.

I would like to make a remark about what is called love. Because it is that, that is what I called earlier the resonance, the resonance among you, whether you know it or not, of what I supported the last time with my Borromean knot.

Love, in everything that, what people have allowed themselves to smear on top of it up to now, is all the same something which comes up against the objection that one cannot conceive how being – if of course you have already heard speak of that, anyway, it is dinned into your ears in metaphysics and... even elsewhere, in fact, in sermons, they speak of nothing but that – how being is supposed to be manipulated starting from any particular being (étant). This presents a great logical difficulty. Since being, when people speak to you about it, is not nothing, and it ends up in this aspiration which is supposed to be made starting from God, of love. I know well that you are not believers, is that not so? But you are even more stupid, as I already had occasion to tell you the last time, because even if you are not (61) believers, in this aspiration, I will show it to you right throughout what I am going to tell you today, in this aspiration you do believe. I will not say that you suppose it: it supposes you.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

People try, in short, to empty out all that – or to fill it, what matter – by schematising it in the old metaphor of knowing. One knows whom one is dealing with – the one that one is dealing with, one knows in love... Only I object: what is being, if not the aseptic business of the imaginary perfections of which one dreams, of which you yourselves, I have just told you, whatever you may know about it, you dream, you dream of its ladder. The ladder whose final rung will or not be this God that I spoke about earlier... but if it is not that one, it is another. This is what is called daydreaming. Only what is demonstrated, precisely by the study of the dream, the true one, the one that you have when you are asleep and that strongly reproves you, has, whatever one says about it absolutely nothing to do with your dream, whether waking or not. This is even what distinguishes you as speaking beings: that there is a knowledge that you hear in the dream, that has nothing to do with what remains to you of it when you are supposedly awake. This indeed is why it is so important to decipher this dream – this dream that you only have at a certain time. Up to then, you are, you are, this has lasted for a time but you are not still so far from it. believe me, the time of the signatura rerum, from the reading of the daydream, from the readability of the world: you should not believe at all that because it is no longer the priests that dictate it to you, that you are not at the same point!

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Love: if it is indeed here the metaphor of something, it is a matter of knowing what it refers to. We must start from what I said earlier about the happening. It refers, nothing more – in any case this is what I will limit myself to today, simply... to shift, anyway, is that not so, what I have just traced out about the tradition, about the metaphor of knowing – let us say that it refers first of all to the happening. To the things that happen, let us say when a man meets a woman. And why not? Because it is in general the fish that people try to play to death; when I say: 'when a man meets a woman', huh, it is because I am modest, I middle by that that I do not claim to go as far as speaking about what happens when a woman meets a man... because my experience is limited, huh.

(62) I would like to suggest the following to you, anyway, since we have started from two extreme points, I propose to you, in connection with the commandment of divine love, that I evoked for you the last time in challenging you to say yes or no, huh, does it make two or three? You remember perhaps, anyway those who were there. So then, I modify it slightly: what effect does it have on you if I state 'thou shalt love thy neighbour (ta prochaine) as thyself'? That makes you sense something all the same, huh, which is that this precept founds the abolition of the difference between the sexes. When I tell you that there is no sexual relationship, I did not say that the sexes are confused, far from it! Without that all the same, how could I even say that there is no sexual relationship, what would that mean? It is important to situate – you certainly have not done it yet – like that, to situate it in an exact fashion. I am making a little remark since today I am giving a commentary on myself, there is no sexual relationship, well it is of the same order, huh, as what I concluded my second lecture with, the one that was not all that understood: I spoke a lot about the occult – and believe me, I am putting myself in the same place, huh – I spoke a lot about the occult but the important point, there were one or two people who remarked it, is that I said that there is no initiation. It is the same thing as to say that there is no sexual relationship. Which does not mean that initiation is the sexual relationship, because it is not enough for two things not to exist for them to be the same! Yeah...

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is clear that, that love, in short, that here is the problem with which what I said the last time reverberates, it is all the same a fact, that is how there is described the complex relationship – it is the least that can be said – between a man and a woman.

So then here, perhaps I can hang the following, anyway, which is at the heart of my title, in fact, a first lineament of which I put forward in my first seminar, huh. Are we going to attribute what is rightly described as the complex relationship between a man and a woman simply to the fact of having made together what I called, I remark, not an error but a wandering, viator, as I articulated it, the journey on this earth, the category, the category comically which precisely excludes us from the world, is this what love is: to have done a bit of the path together?

(63) You see where that takes us, huh?

We would have helped one another. Yeah, there will always be, on the horizon, in fact, this promise. And then... and then it is true that there is something true in it, huh? Because we are man and woman (bonhomme, bonne, femme), as the existentialists used to say, I am talking about la bonne femme, the idea never came to them of talking about bonhomme, God knows why, even though it is better. A man and a woman who would have done a bit of the path together. On the horizon of love there would be the grandfather and the grandmother. There is that in the unconscious. There is also that.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I would like all the same to suggest that this is perhaps not all. The question that I am asking: by what path does one love a woman... if I ask the question, that is an old Lacanian refrain, it is no doubt because I have the answer. But there are many of them. There is even no question that has more answers. Naturally, you don't know any of them, because you let yourselves be led by the thing – by the whirlwind. If one has first of all answers, the first thing to do is to count them, huh. And there is one that I find very good.

How does a man love a woman? By chance.

Yeah, that one I already gave you, huh, it is the luck (l'heur) of which I have been speaking like that for not all that long, when I say that the lucky chance (bon-heur), that it trickles down, that there is some of it everywhere, that you know nothing but that, even! It is simply a matter of having the feeling a little more that you are surrendered to this happiness (bonheur). Because anyway, it has to be said, to take my earlier reference the circumstances are not always of mutual help, when love happens between a man and a woman, and then, since I heard just now a little voice, down there singing its little song there, I would like all the same to point out in the margin that the fellow traveller, huh, ought to awaken more echoes than you believe in your dear little souls, huh, it forms part of a certain vocabulary, the vocabulary of the quarter where people speak about the imagination in power. I should tell you, the left, appears to me to be all that is most traditional. And the metaphor, is that not so, of fellow traveller, does not appear to me to be enough, if it is not precisely in the Christian register of the viator.

As regards the imagination in power, I am not the one who made them say it! No more than I make anyone at all say anything whatsoever. (64) My function is rather to listen. Naturally, anyway, here I re-launch things, but it is rather because what I listen to comes out my ears. Good.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

What am I doing now, huh? I am giving you a snapshot, like that, of another answer. Of another answer which is the one that justifies my question. It is obvious that... I mean, like that, anyway, to look twice at it. Because if saying is a happening, God knows the consequences that it can have! Bah, I am going all the same to give it to you.

Love is nothing more than a saying, qua happening. A happening without any smudges. And that love has nothing to do – with the truth, is to say a lot, since all the same what it shows, is that it cannot all be said. This saying, this saying of love is addressed to knowledge in so far as it is there, in what must indeed be called the unconscious. Let us say in this... this knot of being, if you wish, but in a quite different sense, than what first of all started from confusion, this knot, I said: it is the word knot that is important, it is not being, the being of this knot, that I drew the last time, and which is only justified by the unconscious. That implies then, everything it comprises, precisely this saying from the last time, in so far as it takes account of the place of this knowledge. What constitutes this saying is not knowledge, this knot is not in any way, it is not a knowledge of anything whatsoever. It implies my saying as a happening in what it is. With its three faces that it is imaginable since I made an effective image of it; that it is symbolic because I can define it as knot; and that it is altogether real by the very happening of this saying, which happening consists in that, in any case, every one of you can give it the meaning that it has.

And that is why, as always, I beg you not to comprehend too quickly. Because obviously, I must ward off, as they say, any kind of precipitation. This is what accounts on occasion for my slowness. I am here Master Jacques from the fact that one must ward off all precipitous interpretations, it is in nothing but this that there is constituted the exploit that there may be in this saying. That is why I have to decide, and that means that I am abbreviating.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The import of this Borromean knot is that from each one of the three rings of string its rupture as a set follows. While in a simple chain, I am going to put it on the board for you – Gloria please draw a chain, a (65) chain simply with three rings, and make them correctly, huh? Good…like that. Huh, yes, but then you have to stop there, like that, after that, huh, and there also, you have to stop to do it that way. A simple chain of three huh it is only from the ring in the middle that you can break the extremes. Otherwise, if you take first of all one of the two extremities, the two others remain knotted. It is precisely in this that there consists the difference to the Borromean knot and of the Borromean knot on the other hand with the Olympic knot. The fact is that the Olympic knot, however paradoxical that may appear, this time it is by taking away anyone whatsoever of the three that the two others remain knotted. But it is simply symmetrical from what happens in this one here for the ring in the middle.

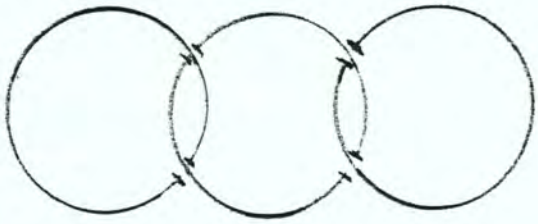

Fig IV. 1

This is the Olympic knot & only be cutting the middle one you break the other two. This is a regular chain. In the knot you only go over and under once – 4 crossings. But in the Borromean knot each knot is crossed. How ?? No no. 4 crossovers are important.

The consistency of all of that, of course, is only imaginary, huh, except that we reduplicate it with the Symbolic, simply by imagining it as a knot, and what is it, to imagine it on the one hand, but to formulate it as a knot, that pushes us towards mathematical formulae. Those of what is only barely sketched out, namely, the theory of knots, except for the fact that all the same this is indeed the representative (representant), of language and that lalangue, written in my way, reflects it in its very formation, that the more, in a word, we plough ahead in talking about it, the more we confirm what is self-evident, that we are moreover in the Symbolic, and after this why not admit the Real, real from the fact that in this business we pay with our hide? Namely, what may be most efficacious, and however far one goes, of our real presence. This real presence, let us say, nothing more, in fact, that after all, there is no need for hash to reveal it to you by its transformation into a light substance. We are deep enough in this business for us to be able to say that the important thing in what makes a knot here is that it is this ring of string, this is what is consistent in each one of these terms that I distinguish in three (66) categories what is consistent is strictly equivalent. Since – give me my little instruments, I am going to give you a present, while I'm at it, huh, ah! [Dr Lacan throws rings of string into the audience] – if I say that, as I showed you the last time – not without, as was pointed out to me by someone who was good enough to write a little note on these subjects which showed that the person had not understood very much, but who all the same pointed out to me incidentally that it was not without awkwardness that I had manipulated these instruments for you, good – if what I am saying is true, namely, that the Borromean knot has this curious property, huh, that... that one can in this construction put each one in strictly the same place as any one of the two others, even though that is not immediately self-evident, first of all, well, if each one can, in this function be qualified for its consistency of being strictly equivalent whether it is considered as Real or as Imaginary or as Symbolic, well then with this ring, which consists precisely in a Borromean knot, I can make a Borromean knot by simply, if I had the time, linking these three Borromean knots. I would like all the same for you to look at them a little bit closely, like that, and that you would do something with them. Yeah.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

What is important, namely, that they are distinct, it is only important precisely that they are distinct, in so far as it is necessary that they make up three. They consist first and foremost in their difference. Like that, if something got into me, anyway, I would write like that something on the board to which I am not so inclined, given my mood today, to give a special status to, namely, to give you that in... with a significance that is any more than... outlined out. There you are.

2

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I am not going to put around it something, like that, something that isolates it, that asepticises it as a precaution, I am putting it quite crudely:

2

The figure (chiffre) of love, huh – ils sont hors deux [they are outside two, they are beside themselves] – as I told you, it is lalangue, anyway which mathematics is expressing, huh.

$$2 = 1 \text{ or } 3$$

$$2 = 1 \text{ v } 3$$

(67) Ah! That is simply idiotic, but it is not idiotic if one puts – here I must put down some signs used in logic, namely, brackets, and which will serve me here as a sign of equivalent implication, which is precisely as you know what grounds equivalence, huh. What is it equivalent to? It is equivalent to the fact that 2 or 1 is equal to 2 or 3.

$$(2 = 1 \text{ v } 3) \longleftrightarrow (2 \text{ v } 1) = (2 \text{ v } 3).$$

Which is a formula on which you... anyway that you will try to situate, like that, in what is given in the premises of propositional logic. You can make whatever you like of it, huh, I am letting you look after it.

I am letting you look after it because I must advance, I must advance into the... the properties, the properties of the triple, of the triple that we have to deal with. Yes. In these properties of the triple, there is the following: that since each one of the terms of these three of the Borromean knot frees the other two, I know well that there is a relationship, a real relationship – in any case that can be symbolised – with this middle, this middle which, for its part, leaves the two extremes well emptied of omnipotence. But in the case of the Borromean knot, the two extremes have the same. So then, we can consider them from the angle, from the angle of making each one of them the middle.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

[Someone in the audience]: What is meant by the v, Monsieur, is it a v or a multiplied?

What is he saying? It is a vel, it is an or, or, one or the other! It is used in logic, in written logic, like that, one puts a little v to say or. This reads: 2 = 1 or 3, this implies the equality of 2 or 1 with 2 or 3...

To show you the importance of it, namely, the importance of this: by taking in the Borromean knot that I am going to draw for you all the same since there are people who seem to be interested in what I am saying, good, that I am going to draw for you like that, I do not know if you remember, that's it, and there you are. The interest of taking each one as a middle – since today I am talking about meaning – is to push them forward for you, like that, interpreted. There you are. I am (68) rather easy, rather easy about the fact that I am taking care that you will not give too much meaning too quickly to what I am saying, there is also a good way, anyway, to obtain the same result, it is... to give you so much of it that you will vomit it out, huh. Namely, that I am not going to do it with the back of the spoon. I am going to tell you things to make you vomit, and then after all, huh, you will have the time to swallow them again, like the dog in Scripture. There is even here something that shows why one should not retreat. If I want to give to this exactly its import, anyway, we must have a go at it.

Let us take this as the Symbolic, that one as the Real, that one as the Imaginary. If we take the Symbolic [clean the board for me if you don't mind, the thing] as playing the role of middle [thanks, you are too kind] as playing the role of middle between the Real and the Imaginary... here we are at the heart of what is this love that I spoke about earlier under the name of divine love. It is enough for this that this Symbolic taken qua love, divine love – that suits it – is there in the form of this commandment which puts at the pinnacle being and love. For it to conjoin something qua being and qua love, these two things cannot be said except by supporting the Real on one hand, the

Fig IV 2

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Imaginary on the other, respectively, beginning with the last, of the body and the other, the Real, of death. It is indeed here that there is situated the core of religion in so far as it preaches divine love. It is indeed here also that there is realised this crazy thing, from this emptying out of what is involved in sexual love on the journey. This perversion of the Other as such, establishes in the sadistic story of Original Sin, and in everything that follows from it, by having adopted, naturally, this pre-Christian myth, why not, it is perhaps just as good as any other, establishes in the Imaginary, in this body precisely, this sort of levitation, of insensibility about what concerns (69) it, which is after all, I do not need to insist any more on it, the whole history of what is called Arianism, indeed of Marcionism.

Here is where the dimension of 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' acquires its imperative.

Be a dupe of it, you will not err, I must say. Because one cannot say that such religion is nothing. Since as I told you the last time, it is the true one, it is the true one since it invented this thing – this sublime thing – of the Trinity. It saw that there had to be three of them. That there had to be three rings of string of strictly equal consistency for nothing to function. It is all the same quite curious that for every end, it should produce that with regard to love. But read The life and reign of love in Kierkegaard – it has just been published by Aubier. There are a lot of you, you are all going to rush into Aubier when you leave, huh, because usually, when I say a book should be read, it has effects! I have a copy, already, so then you can exhaust the edition, but read it! Read it because there is no more implacable logic, nothing better has ever been articulated on love, I mean divine love. There is not the slightest wandering, everything is traced out logically. Love is charity, woman – a curious slip – is charity, faith and hope and thanks to that charity is, as you see in art, anyway, rather lamentably symbolised by this woman with innumerable breasts, is that not so, on which are hung innumerable kids. But it is all the same something, to do that, precisely it is at the origin of my slip, to make that from the image of the woman. The finality, the finality in so far as there are two extremes and a middle, I am pointing it out to you, the whole specification of ends – and moreover ends that are always articulatable from rec... I do not dare to say the word reciprocity, it is not correct on this occasion. But I ~~middle~~ that moreover what is the start becomes the end, when the end plays the function of start. The relationship of the body and of death is articulated by divine love in such a way that it ensures that on the one hand the body becomes dead, that death becomes the body on the other hand, and that it is by means of love.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

But it is quite general that the very idea of finality should be something that is attached to the intermediary of desire. The love of God is the supposition that he desires what is accomplished for all ends, as I might say. It is the definition of teleology in itself. It is a transformation of the term desire into the term end. But in this articulation, what creates the end is the middle; in the articulation of (70) the Borromean knot, there is a confusion between means and the ends. Every end can serve as a means. Let us here, precisely make this simply parenthesis: this simple parenthesis that, in taking this place, in taking this place divine love has chased away what I have just defined as desire. With this gain of a truth, the truth of the three who, as I might say, pays the thing and compensates: it can be properly speaking situated at this place, at the place of the Symbolic in so far as it only becomes a middle, is desire. I am pointing it out to you in passing, Christian love has not extinguished, far from it, desire. This relationship of the body to death, has as I might say, baptised love. But I am not insisting any more for the moment, I am taking another connection.

Very exactly what can result from taking, this time no longer the Symbolic, but the Imaginary as middle. If like earlier, and it is in this that there is pinpointed what I articulated for you as something to make you vomit, I always give this summary sense of death to the

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Real, as constituting its kernel, and to the Symbolic, because up to now I did not have to put it forward, to the Symbolic what it reveals to us by its use in the word, and especially in the word of love, to support what in effect all analysis makes us sense – to support enjoyment.

So then, what does the ring of string of the Imaginary taken as middles demonstrate to us? It is that what it supports is nothing less than what must indeed be called love. Love, as I might say, at its place, that that it has always had. And if once, in my Ethics, I gave an account of courtly love, of courtly love in what it imagines about enjoyment and about death, this is something that it is – I was going to say miraculous – very surprising and well designed to hold our attention, that it should have been feudalism that produced this order of courtly love. Not that I believe that what is testified to in it is something like a rectification, a counter-theory about divine love, a compensation, but much more rather of an ancient order through which there is testified precisely how much there remained, more than is believed of this ancient order in feudalism. For the ancient order has nothing to do with the one we know. It is – I do not see moreover why some economist would contradict me since beyond the feudal age, he no longer wants to know anything – it is what was conserved in the feudal era. And in a word, I would ask you to verify it, I do not see any distinction as regards the emphasis, as regards the meaning of (71) love, between what remains to us of it; the very elegant theories of courtly love and the whole romance that is deployed around it, I do not see any difference between that and what the literature of Catullus bears witness to us and the homage to Lesbia, however much of a prostitute she was. I think that here, namely, the Imaginary taken as middles, here is the foundation of the true place of love.

How did there occur this displacement, after all very fruitful, which in Christian love situates love at the place – you will see at the end why – at the place that seems to me to be that of desire? The thing was only possible – and that is why I am talking about something about which I have thought a bit, huh – from what Christ taught. I am not talking about his Passion, which is the passion of the signifier, I am speaking about his saying (son dire). I am speaking about his saying! 'Imitate the lilies of the fields', he utters. 'They do not weave or sew', he says. And this is the important point: this failure to recognise the presence in nature of what knowledge took some time to discover, namely, that, who has woven or sewn more than the lilies of the field? To utter, to articulate this as a model, is here, properly, to add denegation to misrecognition, and the denegation of what? Since it is only a metaphor? The denegation of the unconscious. Namely, of what it weaves and sews, this knowledge without which there is no proper situating of love if what love consists in, is very precisely this saying, this saying that starts, you should note, from the Imaginary taken as middles. What there is in courtly love, is that what still remained in Plato suspended on the Imaginary of the beautiful, it is this that is crystallised, which, in love as middle takes on a body, as opposed as I might say, for all of this can be done, be articulated by a series of triple oppositions to the Imaginary of love as it is articulated in the Symposium, is opposed to taking it as means of what is involved in courtly love.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

This is something that deserves to be put forward. You must not believe that, if I said that divine love took the place of desire, that means that it is quite simple, that they should be put back in their place, namely, that each should take up its own again; this is not at all what happened. If courtly love was, as I might say, ousted from its place, in order to preside in place of desire at the ascension of a Christian love, that does not nean that desire is exchanged: it was pushed elsewhere. It was pushed elsewhere, namely, there where the Real itself is a middle between the Symbolic and the Imaginary. And (72) if this Real, this is what is audacious, in fact, in my interpretation today, anyway this evening – if this Real is indeed death, this is a crude figuration but if this Real is indeed death, there where desire was chased, if you will allow me to speak in terms of a happening –

http://www.lacaninireland.com

where desire was chased to, what we have is masochism. Certainly not, of course, in so far as it is supposed to be, in any way at all, the vehicle of death – it is only psychoanalysts who believe that, the poor little things, huh! Life instinct, death instinct, that is all they occupy themselves with in their interpretation; they are completely off the mark – but there is no doubt that it is masochism that stirred them up, the connection, the use as a middle, as a middle to unify, to unify enjoyment and the body, the use of this perversion as middle, is certainly what rivets them. What rivets them, as I might say, for a time, anyway irremediably, to what a part of their theory is constructed on. It nevertheless remains that love is the relationship of the Real to knowledge. And psychoanalysis must correct itself by this displacing, by this displacing which stems from the fact that after all, it only followed the out-of-place turnaround of desire, it must indeed come to know that if psychoanalysis is a middle, that it holds itself at the place of love. It is the imaginary of the beautiful that it has to affront, and it is to open up a path of a re-flowering of love in so far as l'(a)mur, as I said one day, writing the little a object in brackets plus the word mur, since l'(a)mur is what limits it.

Love is the specific imaginary of each one, which unites it to only a certain number of people not at all chosen by chance. There is the mainspring of the surplus enjoying. There is the relationship of the Real of a certain knowledge and love fills the hole. As you see, huh, it is a little difficult.

It's a little difficult, but all the same, what I must say to you to end – because after all, all these things do not end – what I must show you to end is something that is going to answer to what I told you the last time about the structure of this knot, of the Borromean knot that you now have in your hands, namely, that starting from a certain badly chosen point, there is no ~~middles~~ means of getting out. All of this ~~middles~~ milieu that everyone weaves his own knot. There is something that I want to show you, to show you how this failure happens. Because there is all

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(73) the same an inverse! I seem to be singing the los of love to you, yes there is an inverse: the fact is that you are going to see how, if love becomes really the middle by which death is united to enjoyment, the man and the woman, being to knowledge, if it really becomes the middle, love no longer defines itself as a failure. Because there is nothing more than truly the middle that can unknot the one from the other. And this happens in a way that I am going to show you which is the following.

Someone

The Borromean knot – there is a charming listening to me, who sent me a whole document on this – the Borromean knot, was tackled along mathematical paths, as you know, I told you, the theory of knots is still at the abc stage; the amusing thing is that it comes to light, not by taking things at the level of knots, but at that of the plait (la tresse).

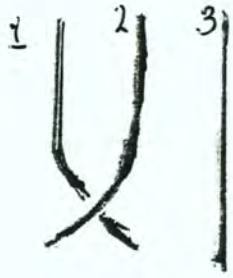

Fig IV. 3

Ah! What is a plait?

First of all, it has relationships with three, otherwise it would not be called a plait... one, two, three... How can I make a plait with that? Anyone at all who has taken care of a woman's hair will all the same know it, but you naturally do not know it because now women have short hair. So then a plait is made like that, no? Namely, huh, you change the place of the two into the place of the one and the three being in its own little corner. Good, one must truly mark the place of the result because otherwise you will understand nothing about it. If I knot it again too quickly you will not be able to see where the cuts are made. I had myself, of course, to run into this trouble and I am avoiding it for you, so then now, change the place of the three with the place of the two. You had there (since this is 1, 2, 3) you had there 2, 1, 3. After that then you will have 2, 3, 1 and if you continue the thing once more, you will have from one end to the other 3, 2, 1. Good. (74) Imagine they are in the order, the starting order: between 1, 2, 3 and 3, 2, 1 it is the inverse order, there is nothing easier than to join them up, it is enough in short to adopt the procedure, as was very well seen by the charming person who wrote to me about this thing, it is a matter of procedures as in the Moebius strip. The funny thing is that when you look, there, what circulates, at least I hope, namely, my Borromean knots from earlier, fiddle around with it: you will see that between the places where this appears to form a knot and the places where it can be flattened out, it is a question, of course, of choice, it can vary infinitely but it puts itself, naturally in... in three phases, as I might say. You can imagine for yourselves that the Borromean knot is made up of three of these exchanges, and only of three. Well then not at all, not at all, if you only make three of them, namely, if you proceed by re-sticking together the 1, 2, 3 to the 3, 2, 1, namely, without waiting to see whether if it does six phases, you have the 1, 2, 3 in the proper direction, and that it is like that, nicely, that one obtains the Borromean knot – try it out. Try this out, namely, by only making three phases of the plait, what you will obtain is not the Borromean knot, it is that. This to tell you how easy it is to fall into

http://www.lacaninireland.com

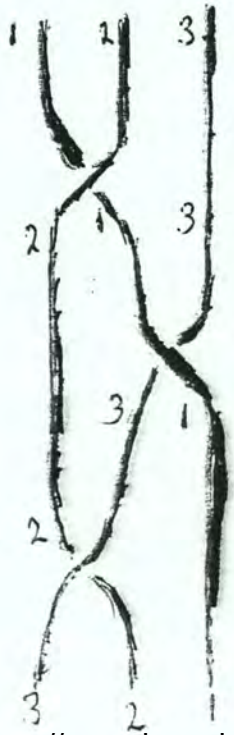

Fig IV. 4

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(75) the middle. And that the face, the equivalent face of what I situated of love as being the essential bond between the Real and the Symbolic, is that taken as a middle, it has every chance of being what it also is at the level of finality, namely, what is called a pure failure.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 15: Tuesday 11 June 1974

Voilà! I had to make an effort to ensure that this room was not occupied today by people who are doing exams and I must say that people were good enough to leave it to me. It is obvious that it is more than kind on the part of the University of Paris I to have made this effort since, classes being over for this year – which of course I did not know, this room should have been at the disposition of another part of the administration whose business is to channel you. There you are.

So then all the same, since it cannot be done again, beyond a certain limit, today will be the last time this year that I will speak to you. This forces me naturally to cut things a little short, but that is not going to hold me back since in short one must always finish by cutting things short. For my part I do not know moreover very well why I am lodged in this place, since in short the University, if this is what I am explaining to you, it is perhaps the woman. But it is the prehistoric woman, it is the one whom you see is made of folds (replis). Obviously for my part it is in one of these folds that she shelters me. She does not realise – when one has a lot of folds one does not feel very much – otherwise, who knows, she would perhaps find me burdensome. Good.

So then, on the other hand, on the other hand – you'll never guess – you will never imagine what I wasted my time on – wasted, in short,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

yes, wasted – what I wasted my time on in part since I last saw you gathered together here. You'll never guess: I was in Milan at a (226) semiotic congress. That is extraordinary. It is extraordinary and of course, it left me, it left me a little nonplussed. It left me a little nonplussed in the sense that it is very difficult precisely from a University perspective to tackle semiotics. But anyway, this very lack that I, as I might say realised in it, threw me back, as I might say, on myself. I mean made me realise that it is very difficult to tackle semiotics – for my part of course, I did not make a face because I was invited, like here, very, very kindly, and I do not see why I would in short have disturbed this Congress by saying what – that the seme, in short, cannot be approached like that in the raw starting from a certain idea of knowledge, a certain idea of knowledge that is not very well situated, in sum, in the university. But I reflected on it and there are reasons for that which are, perhaps, due precisely to the fact that the knowledge of the woman – since it is like that that I situated the university – the knowledge of the woman, is perhaps not quite the same thing as the knowledge with which we are occupied here.

as in "semiotic" – the unit of meaning.

as opposed to phonème.

The knowledge with which we are occupied here – I think I have made you sense it – is the knowledge in which the unconscious consists. And it is, in sum, on this that I would like to close this year.

I never, in sum, I never attached myself to anything other than what is involved in this knowledge described as unconscious. If for example I marked the accent, in short, about knowledge in so far as the discourse of science may situate it in the Real, what is singular and that whose impasse I believe I have articulated in a way here, the impasse which is the one for which Newton was assailed inasmuch as, not making any hypothesis, any hypothesis inasmuch as he articulated the thing scientifically, well then, he was quite incapable, except of course for the fact that he was reproached for it, he was quite incapable of saying where there was situated this knowledge thanks to which in short the heavens move in the order that we know, on the foundation of gravity.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

If I emphasised, is that not so, this character of a certain knowledge in the Real, this may seem to be beside the question, beside the question in this sense that unconscious knowledge, for its part, is a knowledge that we have to deal with. And it is in this sense that one can say that it is in the Real.

This is what I am trying to support for you this year with the support of a writing, of a writing that is not easy, since it is the one that you have seen me handle more or less adroitly on the board in the form of the Borromean knot. And this is how I would like to conclude this year; it is by coming back to this knowledge and to say how it is (227) presented. How it is presented, I would not say altogether in the Real, but on the path that leads us to the Real.

I must all the same start again from that, from what was also presentified to me, presentified in this interval, namely, that there are some very funny people in short, people who continue in a certain Society described as International, who continue to operate as if all of that was self-evident. Namely, that this could be situated, be situated in a world; in a world like that that is supposed to be made up of bodies, of bodies that are called living – and of course there is no reason for them to be called that, is that not so – that are plunged into a milieu, a milieu that is called 'world' and all that, in short, why should it be rejected all of a sudden?

Nevertheless what comes out of a practice, of a practice which is based on the ek-sistence of the unconscious ought all the same allow us to detach ourselves from this elementary vision which is that of... I would not say of the ego, even though it is encumbered by it and that I read things directly extracted from a certain congress that was held at Madrid where for example, one sees that Freud himself, I must say, said things just as outrageous, just as outrageous as what I am going to put forward to you: that it is from the ego – the ego, is something other than the unconscious, obviously, it is not underlined that it is something different, there is a moment where Freud redid his whole topography as it is called, is that not so. There is the famous second topography which is a writing, simply, which is nothing other than something in the form of an egg, the form of an egg which it is all the more striking to see, this form of the egg, that what is situated in it as the ego comes at the place where in an egg, or more exactly on its yolk, on what is called the vitellus, is the place of the embryonic point. It is obviously curious, it is obviously very curious and it brings the function of the ego closer to where, in short, there is going to develop a body, a body which only the development of biology allows us to situate the way it is formed in its first morulations, gastrulations, etc. But since this body – and it is in this that there consists Freud's second topography – since this body is situated by a relation to the id, to the id which is an extraordinarily confused idea; as Freud articulates it, it is a locus, a locus of silence - that is the principle thing he says about (228) it. But in articulating it in this way, he only signifies that what is supposed to be id, is the unconscious when it says nothing. This silence is a saying nothing. And this is no small thing, it is certainly an effort, an effort in the direction, in the direction that is perhaps a little regressive as compared to his first discovery, in the direction let us say of marking the place of the unconscious. It does not say for all that what this unconscious is, in other words, of what use it is. There it says nothing: it is the place of silence. It remains beyond doubt that it complicates the body, the body in so far as in this schema, it is the ego, the ego which is found, in this writing in the form of an egg, the ego which is found to represent it.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Is the ego the body? What makes it difficult to reduce it to the functioning of the body, is precisely that in this schema, it is supposed to develop only on the foundation of this knowledge, of this knowledge in so far as it says nothing, and to draw from this what must indeed be called its nourishment. I repeat: it is difficult to be entirely satisfied with this second topography because what happens, what we have to deal with in analytic practice, is something which indeed seems to be presented in a quite different way. Namely, that this unconscious, as compared to what would couple so well the ego to the world, the body to what surrounds it, what would order it in this sort of relationship that people persist in wanting to consider as natural the fact is that, as compared to this, the unconscious is presented as essentially different from this harmony. Let us say the word: discordant (dysharmonique). I am blurting it out right away, and why not, it must be emphasised. The relationship to the world is certainly, if we give it its meaning, this effective meaning that we see in practice, is something about which one cannot but immediately feel that, as compared to this quite simple vision in a way of exchange with the environment, this unconscious is parisitic. It is a parasite to which it seems a certain species, among others, accommodates itself very well, but it is only in the measure that it does not experience its effects that must indeed be said, to be stated for what they are: namely, pathogenic. I mean that this happy relationship, this supposedly harmonic relationship between what is living and what surrounds it, is disturbed by the insistence of this knowledge, of this knowledge that no doubt is inherited – it is not by chance that it is there – and this speaking being, to call him that, as I call him – this speaking being inhabits it but he does not inhabit it without all sorts of (229) drawbacks. So then if it is difficult not to make life the characteristic of the body, because it is almost all we can say about it, qua body, it is there and it seems to be able to defend itself, to defend itself against what? Against this something to which it is difficult not to identify it, namely, what remains of that body when it no longer has life. It is because of this that in English the cadaver is called 'corpse'; in other words, when it is living, it is called 'body'. But that it is the same, has a satisfying air like that, materially. In short, one sees clearly what remains of it is the waste scrap, and if one must conclude that life, as Bichat said, is the totality of forces that resist death, it is a schema, it is a schema, in spite of everything, that is a little crude. It does not say at all how life is sustained. And in truth, in truth, we arrived very late, very late in the biology, before having the idea that life is something other – it is all that we can say about it – something other than the totality of forces that oppose the dissolution of the body into a corpse. I would even say more: everything that may allow us to hope a little for something else, namely, about what life is, takes us all the same towards a quite different conception: the one in which I tried this year to situate something by talking to you about a biologist, an eminent biologist, about Jacob and his collaboration with Wollman, and of that which moreover, well beyond - it is through this that I tried to give you an idea of it – of that which, well beyond, is found to be what we can articulate about the development of life, and specifically the fact at which biologists are coming to, thanks only to the fact that they can look at things more closely than has always been done, that life is supported by something as regards which I am not, for my part, going to take the step and say that it resembles a language, and talk about messages that are supposed to be inscribed in the first molecules and which could have obviously singular effects, effects which are manifested in the way in which there are organised all kinds of things that are turned into manure, or to all sorts of constructions that are chemically located and locatable. But in fact, there is certainly a profound eccentricity which happens and which happens in a way as regards which it is at least curious that this comes to be noticed everywhere only from some articulated thing, up to and including a punctuation.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(230) I do not want to enlarge on that; I do not want to enlarge on it, but after all, it is indeed because I in no way assimilate this kind of signalisation that biology makes use of, I in no way assimilate it to what is involved in language, contrary to a sort of jubilation that seems to have laid hold in this connection of the linguist who meets up with the biologist, shakes his hand and says: 'We're in this together'. I think that concepts, for example, like that of structural stability can, as I might say, give a different form of presence to the body. For after all, what is essential, is not only how life manages with itself for there to be produced things that are capable of being living, the fact is that all the same, that the body has a form, an organisation, a morphogenesis, and that it is a different way also of seeing things, namely, that a body, reproduces itself.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Let's not quit reduce what happens in a body to language.

So then it is not the same, all the same, it is not the same as the way in which things are communicated inside, as one might say. This notion of communication which is all that is at stake in this idea of first messages thanks to which a chemical substance is supposed to be organised, is something else. It is something else and then, this is where the leap must be taken and we must note that signs are given within a privileged experience, that there is an order, an order to be distinguished, not of the Real, but in the Real, and that it originates, is made original by being solidary with something which, despite us, as I might say, is excluded from this approach of life, but of which we do not take account – that is what this year I wanted to insist on – that life implies it, imaginarily implies it as one might say. What strikes us in this fact which is the one to which Aristotle really adhered, that it is only the individual who truly counts, the fact is that without knowing it, he supposes enjoyment to it. And that what constitutes the One of this individual, is all sorts of signs, but not signs in the sense that I understood earlier, signs which give this privileged experience that I situated in analysis, let us not forget – there are signs in its displacement, in its motion, in short, that it enjoys. And that indeed is why Aristotle had no trouble making an ethics, the fact is that he supposes, the fact is that he supposes hedone, that hedone had not received the meaning that it received later from the Epicureans; the hedone that is at stake, is what puts the body into a current which is one of enjoyment. He can only do so because he is himself in a (231) privileged position. But since he does not know which, since he does not know that he thinks about enjoyment in this way because he belongs to the class of masters, it happens that he tackles it all the same, namely, that only one who can do what he wants, that only he has an ethics.

linked to hedonism

It's what makes you act – it's the basis of your pleasure.

This is the other of the mortal. Aristotle does not reflect on it fact that he is a mortal. The only one who can afford to have an ethics is the one who can do what he wants

http://www.lacaninireland.com

This enjoyment is obviously linked much more than is believed to the logic of life. But what we discover, is that in a privileged being – as privileged as Aristotle was compared to the totality of human beings – in a privileged being, this life, as I might say, varies or even is damaged (s'avarie) is damaged to the point of being diversified into what? Well this precisely is what is at stake: what is at stake are semes namely, this something that is incarnated in lalangue. Because one must indeed accept to think that lalangue is solidary with the reality of the feelings that it signifies. If there is something that really makes us get in touch with that, it is precisely psychoanalysis. That 'impediment' – as I said at one time in my seminar on Anxiety which I regret, after all, is not yet at your disposal – that 'impediment', 'dismay' – dismay as I clearly specified it: dismay is the withdrawal of a power – that 'embarrassment' are words which have meaning, well, they only have the meaning conveyed on the traces opened up by lalangue. Of course, we can project these feelings onto animals. I would simply point out to you that if we can project impediment, dismay, embarrassment onto animals, it is uniquely onto domestic animals. That we may be able to say that a dog was dismayed, embarrassed or impeded in some way, is in the measure that he is in the field of these semes, and this by way of our mediation.

Domestic animals are subjected to the language of men & they are likely to react (unlike wild animals)

So then I would like all the same to make you sense what analytic experience implies: the fact is that when it is a question of this semiotics, of what creates meaning and of what involves feeling, well then, what this experience demonstrates, is that it is from lalangue, as I write it, that there proceeds what I will not hesitate to call animation – and why not, you know very well that I do not bore you with the soul: animation, is in the sense of a series fiddling about, a fiddling, a scratching, in a word of a fury – the animation of the enjoyment of the body. And this animation is not experience, does not come from just anywhere. If the body is animated in its motive power, in the sense (232) that I have just told you, namely, that it is the animation that a parasite gives, the animation that perhaps I give to the University for example, well then, that comes from a privileged enjoyment, distinct from that of the body. It is certain that to speak about it, in short, one is rather embarrassed because to put it forward like that is laughable, and it is not for nothing that it is laughable: it is laughable because it makes us laugh. But it is very precisely this that we situate in phallic enjoyment. Phallic enjoyment is what, in short, is contributed by the semes, since today alongside – since today, worried as I was by this Congress on semiotics, I allow myself to put forward the word 'seme'. It is not that I insist on it, you understand, because I do not try to complicate your lives. I do not try to complicate your lives, nor especially to make semioticians of you. God knows where that could lead you! That would lead you moreover into the place where you are, namely, that would not lead you out of the University. Only here is what is at stake: the seme is not complicated, it is what makes meaning. Everything that creates meaning in lalangue proves to be linked to the ek-sistence of this tongue, namely, that it is outside the business of the life of the body, and that if there is something that I have tried to develop this year before you – that I hope to have made present, but who knows – it is that it is in so far as this phallic enjoyment, that this semiotic enjoyment is added on to the body that there is a problem.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I proposed to you to resolve this problem if indeed it is a complete solution, but to resolve it simply in short, from the observation that this sliding semiosis tickles the body in the measure – and this measure, I propose to you as absolute – in the measure that there is no sexual relationship. In other words, in this confused totality that only the seme, the seme once one has awakened it to ek-sistence, namely, that one has said it as such, it is by this, it is in the measure that the speaking body inhabits these semes that it finds the means to supply for the fact that nothing, nothing apart from that, will lead it towards what we have indeed been forced to bring out in the term 'other', in the term 'other' which inhabits lalangue and which is designed to represent the fact precisely that there is no relationship with the partner, the sexual partner, except by the mediation of what creates meaning in lalangue. There is no natural relationship, not that if it (233) were natural, one could write it, but that precisely one cannot write it because there is nothing natural in the sexual relationship of this being which finds itself less a speaking being than a spoken being.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

There is no "sexual relationship" - the first Three Essays if there is already saying this.

That imaginarily, because of that, this enjoyment as regards which you see that in presenting it to you as phallic, I qualified in an equivalent way as semiotic, of course, it is obviously it appears to me quite grotesque to imagine this phallus in the male organ. It is all the same in that way indeed that it is imagined in the facts that analytic experience reveals. And it is certainly also the sign that there is in this male organ something which constitutes an experience of enjoyment which is apart from the others, not only which is apart from the others, but which ... the other enjoyments, the enjoyment which is, faith, quite easy to imagine. Namely, that a body, good God, is designed so that one has the pleasure of lifting one arm and then another, and then of doing gymnastics, and of jumping and running and of pulling and doing whatever you want, good. It is all the same curious that it should be around this organ that a privileged enjoyment should come to birth. For this is what analytic experience shows us, namely, that it is around this grotesque shape that there begins to pivot this sort of supplying that I described as what in Freud's statement, is marked by the privilege, as one might say, of sexual meaning, without it being truly realised, even though all the same, that tickled him also and he glimpsed it, he almost said it in Civilisation and its discontents – namely, that meaning is only sexual because meaning is substituted precisely for the sexual which is lacking. That is what is supposed by everything implied by its use, its analytic use of human behaviour: not that meaning reflects the sexual, but that it supplies for it.

Meaning, it must be said, meaning like that when one does not work on it, well then it is opaque. The confusion of feelings, is everything that lalangue is designed to semiotise. And it is indeed because of that that all words are designed to be pliable in every direction. So then what I proposed, what I proposed from the start of this teaching, from the Rome discourse on, is to grant the importance that it has in practice, in analytic practice, to the material of lalangue. A linguist, a linguist of course, is altogether introduced right away to this consideration of the tongue as having a material. He knows this (234) material well: it is what is in the dictionaries, it is the lexical, it is morphology also, in short, it is the object of his linguistics. There is someone who, naturally, is a hundred cubits above a congress like the one that I told you about, who is Jakobson. He spoke a little about me in the margins, not in his opening discourse, but immediately afterwards, he was determined to specify clearly that the use that I had made of Saussure, and behind Saussure – I knew enough about it to know all the same – the Stoics and Saint Augustin? Why not? Me, I retreat before nothing. The fact is that what I borrowed from Saussure simply and from the Stoics under the term of signatum, this signatum, is meaning and that it is just as important as this accent that I put on the signans…

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The signans has the interest of allowing us to operate in analysis, to resolve, even though like everyone else we are only capable of having one thought at a time, but to put us in this state that is modestly described as floating attention. This means precisely that when the partner, here the analysand, for his part expresses one, a thought, we can have a quite different one, that it is a lucky chance from which there springs forth a flash. And it is precisely here that an interpretation can occur, namely, that because of the fact that we have a floating attention, we hear what he has said sometimes simply because of a kind of equivocation, namely, a material equivalence. We perceive that what he said – we perceive it because we undergo it – that what he said could be understood in the wrong way. And it is precisely in understanding it in the wrong way that we allow him to perceive where his thoughts, his own semiotics, where it comes from:

http://www.lacaninireland.com

it comes from nothing other than the ek-sistence of lalangue. Lalangue ek-sists elsewhere than in what he believes to be his world.

Lalangue has the same parasitic quality as phallic enjoyment, with respect to all other enjoyments. And it is what determines as parasitic in the Real what is involved in unconscious knowledge. Lalangue must be conceived of. And why not, why not speak of what lalangue might be in relationship with phallic enjoyment like the branches of a tree. It is not for nothing – because all the same I have my own little idea… – it is not for nothing that I pointed out to you that this famous tree at the start, there, the one from which the apple was picked, one could ask the question of whether it enjoyed itself just like any other (235) living being. If I put this forward to you, it is not entirely without reason, of course. And then let us say that lalangue, any element whatsoever of lalangue, is, with respect to phallic enjoyment, a strand of enjoyment. And that is why it stretches its roots so far into the body.

Good, so then what one must start from – you see that this is being dragged out, it is late, good – is this strong affirmation that the unconscious is not a knowing (connaissance): it is a knowledge (savoir), and a knowledge in so far as I define it from the connection of signifiers. First point. Second point: it is a discordant knowledge which does not lend in any way to a happy marriage, to a marriage which would be happy. This is implied in the very notion of marriage, this is what is outrageous, what is fabulous: does anybody know a happy marriage? No, but in short… Let us go on. Nevertheless the name is designed to express happiness. Yes, the name is designed to express happiness and it is the one that came to me to tell you what one could imagine in terms of a good adaptation, as they say, of a fitting together, in short of something which would ensure that what I have said to you about life, the life of the body in the one who speaks, this could be judged in terms of a just, of a noble exchange between this body and its milieu, as they say, its old pal the Welt.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

All the same, these remarks have their historical importance, because you will see, you who will survive me, you will see: everything that has begun to be babbled about in biology clearly gives the impression that life has nothing natural about it. It is something mad. The proof is that they have shoved linguistics into it! In a word, it's outrageous. This life will keep some surprises, when people have stopped talking like bird brains, namely, imagining that life is opposed to death. It's absolutely crazy, this business! First of all what do we know about it? What is dead? The inanimate world we are told. But it is because there is a different conception of the soul than the one that I represented for you now, namely, that the soul is that which... is a crab (crabe).

So then, I am going to tell you, even: at the point that we are at in it, it is paradoxical. It is paradoxical, I say that because it read a little torchon paper that was produced there in the last congress of the Societé de Psychanalyse and which bore witness to something that at the very least is paradoxical: which is that as regards what I am in the process of rejecting, namely, that there is a knowing, that there is the slightest harmony between what is situated terms of enjoyment, of (236) corporal enjoyment and what surrounds it. But there is only one place where this famous knowing can happen, a place, according to me and you will never guess it: it is in analysis itself. In analysis, one can say that there can be something that resembles knowing. And I find the testimony for it in the fact that in connection with the paper, the torchon paper that I am talking to you about which deals with the dream, the innocence with which this is acknowledged is absolutely marvellous. There is someone and someone about whom I am not at all surprised should be that person, because all the same he received a little finishing touch that I gave him at one time, the fact is that everything is centred around the fact that he sees there being reproduced in one of his dreams a note, a properly speaking semantic note – namely, that it is only truly here as noted, articulated, written –

http://www.lacaninireland.com

he sees there being reproduced in one of his dreams a semantic note of the dream of one of his patients. He is quite right to stick knowing into his title. This kind of co-vibrating, semiotic co-vibrating, it is not surprising that it is called like that modestly transference. And people are quite right also to call it only that. I'm for that. It is not love, but it is love in the ordinary sense, it is love as it is imagined. Love is obviously something else. But as regards the idea, as one might say, that people have of love, there is nothing better than this sort of analytic knowing. I am not sure that it goes very far, this is indeed moreover also why all analytic experience remains bogged down. And that is not what should be at stake. It should be a matter of elaborating, of allowing the one that I call the analysand to elaborate, to elaborate this knowledge, this unconscious knowledge which is in him like a canker, not like a depth, like a canker.

This is something different, of course, it is something different to knowing. And it would need a discipline obviously a little different than the philosophical discipline. There is something in Cocteau – because from time to time I do not see why I should spit on writers, they are rather less stupid than the others – there is a thing in Cocteau that is called Le Potomak where he created something that I am not going to try to tell you what it is: les Eugène. But there is also within it the Mortimers. The Mortimers have only a single heart, and it is represented in a little drawing where they have a dream in common.

Si plein, si rond, (un seul pour deux)
le rêve des Mortimer, qu'en vain les Eugène cherchent, pour y pénetrer, une issue
[So full, so round, (a single one for two) the dream of the Mortimers that in vain the Eugenes seek a way out of in order to penetrate it]
Jean Cocteau, Le Potomak (1915)

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is someone in the style of my psychoanalyst of just now, the one that I did not name: between the analysand and the analyst, it is like among the Mortimers. It is not frequent, it is not frequent even among people who love one another, for them to have the same dream. It is even very remarkable. It is indeed what proves the solitude of each one with what emerges from phallic enjoyment. Good.

So then all the same – there is less than a quarter of an hour left – I would like all the same to make some remarks, I would like to make all the same some remarks about the import – because this seemed to strike like that a pal who is there in the first row, I blurted that out to him like that during a dinner and I had the surprise to see that it filled him with pleasure, so then I realised how badly I explain myself: because I had written for you on the board:

$\exists x . \overline{\Phi x}$ (There should be a negation over the Φx)

Which means:

There must be one who says no to phallic enjoyment

Thanks to which and to which alone

There are alls (des tous) who say yes (There are lots of people who don't say 'no' to Phallic enjoyment)

lots of people

(238) I put you face to face with the fact that there are – I must have, I must have given rise to some confusion – that there are others among whom there are none who say no. Only, that has as a curious consequence that among these others, in short, there are none at all who say yes. That is the inscription, it is the attempt at inscription in a mathematical function, of something which uses quantifiers. There is nothing illegitimate – I am not going to argue that today because we don't have any more time – there is nothing illegitimate in this quantification of meaning. This quantification stems from an identification. The identification stems from a unification. What did I write for you formerly in the formulae of four discourses? An S_1 that has fixed itself, that has pointed towards an S_2. What is an S_1? It is a signifier, as the letter indicates. What is proper to a signifier – it is the feature of a tongue about which one can do nothing – is that any signifier can be reduced to the import of the signifier One. And it is as signifying One – I think that you remember formerly my little brackets: S_1 S_2 in brackets, and there were S_1's that stuck themselves in front again, etc., to express the business that I am defining to ensure that the signifier should be what dominates in the constitution of the subject: a signifier is what represents a subject for another signifier. Good so then, so then, any letter x, whatever it may be means this One as indeterminate. This is what is called in the function, in the function in the mathematical sense, the argument. This is where I started to talk to you about identification. But if there is an identification, as sexed identification and if, on the other hand, I am telling you that there is no sexual relationship, what does that mean? That means that there is a sexed identification only on one side, namely, that all these pinpointings of identification described as functional, are to be put – and it is in this that the pal in question manifested his lively satisfaction, it is because I had told him like that in a solid way, instead of to you, I left you in the soup – the fact is that all these identifications are on the same side: that means that it is only a woman who is capable of making them. Why not the man? Because you note that I say of course 'a woman' and then I say 'the man'. Because the man, the man as he is imagined by the woman, namely, she who does not exist, namely, an imagination of the void, the man for his part is twisted by his sex. Instead of a woman being able to make a sexed (239) identification. She has even nothing to do but that, because she must pass by way of phallic enjoyment which is precisely what is lacking to her. I am saying that to you because I could speckle it with a reference to my four little pinpointings, there: $\forall x$ – I am not going to the board because you won't hear if I write on the board – what does that mean for the woman, because you may have been able to believe that with that, that what I was designating were all the men? That means the requirement that the woman shows – it is obvious: that the man should be all hers. I begin with this, because it is the funniest bit. It is in the nature of the woman to be jealous, in the nature of her love. When I think that in 10 minutes I am going to have to explain to you what love is! It's annoying to be hassled to that extent. Good. The not-all (pas-toutes) by which I inscribed the other relationship to Φx, is that by which this same love, the love that is at stake and that I put like that, generously, entirely on the side of women, we must all the same put, as I might say, a break on it, I mean by that, that it is not all that she loves: there remains a bit for herself, for her corporal enjoyment. This is what is meant by the $\overline{\forall x}$ the 'not-allness'. Good. And then after the $\exists x$, existence, the existence of the x, that for its part, as near as may be – as near as may be and then because I said it clearly here – which is the one where God is situated... One must be more temperate, I mean by that that one must not be too haughty about this business of God, since with time it has become worn out, and it is all the same not because there is knowledge in the Real that we are forced to identify it to God. I for my part am going to propose to you, a different interpretation. The $\exists x \overline{\Phi x}$, is the locus of the enjoyment of the woman who is much more linked to the saying than is imagined. It has to be said that without psychoanalysis it is quite obvious that in this I would be a complete novice like everyone else. The link of the enjoyment of the woman to the impudence of the saying, this is what it appears to me to be important to underline. I did not say shamelessness (impudeur). Impudence is not the same, it is not at all the same. And the $\overline{\exists x}.\overline{\Phi x}$, both barred, is the way in which the woman does not exist, namely, the way in which her enjoyment cannot be grounded on her own impudence.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I am handing you that like that, it is, I must acknowledge that it is... I find you patient. These, these are hammer blows that I am landing on your mug. But anyway, since I am a little bit rushed, I would like all (240) the same to conclude on this fact that the unconscious as discordant knowledge is more foreign to a woman than to the man. It is funny that I should be saying such a thing to you! So then, so then what is going to result from it? What is going to result from it is that there is all the same the woman's side. It is not because it is more foreign that it is not foreign to the man also. It is more foreign to her because that comes to her from the man, from the man of whom I spoke earlier, from the man of whom she dreams because if I said that the man exists, I clearly specified that it is in the measure that he is, more cankered or even more notched by the unconscious. But a woman preserves, as I might say, a little bit more fresh air in her enjoyments. She is less notched contrary to appearances.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

And it is on this that I would like to end. I would like to end on something which is an extract from Peirce: namely, that it was noticed all the same that logic, Aristotelian logic, is a purely predicatory and classificatory logic. So then he started to think around the idea of the relation, namely, what is perfectly, what is self-evident, what is like a billiard table, a billiard table concerning not the function of pinpointing to a single argument that I have just given you as being that of the identification by putting the thing back into the woman's pocket. He started to cogitate around the $x\,R$ (R, the sign of an ideal emptied-out relation, he does not say which) R and y: $x\,R\,y$: a function with two arguments. What, starting from what I have just put forward for you today, what is the knowledge relation? There is something very, very clever that is noted in Peirce – you see I pay tribute to my authors – when I make a discovery in one, I attribute it to him. I attribute it to him like that, I might moreover not have attributed it to him. Formerly, I spoke about metaphor and metonymy, and all the people started crying out, on the pretext that I had not said immediately that I owed that to Jakobson. As if everyone should not have known that! Anyway it was Laplanche and Lefebvre-Pontalis who were shouting about that. Anyway, what a memory! Make no mistake!

If what I am saying to you today, what I am putting forward is founded, knowledge does not have a subject. If knowledge is made up in the connection of two signifiers and if it is only that, it only has a subject if we supposed one that only serves as a representative of the

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(241) subject for the other. There is all the same something which is rather curious there: it is the relation, if you write x R y in this order, is the result that x is related to y? Can we support what is expressed in the active or passive voice of the verb by the relation? But that is not self-evident. It is not because I said that feelings are always reciprocal – because this is how I expressed myself at one time before people who as usual understood nothing about what I was saying – it is not because one loves that one is loved. I never dared say such a thing. The essence of the relation if in effect some effect is referred back to the starting point, means simply that when one loves one becomes enamoured as I said. And when the first term is knowledge? There we have a surprise, which is that knowledge is perfectly identical, at the level of unconscious knowledge, to the fact that the subject is known. At the level of meaning in any case, it is absolutely clear: knowledge is what is known.

So then let us try all the same to draw some consequences from something that analysis shows us, which is that what is called transference, namely, what I called earlier love, everyday love – the love on which one calmly rests and then, no more trouble – is not altogether the same as what happens when the enjoyment of the woman emerges. But there you are, I will reserve that for you for next year. For the moment, let us try to clearly grasp that what analysis has revealed as truth, is that love, the love of which I spoke earlier, love is directed towards the subject supposed to know and so that it would be the reverse side of what I questioned the relation of knowledge about, well then, it would be that the partner, on this occasion, is borne along by this sort of motion that is described as love.

But if the x of the relation that might be written as sexual, is the signifier in so far as it is connected to phallic enjoyment, we have all the same to draw out its consequence. The consequence is that if the unconscious is indeed the support of what I told you about today, namely, a knowledge, the fact is that everything I wanted to tell you

http://www.lacaninireland.com

this year about the non-dupes who err means that anyone who is not in love with his unconscious errs. That says nothing whatsoever against past centuries. They were just as much in love with their unconscious as the others and so they did not err. Simply, they did not know where they were going, but as regards being in love with their unconscious, (242) they certainly were! They imagined that it was knowing (la connaissance) because there is no need to know that one is in love with one's unconscious in order not to err. One only has to offer no resistance, to be its dupe. For the first time in history, it is possible for you for you to err, namely, to refuse to love your unconscious, since in short you know what it is: a knowledge, a knowledge that pisses you off. But perhaps in this impetus (e-r-r-e), you know, this thing that pulls, when the ship is riding at anchor – it is perhaps here that we can wager on rediscovering the Real a little more in what follows, to perceive that the unconscious is perhaps no doubt discordant, but that perhaps it leads us to a little more of this Real than this very little of reality which is ours, that of the phantasy, that it leads us beyond: to the pure Real.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 9: Wednesday 12 March 1974

[Dr. Lacan arranges four sketches on the board].

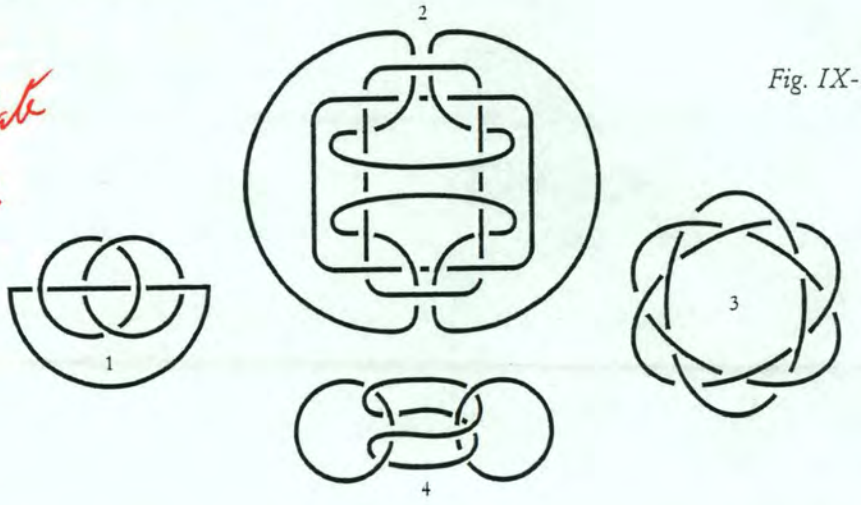

Fig. IX-1

Good, so then I am entering into the core of the subject, even though I would of course prefer to talk about something else. To say for example that... that I have no reason to complain, that... that I am giving, in a word, at the same time, I am giving you – I apologise - I am giving you hay to eat. All of that is hay. These are things that cross over one another, and, well, which do not get across. So that I have no reason to complain in this sense that, it is either one thing or the other: either I am given back my hay right away, this is what (134) happens, like that, my hay as such, in short, it is not at all something that cannot be tolerated, it is served up to me again just as, just as I have propounded it. This is what happens with some people. And then there are people, for example that this hay tickles so much as

http://www.lacaninireland.com

it goes down their throat, that they vomit Claudel, at me, for example. It is because they already had him there… I am annoyed, I am annoyed because the person that I made vomit Claudel telephoned – Gloria naturally – at the moment… to ask her where my seminar was held. Anyway, I am terribly sorry, I hope that she has ended up by finding out. She is perhaps here, in any case if she is not here let her be brought my apologies, because Gloria sent her packing, and it is not at all what… what I would have wanted: why would she not come to eat hay like everyone else… Good, good, well then the hay in question, anyway, is what you know is on the agenda, is that not so, because of me: the Borromean knot.

I can say that I am spoiled, because I have just been brought an African one. It is the Borromean knot in person is it not. It is… I certify its authenticity for you, because ever since I have been handling it, I have begun to know a bit about it… and I like it a lot, because if there is one thing about which I rack my brain – I even asked about it, anyway, it is… it is to know where it comes from. It is called Borromean, it is not at all because there was a chap who one day discovered it. It was of course discovered a long time ago, and what astonishes me is that, is that it has not been used more, indeed, because it was truly, it was truly a way of tackling what I call the three dimensions. They were taken up differently and there must be reasons for that. There must be reasons for that, because I cannot at all see why – anyway, I do not see this at a first approach – I does not see why people would not have tried to squeeze the point, to make the point, if you wish, with it, rather than with things that cut themselves. It is a fact that it did not happen like that. What fate it would have had if it had happened like that, it is probable that this would have trained us quite differently.

It is not at all that those who are called philosophers, namely,, good God, those who try to say something about our… our condition, in a word, to respond to it, it is not at all the case that there is no trace of the fact that this business of knots, precisely, did not interest them, because: for truly, for truly a very long period of time there have been (135) people who find themselves curiously having, as far as we know – by being classed for a long time as far as we know, among the women, anyway, what I call 'the women' – and it is in the plural since as you know, in fact, there have been some of them there for a long time – that women reached an understanding of that, by making tissues, fabrics. And this might have put people on the track. It is very curious that quite the contrary, this rather inspired intimidation. Aristotle indeed talks about it, and it is very curious that he did not take it as an object. Because that would have been a start that would not have been any worse than any other. What is it, what is it that ensures that knots, knots, are so poorly imagined? This one like that, because it is made in a certain way, holds up. [Lacan is talking here about the African knot in his hand]. But it is only when it is flattened out that it is not easy to handle, and it is probably not for nothing indeed, that with these knots it is always things which make a fabric, namely, that form a surface, that people tried to fabricate. It is probably because the flattened out thing, the surface, is very much linked, in fact, to all sorts of uses. Yes. I am going to give you right away a proof of the fact that knots are poorly imagined. Good.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

You make a plait. A plait of two. You do not have to do very much with it, it is enough for you to cross over once, then a second time, after two you find your two in order. Knot them now end to end, namely, the same with the same. Well then it is knotted. One could even say it is knotted twice. That makes a double buckle. It holds together, the... what you have joined together, namely, as my faithful Achates put as a title of my last seminar of last year, he called that 'rings of string (les ronds de ficelle). I don't know whether in the text I had called it that or something else, it is probable that I had called it that, but he put it into the title. Good.

Women made fabrics & the men made pots. (Freud made a fantastic thing)

There are a lot of knots that were made – plaiting etc. But women have flattened knots.

He makes a point of "order". It's not a cardinal order 1st, 2nd, 3rd etc. but an order is made – a modality.

Achates?! Who is he? Why does he call him his Achates?

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Good. Now make a plait of three. Before you rediscover, in the plait of three, the three strands – let us call them strands (des brins), today, for example – the three strands in order, you have to perform 6 times the gesture of crossing over the strands, as a result of which, after you have performed this gesture 6 times, you rediscover the three strands in order. And then again you join them. Well then, it is all the same something that is not self-evident, that is not immediately imagined: the fact is if once this knot that I quite simply told you was a (136) Borromean knot, namely, such as it is in the most simple form, the one there on the left, it is not self-evident that having plaited as in the first case, you can see when all is said and done that this stems from a double knot, it is not self-evident that it is enough for you to break one of these strands for the two others to be free. Because at first sight, they seem to be very well twisted around one another, and one might presume that they hold together just as well as in the plait of two. Well then not at all: you see right away that they separate. It is enough to cut one of the three for the two others to prove not to be knotted. And this remains true no matter what the multiple of six with which you pursue the plait. It is quite certain in effect that, since you have found your three strands in order at the end of six gestures of plaiting, you are also going to find them in order when you make a further six. When you make a further six of them this will give you this Borromean knot here [sketch 3]. Namely, that what you see here passing once, inside the two other knots, which you can see are – and that is why I presented them like that – free from one another, you do that, in reality here you see it, twice. And it is still a knot described as Borromean, in that whatever may be the one that you break, the two others will be free. With a tiny little bit of imagination, you can see why. It is because, let us take these two here for example, they are such that, let us say to say things simply, that they do not cut one another, that they are one above the other. You can note that this is true for each couple of two. Good. Here are two ways of making a Borromean knot, but which in reality are only one, namely, that to plait them an indefinite number of times multiple of six, it will still be just as authentic a Borromean knot.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Any two of the Borromean knots are on top of each other & the 3rd one binds them.

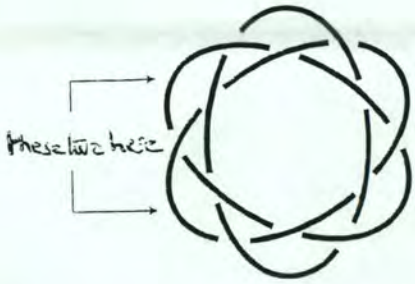

Fig. IX-2

(137) I apologise to those that this may weary, what I am telling you here all the same has an end. I would like simply to point out to you that the count is not complete for all that. You can plait for as long as you like, provided you stick to a multiple of six, as long as you like, the plait in question will always be a Borromean knot. Already just by itself, this seems to open the door to an infinity of Borromean knots.

Infinity is a very important thing in knots. Cantor on infinite Series. Algebraic terms do not have an infinity

Well then this infinity, already realised virtually since you can conceive of it, this infinity is not limited to this. Such and such an example of it that I give you on the board in the shape of this way (one cannot say that the instruments are suitable, good...) in the shape of this way of inscribing it, namely, that you see that here [sketch 2], the buckle, as I might say, is double, and that if the Borromean knot is realised in a way that I had first traced out in such a way that it can be clearly seen, by pulling from here that this makes two. You can for that matter draw it by making come back here the buckle which you see has passed under one of the levels of my rings of string, and for each of the two to come back, it will do the circuit, of one of these rings, and will come back here to inscribe itself by crossing underneath the two buckles that are found here to be parallel because of the arrangement, and to give the shape in short of a cross. If you arrange the Borromean knot in this way – I hope I was... I made you imagine what this drawing could be. if you want me to trace it out. I will trace it out for you – it becomes entirely symmetrical, and it has the interest of presentifying for us in a different form the materialisation that it can give in this shape of symmetry, precisely (the symmetry, in two words, is it not: the symmetry from another side). Namely, to show us that there is a way of presenting the Borromean knot which, in its very tracing out, imposes on us the emergence of symmetry, namely, of the two.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

He wants to give the notion of 'symmetry' as giving rise to the "2".

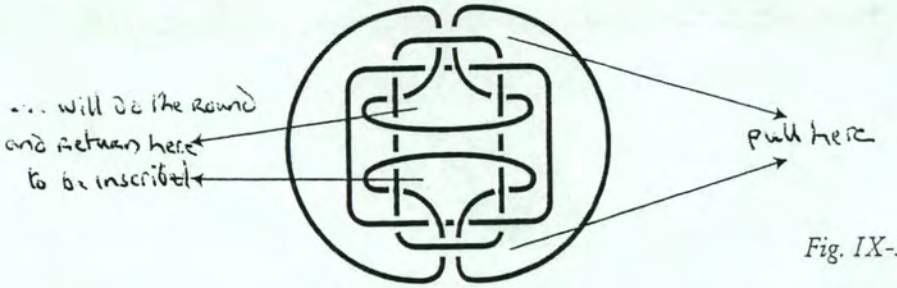

Fig. IX-3

(138) There was no need for us to go so far to notice it. Namely, that by simply, I would say 'pulling' on this part of the ring of string, you can easily imagine for yourself the result that it will give, namely, to fold in two this ring on the right [sketch 1]. Namely, to obtain this result which is presented as follows:

This loop over here brings you to infinity.

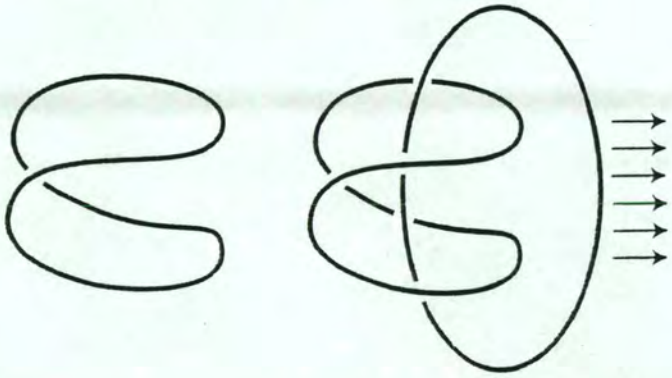

Fig. IX-4

As a result of which, you see that what results from it is the following: namely, that one of these rings pulls the knot folded in two, the buckle folded in two in this direction ⟶ while the other that you have there is presented in a manifest way, perhaps moreover less salient to your eyes, the particular thing which ensures that, you cannot unknot these knots of three but it is enough for one of them, any one at all of them to be missing for the two others to be free. It is even one of the clearest ways to image the fact that you can, if you pass your ring inside the knot that I am calling... of the buckle that I am calling 'the folded buckle', if you put through another buckle folded in the same way pass, you can knot an indefinite number of these rings of string, and it is enough for one to be broken, for one to be lacking, for one to be missing, for all the others to be free. As a result of which, as a result of which, what cannot but come to mind, is that, since you have added an indefinite number of times, they are folded knots taken up one into the other, you are not forced to end because you see here functioning, namely, a simple ring of string. You can buckle this complete circle in a way that makes... the thing to be closed by a folded circle. Namely, that if you had more than three of them, it would be quite easy for you to imagine that to close, it is with one of (139) these folded circles that you would bring about the closure. If you bring about the closure with three, what you obtain is in fact very precisely this result [sketch 2]. Namely, that starting from there you can produce this buckle, namely, that from the handling in three's of the Borromean knot – which as you see can function on a much greater number, from the handling in three's you give rise to this figure of which I told you that it presentified the symmetry in the Borromean knot itself. Namely, that it inscribes the two in it.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

What must be underlined, before closing what we might call this 'depicted' demonstration, that we can describe as depicted, what should be underlined is the following. It is that to each of these rings of string – to call them such in the way that gives the best image – to each of these rings of string, you can give, by a sufficiently regular manipulation (you must not be surprised at the patience you will require) to each of these three, namely, as much to this ring of string here as to this ring of string there also, you can give exactly the same place which is the one that you see depicted here as the third.

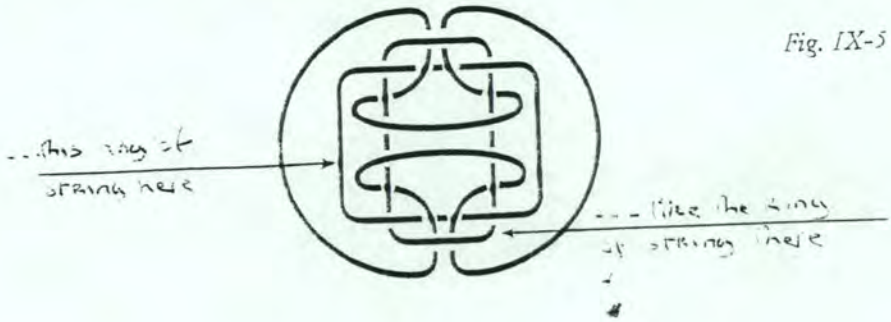

Fig. IX-5

http://www.lacaninireland.com

What use do I make of this Borromean knot of three? It is of use to me, as I might say for inventing the rule of a game, in such a way that there can be figured by it the relationship of the Real very properly to what is involved in the Imaginary and the Symbolic. Namely, that the Real, like the Imaginary and the Symbolic, is what makes three of it. That makes three of it, and nothing more.

It is striking that up to now there is no example that there was ever a saying that posited the Real, not as that which is third, because that would be to say too much, but as that which, with the Imaginary and the Symbolic, makes three. That is not all... 'with the Imaginary and the Symbolic makes three'... that is not all! By this presentation what (140) I am trying to hook onto, is a structure such that the Real, by defining it in this way, in other words the Real of before the order, that nodality gives us this something which, by saying that it is before order in no way supposes a first, a second, a third. And as I have just underlined for you, not even a middle with two extremes. For even in the first form of the Borromean knot, the one that I... that I showed you allows there to be depicted as middle term knotting two extremes, this folded circle, that I am showing you here, even in this case any one at all of the three circles can play this role. Namely, that it is in no way linked, except to make you imagine it, the figure on the left only being there in order to make accessible to you the fact, is that not so that there is a middle in the folded circle; but any one at all of the two others can fulfil the same function, the others then taking the position of extremes.

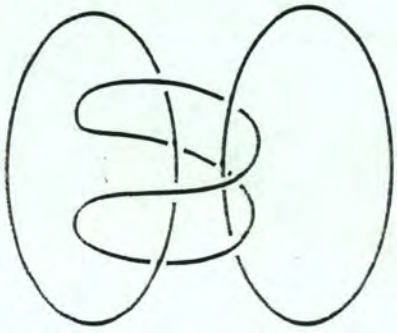

Fig. IX-6

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Where does this get us?

It is to be noted that if we interest ourselves in the 'two' – which is indeed the problem presentified by something which is truly, one can say, insistent in what the experience of the analytic discourse brings us, it is not for nothing that it introduces this two par excellence which is the love of one's own image, it is indeed the essence of symmetry itself; does this not introduce us, because of this knot, to this consideration that the Imaginary is not what is to be most recommended for finding the rule of the game of love. What experience tells us about it, if it is specifically marked by imaginary representation, since we have come, from the experience itself, to impose it on ourselves, we imagine that love is two. Is it all that (141) proved, other than by imaginary experience? Why would it not be this middle – as moreover is indicated by the fact that it is at the level of this middle that there is produced, this time, two times two, why should it not be this middle – which I have just underlined for you is moreover gyrowave (gyrovague) namely, vagabond, that it can just as well be fulfilled by any one of the three – why would it not be this middle which, by providing itself in a suspect way with this form, with this form of the image of itself – this middle which would deliver correctly thought out, namely, through the Real of these connections, the mainspring of these knots?

In other words, is the Borromean knot not the mode in which there is delivered to us the One of the ring of string as such, the fact on the other hand that there are three of these Ones, and that it is by being knotted, only by being knotted, that we get the two. There are many considerations into which I could stray, as I might say, because they would not yet circumscribe any more closely what I might call the first character of the three.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is first, not in the sense that it would be the first to be first, because as everyone knows there is another which is described as such, but if the two is so described, it is in a quite singular way, since it is not in any way said, that one can accede to it starting from the One. If only because of the fact that – as has been noted for a long time – to say that one and one gives two, comes from the simple fact of the mark of addition, supposedly a reunion, namely, already the two.

In this sense the two is as one might say something of a vicious order, since it reposes only on its own supposition. To join ~~by one plus two~~ one is already to install the two.

But for the moment let us stick simply to the following, which is that what the Borromean knot illustrates for us, is that the two is only produced from the junction of the one to the three. Or more exactly, let us say that if one says that – as has been humorously done, that 'the number two rejoices at being odd', it is certainly not without reason that it rejoices – it would be wrong to rejoice at being odd, because if it were to rejoice for that reason, it would be a pity for it, it certainly is not so, but that it is engendered by the two odds one and three, is in short what the Borromean knot brings out for us, as I might say.

You should all the same clearly sense the relationship that this (142) lucubration has with our analytic experience. Freud is certainly a genius. He is a genius in that what analytic discourse brought out by his pen, is what I will call primitive terms (des termes sauvages). Read Group psychology and the analysis of the ego and very specifically the chapter on Identification, to grasp the quality of genius there is in the distinction that he formulates between three sorts of identification, namely, those that I denoted, when I highlighted them by the unary trait, by the Einziger Zug, and the way in which he distinguishes them from love in so far as carried to a term which, undoubtedly, is indeed the one that we must reach, namely, this function of the Other, in so far as it is given by the Father, and on the other hand, the other form, that of the identification described as hysterical, namely, from desire to desire, in so far as he distinguishes all three forms of this identification.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

That presented in this way, it is only a knot of riddles, I will say: a further reason to work, namely, to try to give to this a shape that involves a more rigorous algorithm. This algorithm is precisely the one that I am trying to give in the three itself, in so far as this three, as such, makes a knot. This is obviously the reason, as I might say, the reason to work. But a reason which, as I might say does not fail to damage us, not because the rings of string is already a toric, or indeed a twisted figure, it is much more still from this very singular fact even mathematics has not yet managed to find the algorithm, the most simple algorithm, namely, the one that would allow us, in the presence, certainly of other forms of knots than that of the Borromean knot, to find this something that would deliver to us for the knots in so far as they involve more than one ring of string – because for a single ring of string, being knotted to itself, it has, this algorithm, I could easily, I already did it, put on the board for you the figure of something which would have more or less the same aspect as the central figure, and which would nevertheless only be a single ring of string (I say 'more or less' because obviously it would not be the same – for a single ring of string, it may know what is homomorphous; for several rings of string the algorithm has not been found. This is not nevertheless a reason to abandon a task which engages nothing other than this two which is what is most involved in this figure of love as I have just reminded you.

Annie has a seminar on Knots will veer on & on for a long time.

(143) Love – I hope that already you feel more at ease – love is thrilling (passionant). To say that, is to say simply the truth of experience, but to say it like that, seems to be nothing, but is all the same it is all the same to take a step. Because, for whoever has his ears a little open, it is not at all the same thing as to say that it is a "passion." First of all there are many cases where love is not a passion. I would even say more. I doubt whether it is ever a passion. I doubt it, my God, because of my experience. Because of my experience – it does not stem only from mine – I mean that my experience in the analytic discourse gives me enough material – for what? For me to be able to allow myself in short to do what I defined the last time as knowledge, namely, to invent it. Which in no way protects you, especially if you are in analysis with me, from supposing that I have this knowledge, as something that I am not supposed to invent. But if knowledge, even unconscious, is precisely what is invented to supply for something which is only perhaps the mystery of the two, one can see that there is all the same a step taken, in daring to say that if love is thrilling, it is not because it is passive. It is a saying which, as such, implies in itself a rule. Since to say that something is thrilling, well, is to speak about it, as a game, where one is only in short active starting from rules.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

There are all the same some people who have noticed that for a long time. As regards everything that is said, there is someone called Wittgenstein, in particular, who distinguished himself at that.

So then, what I am putting forward, is that my formula there, 'love is thrilling', if I put it forward, it is as strictly true. Yes. Strictly true: it is all the same a long time since I since I emitted some reservations about this, namely, that strictly true is never more than half-true, that one can only ever half-say the truth. We will all the same have to manage, have to manage before the end of the year to formulate what that involves, and that I explain it for you later. It is the true – there is here all the same something that analytic experience can put us in contact with - yeah... the true has no other way of being able to be defined than that which in short brings it about that the body goes towards enjoyment, and that in this, what it is forced by, is nothing other than the principle, the principle by which sex is very specifically (144) linked to the death of the body. It is only among sexed beings that the body dies. And this forcing of reproduction, is indeed where the little bit of the true that we can state is of use.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I will even say more. Since it is death that is at stake – that is even why we never have more than the verisimilitude, since this death, the principle of the true, this death in the speaking being in so far as he speaks, is never anything more than a sham – death, truly, even though it confronts us, is not within reach of the true. Death pushes it. Even though it confronts us, even though we have to deal with death, it only happens with the Beautiful, and there it keeps its rendezvous.

I already demonstrated that at a time, at the time when I was doing the Ethics of psychoanalysis, and why does that keep its rendezvous? Because things being in a certain rotating order, it keeps its rendezvous in so far as it glorifies the body. There the principle of enjoyment, which is forced, is the fact of death, and everyone knows... that it is 'in the name of the body' that all of that happens, this indeed is what I formerly illustrated by the tragedy of Antigone and which curiously passed into Christian myth – because I do not know whether you have clearly perceived why there took place, this whole story this story of Christ who speaks of nothing but enjoyment: the lilies of the fields which neither weave nor sow – who traverses, for part, the myth affirms, traverses death. All of that when all is said and done has no goal, what we see, in a word, being spread out over kilometres of canvas, has no end than the production of glorious bodies about which one may ask what they are going to do throughout eternity, even if they are put in a ring in a circle of a theatre, what indeed they are going to be able to in contemplating something or other. It is all the same curious that it is along this path, this path not of the true, but of the Beautiful, that it is along this path that there was manifested for the first time the dogma of the divine Trinity. It must be said that it is a mystery! It is a mystery that... which has been approached, but, but not without a certain number of slippages. If in Aristotle's logic, the other day, I demonstrated for you the irruption of, of some theories or other of love – of some theories or other of love where there are very clearly distinguished love and enjoyment, this is already not bad, huh?

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is already not bad, but that only gives two, it does not at all give a trinity. But what is amusing to read in a treatise On the Trinity by a certain Richard de Saint Victor, the same unbelievable irruption, in fact, of the return of, of the return of love, of the Holy Spirit (145) considered as 'a little friend'. It is something that I would ask you to go to see in the text, in fact – I will get it out for you one day, I did not bring it along here this morning because, because I have enough to say today, but it is worthwhile, it is worthwhile touching that. How is it that it is by the Beautiful, that something which is there... the very truth, and what is more, what is true in the Real, namely, what I am trying to, to articulate this morning, like that, limping along: it is all the same quite curious. Yes.

In what way are the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real something which at least have the pretension, in short of going a little further than... than this going round in a circle of enjoyment, of the body and of death. Is there here something from which we might reach, reach better than what only... that what only appears to us as a signal, as a trace, I have just spoken of the True, of the Beautiful, in a way which in a word makes them function for us as middles (moyens) – I must deal with what is involved, what is involved in the Good.

In this business of the Borromean knot can the Good be situated somewhere? I tell you right away, there is very little chance, huh: if the True and the Beautiful did not hold up, I do not see how the Good would do any better. The only virtue that... that I see coming out of this questioning – and I am indicating it to you here while, while there is time, because it will no longer be seen – the only virtue, if... if there is no sexual relationship, as I state, is shame (pudeur). There you are, this indeed is why I ... I think it was a stroke of genius by the person who put a certain atterrita on the cover of my Télévision. It is a... it forms part of a theme in which the central personage, the one who gives its meaning to the whole picture, is, is a demon, in a word, who... was perfectly well recognised by the Ancients as being the demon of shame. He is not particularly funny, that is even why that the person, the atterrita, opens her arms in a kind of panic. Yes.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then, the non-dupes err, is perhaps the unashamed (non-pudes) err. Which as a result is promising, huh, it is promising because since on the other hand I think that, in fact, we should expect nothing, absolutely no progress from anything... I said that like that, to someone who spat out this hay, very kindly, because it is a person who spat out, truly, strictly only the hay that I had put into his mouth. It is no worse than anything else. It is... it is my hay, is it not... So (146) then, this does not all the same mean that there are not things that change. I am in the process of questioning love. And I begin to read things, like that, which are a little approach, simply, I do not know how it can happen... I will perhaps say more about it... if the result of an extension of the psychoanalytic discourse, since after all I am doing no less than considering it, but as a canker! I mean that it can explode up a lot of things, if being well spoken is only governed by shame, well then, obligatorily, it shocks. It shocks but it does not violate shame...

So then let us try to question ourselves about what might happen if one made serious ground from the angle that... love is thrilling, but that this implies that one follows the rule of the game in it. Naturally, for that, it must be known. That is perhaps what is lacking: it is that people have always been here in the most profound ignorance, namely, that they play a game whose rules they do not know. So then

http://www.lacaninireland.com

To invent the knowledge of the form of love.

if this knowledge must be invented in order for there to be knowledge, it is perhaps for that that analytic discourse may be of use.

Only if it is true that what you win on the one hand you lose on the other, there is surely something that is going to suffer. It is not hard to find: what is going to suffer is enjoyment. Because, in short, enjoyment is not lacking to this thing that is pursued blindly under the name of love! It is there by the shovelful! What is marvellous is that nothing is known about it: but it is probably what is proper to enjoyment, precisely, that nothing can ever be known about it... What is all the same surprising, is that, that there has not been a discourse on enjoyment. People have spoken about whatever you want, about extended substance, about thinking substance, but the first idea which might come, namely, that if there is something by which the body can be defined, it is not life, since we only see life in bodies which are, after all, what? Things of the order of bacterias, of things which flourish like that, in fact, you quickly get three kilos when you start with a milligram... the fact is ... it is not easy to see what relationship there is between that and our body... But that the very definition of a body is that it is an enjoying substance, how is it that this has never yet been stated by anyone? It is the only thing outside a myth which is really accessible to experience. A body enjoys itself, it enjoys itself (147) well or badly, but it is clear that this enjoyment introduces it into a dialectic in which incontestably there must be other terms for it to hold up, namely, nothing less than this knot which I, which I am serving up to you in a sandwich.

That enjoyment may suffer when love becomes something a little civilised, namely, when people know that it is to be played as a game - in fact it is not sure that this will happen. It is not sure that it will happen, but it might all the same occur to you, as I might say. It might occur to you all the more in that there are little traces, like that. There is all the same a remark that I would really like to make to you, concerning the pertinence of this knot: it is that in love, what bodies

http://www.lacaninireland.com

tend towards – and there is something piquant that I am going to say to you afterwards – what bodies tend towards, is to knot themselves together. They do not manage to do so, naturally, because…you clearly see…what is extraordinary is that a body never manages to be knotted. There is not even a trace of a knot in the body! If there is something that struck me when I was doing anatomy it was indeed that: I was always expecting to see at least, like that, in a corner, an artery, or a nerve, which…which hoopla, would do that…Nothing! I never saw anything like it, and that is even why anatomy, I should tell you thrilled me (m'a passioné) for two years. That really pisses off people who do their medicine as forced labour, like that. Not me. Naturally, I did not notice right away, that that was why it thrilled me, I noticed it afterwards; you never know until afterwards. And it is absolutely certain that what I was looking for in dissecting, was to find a knot. Yeah.

Which is why this Borromean knot rejoins all the same the why of the fact that, that love, in fact, is not designed to be tackled by the Imaginary. Because the simple fact that when it is working out badly, is that not so, for want of knowing the rule of the game, it articulates the knots of love, huh…It is funny all the same that this remains as a metaphor, that it does not illuminate things, that it does not give the idea that, on the side of this thing whose strange consistency I have, I hope, like that, made you sense a little, and the fact that…that it is surprising in fact that the Real, when all is said and done, is only that, a matter of knots; in short all the rest can be dreamt about. God knows, the dream in fact has a place in the activity of the speaking being.

We would talk about "bonds of love"..

I am letting myself go a little bit, like that, like that by putting in parentheses – you will pardon me, because you usually pardon me – but it is all the same, it is all the same unbelievable that the power of the dream should have gone so far as to make a desire out of a corporal function, sleep. No one has yet, has ever highlighled that the dream has made a desire out of sleep.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

something which is a rhythm – well, manifestly, because it exists among many other beings than speaking beings - the speaking being manages to make into a desire. He manages to pursue his dream as such, and because of that, to desire not to wake up. Naturally there is a moment where it lets go. But that Freud should have been able to go that far is something whose autonomy, originality, no one has really highlighted. Good.

So let us come back to our metaphorical knots. Do you not sense that what I am trying to do, by having recourse to them, is to do something which would not involve any supposition. Because people have spend their time positing, but never being able to posit except by supposing. Namely, that people posited the body – that was required – and people supposed the soul in it. It would be all the same necessary - this is a thing, there, like that, that I brewed up, because of the level I was at in this Telévision, huh, to speak about the soul and the unconscious... the unconscious, might be something quite different to a 'supposed', since knowledge (if what I advanced about it the last time is true), it is not at all required, it is not at all required to suppose it: it is a knowledge in the course of construction.

If it happened, if it happened that love were to become a game whose... whose rules one knew, this would perhaps, have many disadvantages with regard to enjoyment. But this would reject it, as I might say, towards its conjoined term. And if this conjoined term is indeed what I am putting forward about the Real, for which, as you see, I am satisfied with this slender little support of the number (I did not say the figure (chiffre)), of the number three. If love, becoming a game of which one knows the rules, were to be found one day, since that it its function, at the end of the fact that it is one of the One's of these threes – if it functioned to conjoin the enjoyment of the Real with the Real of enjoyment, would that not be something to make the game worthwhile?

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The enjoyment of the Real has a meaning, huh. If there is somewhere an enjoyment of the Real as such, and if the Real is what I am saying, namely, to begin with the number three – and you know that it is not to the three that I hold huh: adding 1416 to it would still give the same (149) number, huh, for what I use it for, and you could also write 2718, it is a particular Napierian logarithm, that plays the same role – the only people who enjoy this Real, are the mathematicians. So then it would be necessary for the mathematicians to pass under the yoke of the game of love, that they should state something about it to us, that they should do a little more work on the Borromean knot – because I should admit to you, in fact, I am really embarrassed, more than you can believe; I spend my days making Borromean knots, while it is... there, like that, I knit.

Only there you are, the enjoyment of the Real does not work without the Real of enjoyment. Because for one to be knotted to the other, the other must be knotted to the one. And the Real of enjoyment, is stated. But what meaning can be given to this term: the Real of enjoyment?

This is where I am leaving you for today, with a question mark.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Lacan is trying to correct the belief that he has downgraded the Imaginary in favour of the Symbolic. He does not agree

Seminar 10: Tuesday 19 March 1974

Whatever I may say – I say 'I', in quotes, because I sup-pose myself in this saying (ce dire), of which nevertheless there is the fact that it is in my voice – whatever I may say is going to give rise to two aspects: a good and a bad. This is precisely because people attribute it to me wanting the Imaginary to be excrement, muck, a bad thing, and that what is supposed to be good is the Symbolic. Here I am again then formulating an ethics. It is the misunderstanding of this that I want to dissipate because this year I am taking you forward from this structure of the knot, in which I put the emphasis on the following: that it is from the three that the Real is introduced into it.

All of this does not ~~prevent~~ STOP this knot itself ~~is~~ BEING singular, if what I put forward the last time is true (inform yourselves among mathematicians), namely, that this so simple knot, ~~this knot of three~~, the algorithm, namely, what would allow there to be brought to it what the Symbolic culminates in, namely, the demonstration, the articulation in terms of truth, if we are reduced to affirming our failure with regard to this algorithm, our failure to establish it, to handle it. Hence the result that at least until further notice, these knots – these knots whose writing I was able to produce, I did it for you the last time, in more than one form – you are reduced, on the basis of this writing, to imagine it in space. It has even got to the point that if what I can make in the simplest form, these projected knots as I am going to show you, stem from the fact that here what I am drawing for you, is something that you can imagine. Namely, how this third buckle, by (152) establishing itself from a trajectory [that of?] these two independent knots, as you see, namely, imagine from these two independent knots, made by this triple knot, that I call the Borromean knot, this thing which thus represented can be imagined by you in space, you can see, just as well as any other way in which I might have written this knot – you can note that it also is a writing: namely, that by effacing one, I can calculate that the two others are free, I mean any one whatsoever. That what constitutes the Imaginary, in the way in which you can sense here that in the space they are held, that this itself is writing, because it is enough for you to efface one of them to be able to spot that the two others are free, on the simple condition that they cut one another in a particular way which for its part is nameable from the following: namely, that the above and the below form two couples, two matching couples from the fact that the two above follow one another, and that the two beneath are not on the same line. I mean that they succeed one another with respect to the two above, that there is a trick (tour) which means that, to demonstrate that two of these circles are free, it is enough that there should be two above which follow one another, then two below which come afterwards – I said: on the same line – I probably made an error earlier in saying that they are not on the same line. That was a slip.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

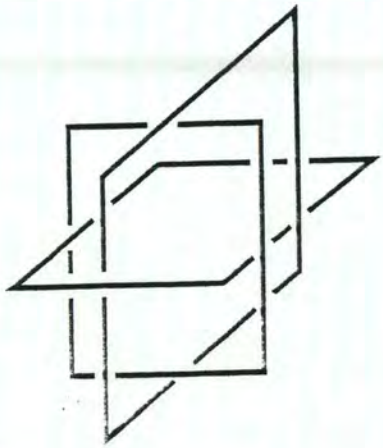

Fig. X-1

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The enigma of writing, of writing qua flattened out, is there: it is that moreover, by tracing out what is essentially of the order of the imaginable, namely, this projection into space, it is still a writing that I (153) am producing, namely, what can be stated, stated from the simplest algorithm here, namely, a succession.

This squeezing, namely, that by imagining it, you rediscover the idea of the norm, that the norm is imaginable once there is the support of an image, and that here we are always led to privilege one of them, an imagination of what makes a good shape; a curious relapse, why is the shape is described as 'good'? Because after all why should it not have been called simply what it is, namely, beautiful? We slip again, with the ancient kalos kagathos into this ambiguity, which for its part, proves at this date, at the date when that was how the Greeks expressed themselves, and that when all is said and done, we still find the title of nobility, the antiquity of the family, which, as you know, can always be found by the genealogist, for any imbecile whatsoever and also then for any imbecility whatsoever.

I do not see why I would prevent myself from imagining anything whatsoever, if this imagining is the right one, and that what I am putting forward, is that the right one can only be certified by being able to be demonstrated, ~~be demonstrated~~ in the Symbolic, which means entitling it Symbolic, by a certain dislocation of lalangue, in so far as it gives access to what? To the unconscious.

The Imaginary remains nonetheless what it is, namely, precious (d'or), and this is to be understood as, it sleeps (il dort). It sleeps, as I might say, au naturel. This in the measure that I do not especially awaken it, on the point of previous ethics. Too careful as I am of this. of this ethics, specifically, from which I would like to break, that precisely of the Good. But how can this be done if to wake up, is, on this occasion, to fall asleep again, if in the Imaginary, there is something that requires the subject to sleep?

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Dreaming (rêver) does not simply have, in lalangue, the lalangue that I make use of, this astonishing property of structuring the awakening (réveil). It also structures the revolution, and the revolution, if we understand it carefully, is stronger than the dream. Sometimes, it is falling asleep again, but in a cataleptic way. I have to manage to promote, to make there enter for you into your cogitations the fact that the Imaginary is the prevalence given to a need of the body, which is to sleep. It is not that the body, the body of the speaking being, needs more sleep than other animals - without our still being able to know moreover how to give a sign of it - than the other (154) animals, who, for their part, function with sleep. The function of sleep, of hypnosis, in the speaking being, only takes on this prevalence of which I spoke to identify it to the Imaginary itself, only takes on this prevalence from the effects of this nodality, of this nodality which only knots, only knots the Symbolic to the Imaginary – but in fact you could put here any other couple of the three – only knots them from the agency, the agency of the three in so far as I make it that of the Real.

If then I wake you up to what all the same our ancient kalos kagathos allows us to date the formula in Aristotle's Sovereign Good. When I did the Ethics of psychoanalysis, it was to the Nicomachean Ethics that I referred, referred to as a starting point. But I was careful on this point not to wake up, because if I wake people up to the manifest Imaginary of this Sovereign Good, what are they not going to imagine? Not that there is no Good, which would take them a little bit too far for their own well-being, but that there is no sovereign, as a result of which, the effective sovereign, the one who knows how to use the knot, finds his satisfaction because it is by this, because it is by this that sleep makes itself desired by those, enough by those, for it to encounter among them the complicity of the dream, namely, the desire that it will continue to sleep well. It is appropriate then that every statement should take care precisely in that it rêve-olutionises by maintaining the reign of what he wakes up to.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

A little parenthesis, since moreover this is not easy to comprehend as a motive of this discourse in which I find myself caught up, due to the fact of being its subject by my experience, the experience described as analytic.

Naturally, there are those who, in order that this experience should not put them up against it, do not expose themselves to it as such, but have all the same a suspicion of something that makes them itch. Those simply afflicted by the itch have not much imagination. When they smell something about the consequences of my discourse, they dig up some biographical feature, for example, the fact that I frequented the Surrealists and that my discourse bears the trace of it. It is all the same curious that I never collaborated with these aforesaid Surrealists. If I had said what I was thinking, namely, that with language, I mean, by making use of it, what they demolished, was the Imaginary, what would have happened! I would perhaps have woken them up. Woken them up with a start to the fact that I would have been found to have well and truly said, the fact is that between the one and the other of the (155) Imaginary and the Symbolic whose existence precisely they did not suspect, they re-established order.

Can I get you to understand that the fate of the speaking being, is that he cannot say, that he cannot even say: 'I slept well', namely, a deep sleep, 'I slept well between this and that time', for the simple reason that he knows nothing about it, his dreams framing this deep sleep having consisted in the desire to sleep. It is only on the outside, namely, when he is submitted to the observation of an electroencephalogram, for example, that it can be said, that effectively between such a time and such a time, the sleep was deep, namely, not inhabited by dreams, these dreams that I say are the tissue of the Imaginary, that they are the tissue of the Imaginary in so far as it is by being caught up in the knot, this Real, that his need, his principal need becomes this elective function: the function of sleeping.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Is this passage of the Imaginary through the sieve of the Symbolic enough to give, to state the first, that of the Imaginary, the stamp of 'Good', fit to serve. To serve what? I do not believe I am forcing things in asking this question, because it must indeed be said, no one has ever approached this question without giving rise from some angle to an idea of sovereignty, namely, of subordination. It is true that the Good can only be called sovereign. Do you not sense that here is where there is exposed something like an infirmity – I am appealing to those who, have a wide awake Imaginary, on condition that this does not support among them any hope, because it is altogether understood that I am not saying, for my part, anything of the kind, but that I am not saying the contrary either: namely, that the Good is sovereign. So that in our day my saying operates in the aforesaid Imaginary, certainly, but it is not how it attacks it. It simply says that the Imaginary, is that by which the body ceases to say anything worthwhile by being written differently than: 'I slept from such a time to such a time.'

All this changes nothing in the fact that it makes us itch. The truth makes us itch, even those - without believing in it too much – that I call the rabblement, because, when all is said and done, it is enough for the truth to itch for it to touch the true from some angle. Say anything at all, it will always touch the true. If it does not touch yours, why would it not touch mine? Here is the principle of the analytic discourse, and that is why I said somewhere – and to someone (156) who, faith, produced a very nice little book on transference, someone called Michel Neyraut – I told him that by beginning as he did by what he called 'counter-transference', if by this he means the way in which the truth touches the analyst himself, he is surely on the right path, since after all, this is where the true takes on its primary importance, and that, as I have pointed out for a long time, there is only one transference, that of the analyst, since after all he is the subject supposed to knowledge. He should clearly know what to stick to in this regard, in his relationship to knowledge, the point to which he is ruled by the unconscious structure that separates him, from this knowledge, which separates him from it even though he knows something about it, and I underline, as much by the test that he made of it in his own analysis as by what my saying can convey to him about it.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Does this mean, does this mean that transference is the entry of the truth? It is the entry of something which is the truth, but the truth of which precisely transference is the discovery, the truth of love.

This is worth noting. The knowledge of the unconscious, the knowledge of the unconscious was revealed, was constructed, this indeed is the value of this little book, it is its only value moreover, but this makes it worth buying, the truth of the unconscious, namely, the revelation of the unconscious as knowledge, this revelation of the unconscious was made in such a way that the truth of love, namely, the transference, only irrupted into it. It came secondarily. And people have never clearly known to bring it back in, except in the form of misunderstanding, of the unexpected thing, the thing we do not know what to do with, except to say that it must be reduced, indeed even liquidated. This remark just by itself justifies a little book knowing how to highlight it, because moreover one must be penetrated by the fact that from experience, from analytic experience, the transference is what it expels, it is what it cannot tolerate without getting very bad stomach pains from it.

If love passes here along this narrow defile of what causes it, and by that fact reveals what is involved in its veritable nature, here there is, is there not here something which makes it worthwhile repeating the question about it? Because it is difficult not to admit that love holds a place, even if up to now we have been reduced, as they say, to paying our respects to it. We discharge our obligations with regard to love.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

we pay our contribution to it, anyway, we try by every means, to allow it to distance itself, to hold itself satisfied.

How then tackle it? I promised at Rome, to give a lecture some day or other on love and logic. It was indeed in preparing it that I became (157) aware of the enormity, in short, of what my discourse supports. For it appeared to me that there was almost nothing in the past to account for it in the slightest way. That is how I notice that when all is said and done, it is not for nothing that Freud, in what I quoted the last time, namely, what is entitled the psychology that is described precisely as being that of the group and the analysis of the ego, while signalling that there he contrasts (confronte) identification and love, and this without the slightest success, to try to make it acceptable that love participates in any way whatsoever in identification.

Simply, it is indicated there that love is concerned with what I isolate under the title of the Name of the Father. It is quite strange. The name of the father to which I made the ironic allusion that you know earlier, namely, that it is supposed to be related to the antiquity of the family, what does that mean? On this what does Oedipus, the aforesaid Oedipus teach us?

Well then, I do not think that this can be tackled head on. That is why, in what I proposed to say to you today, this no doubt in terms of an experience that had tired me out, I would like to show you how this name is minted, this name, this name that, that in few cases, we do not see in the least repressed. It is not enough to bear this name, for the one in whom the Other is incarnated, the Other as such, the Other with a capital O, the one I am saying, by whom the Other is incarnated, is only incarnated moreover, incarnates the voice, namely, the mother. The mother speaks, the mother through whom the word is transmitted, the mother, it must be clearly said, is reduced, to expressing this name by a no, precisely, the no the father says, which introduces us to the foundation of negation – is it the same negation which creates a circle in a world, which by defining some essence, an essence of a universal nature, in other words what is supported by the all – precisely rejects, rejects what? – outside the all, led by this fact to the fiction of a complement to the all, and makes all men respond: by this fact [...] what is non-man, do you not feel that there is a gap from this non-logic to the nay-saying (dire-non)? To the propositional nay-saying, I would say, in order to support it. Namely, what I make function, in my schemas of sexual identification, namely, that not all men can acknowledge themselves in their essence, namely in their phallic enjoyment, to call it by its name, that not all men manage to ground themselves on this exception of something, the father, in so far as propositionally, he says no to this essence. The defile, the defile of (158) the signifier through which there passes this exercise of this something which is love, is very specifically this name of the father, this name of the father which is only no at the level of saying, and which is cashed in on by the voice of the mother in the nay-saying of a certain number of interdictions. This in the case, the fortunate case, the one in which the mother is willing indeed to make some nods of her little head.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

There is something whose incidence I would like to designate. Because it is an angle on the moment that we are living through in history. There is a history, even though it is not inevitably the one that we believed. What we are living through is very precisely the following: that curiously, the loss, the loss of what might be supported by the dimension of love, if it is indeed the one not that I am saying, I cannot say it, I cannot say it, for this name of the father, there is substituted a function which is none other than that of naming-to (nommer-à). To be named to something is what is highlighted in an order which is effectively being substituted for the name of the father. Except for the fact that here, the mother all by herself is generally enough to designate its project, to trace it out, to indicate its path.

If I defined the desire of man as being the desire of the Other, it is indeed here that this is designated in experience. And even in the cases where, like that, by chance, in fact, it happens that by an accident she is no longer there, it is all the same she, she, her desire, that designates to her kid this project that is expressed by the naming-to. To be named-to something, is what, for us, at this point of history we are at, is found to be preferred – I mean effectively preferred, to go before – what is involved in the name of the father.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Very devastating. This new order means that we have a return of the Name of the father in the Real (+ not symbolic in the sense here of society. It's mad.

It is quite strange that here, the social should take on the prevalence of a knot, and which literally makes up the fabric of so many existences, the fact is that it holds this power of naming-to to the point that after all, there is restored an order, an order which is an iron one. What is this trace, this trace designated, as return of the name of the father in the Real, in so far precisely as the name of the father is verworfen, foreclosed, rejected, and in this capacity it designates whether this foreclosure which I said is the principle of madness itself, is this naming-to not, is this naming-to not the sign of a catastrophic degeneration?

To explain it, I must give its full meaning to what I designated by the term that I write as 'ek-sistence'. If something ek-sists with respect to something, it is very precisely because of not being coupled to it, of (159) being thirded (troisé), if you will allow me this neologism. The form of the knot, since moreover the knot is nothing other than this form, namely, imaginable, is it not here that the imaginable is designated as not being able to be thought? Thought, namely, put in order, rooted not simply in the impossible, but in the impossible in so far as it is demonstrated as such; nothing is demonstrated by this knot, but simply shown. To show what is meant by ek-sistence, of a ring of string to make myself understood, a ring of string in so far as it is only on it that there reposes the knot of what otherwise remains mad. Explanation having no grip on the inexplicable.

Is it not here that we ought to search in what possesses us, possesses us as subjects, which is nothing other than a desire, and what is more the desire of the Other, a desire by which we are alienated from the start, is it not here that there ought to be brought to bear - namely, in this phenomenon, this apparition to our experience, that as subjects, it is not simply not having any essence, except to be squeezed, squeezés in a certain knot, but moreover as subject, supposed subject of what squeezes this knot – as subject it is not simply essence that we lack, namely, being, it is besides that there ek-sists for us everything that constitutes a knot. But to say that all of this ek-sists us does not mean for all that that we exist in it in any way. It is in the knot itself that there resides everything that for us is only when all is said and done pathetic, which Kant rejected as if anticipating our ethics, namely, by the fact that nothing of what we suffer can in any way direct us towards our good. This indeed is something that must be understood some way or other as a prodrome, as a prodrome I dare say, and that is why I once wrote Kant with Sade, as a prodrome of what effectively constitutes our passion, namely, that we no longer have any kind, any kind of idea of what might trace out for us the path of the Good.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

At the moment that that path peters our, at the moment when Kant made the gesture of this slender recourse, of this tiny link with what Aristotle had established as the order of the world, what are the arguments that he puts forward? To make the dimension of duty sensed, what does he put forward? What he puts forward is supposedly that a lover close to obtaining success in his enjoyment would look twice at it if, in front of the hall door, a gibbet was already erected from which he was going to be hanged; and to oppose to this (160) that of course no one would ever risk such a thing - while it is on the contrary quite obvious that anyone at all is capable of doing it, simply if he wants to. So then what does he oppose to that? It is that – as if this were a sign of a superiority – it is that summoned by the tyrant to defame another subject, anyone would look twice at it before bearing false witness.

To which in my text, Kant with Sade – because I wrote very good things, things that no one understood anything about, of course, but that is simply because they are deaf – to which I opposed: but what if to put into the tyrant's hand the one the tyrant wants to get at, not a false but a true testimony sufficed! Which is enough of course to demolish all the systems because the truth, the truth is always for the tyrant. It is always true that one cannot tolerate the tyrant, and as a consequence, the tyrant always has reasons to get at the person he wants. What he needs is a semblance of truth. The angle, the angle from which Kant here makes the split, this angle is not the right one. Hence there results the formula which is separated out simply from these two terms between which Kant brings about the re-entry of practical reason, namely, moral duty, which is that the essence, the essence of what is at stake in the Good, is that the body forces its enjoyment, namely, curbs it and this simply in the name of death, of one's own death or the death of someone else, on this occasion, the one that he will imagine sparing. But once this formula is circumscribed, does not this reduce the Good to its correct import, is it not the case that outside these terms, these terms of which there are made the three, the three of the Real, in so far as the Real itself is three, namely, enjoyment, the body, death, in so far as they are knotted, as they are knotted only, of course, by this unverifiable impasse of sex, it is there indeed that there is conveyed the import (la porte) of this newly arrived discourse as regards which it is not for nothing that something should have necessitated it, the analytic discourse whose relay you will allow me to take up again on the 9th May, the 9th May the second Tuesday and not after that the third, but the fourth, which will not be then the one after Easter, the 16th April but that of the 23rd…….

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The 9th April, not May, April!

http://www.lacaninireland.com

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 11: Tuesday 9 April 1974

Good, today... - what's happening? – today for reasons, like that, of personal choice, I am going to start from a question, a question of course that I ask myself, believing at least that the answer is there – that's an old refrain, as you know – and this question is: what, what has Lacan here present, invented? You know that I put forward this word 'invented', I made it recognised by you, as I might say, apparently at least, by linking it to what necessitates it, namely, knowledge. Knowledge is invented, I said, which the history of science seems to me to testify to rather well. So then, what did I for my part, invent? This does not at all mean that, that I form part of the history of science, since my starting point is different, being that of analytic experience.

What? I will answer, because it is understood that I already have the answer – I will answer, like that, to get things going: the little o-object. It is obvious that I cannot add, the little o-object, for example. It, it can be touched immediately. It is not among Others that I invented the o-object, among Other things, as some people imagine. Because the o-object is solidary, is solidary at least at the (162) start, with the graph. You know perhaps what it is, I am not even sure, but anyway it is something which has a shape like that, with two things that go across, there, and then in addition, that: I say that, because at the point that we are at it is necessary. From the graph, then, of which it is a determination and specifically at the point at which the question is asked: what is desire, if desire is the desire of the Other? Anyway, that is where it emerged. That does not mean of course, that it is not elsewhere. It is also elsewhere, it is also in the schema called the schema L and then it is also in the quadripodes of the discourses to which I believed I should give a place, in fact, some years ago. And then, who knows, perhaps there is a question of it being put at the place of the x in these already celebrated quantifying formulae that today I will call like that because when I woke up this morning I wrote some notes, that I will call of sexuation. And while I was at it, in taking these notes, the following came to me, something which, of which it is curious anyway that I never hear echoes, is that not so. I obviously, even, even in Rome where I made a little trip, I heard tell of these quantifying formulae, which proves already rather widely diffused. And I was asked questions, namely, whether these quantifying formulae, because there are four of them, might well be situated somewhere in a way that, that would correspond with the formulae of the four discourses. This is... this is not necessarily unfruitful, because what I am evoking, anyway, is that the small o comes at the place of the x in the formulae that I call 'quantifying formulae of sexuation'. Do I need to write them again, it would surely not be useless. I am recall that those marked by the are on the left, and are continued by four other formulae which are like that in a square, good.

Fig. XI-1

http://www.lacaninireland.com

$$\begin{array}{ccc} \exists x \,.\, \overline{\Phi x} & \text{——} & \overline{\exists x} \,.\, \overline{\Phi x} \\ \downarrow & & \downarrow \\ \forall x \,.\, \Phi x & \text{——} & \overline{\forall x} \,.\, \Phi x \end{array}$$

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Something might have come back to me about it if, of course, it did not require a little bit of trouble; but if there is something that I would like to point out to you, it is that these formulae described as quantifiers of sexuation could be expressed differently, and this would (163) perhaps allow progress to be made. I am going to tell you what is implied by it. It could be put like this: 'the sexed being is only authorised by him/herself'. It is in this sense that, that there is a choice, I mean that what one limits oneself to, in short, to classify them as male or female, to be officially registered, in short, this, this does not prevent there being a choice. This is something, of course, that everyone knows. He is only authorised by himself – and I would add: 'and by some others'.

What is the status of these others, on this occasion, if not that it is somewhere, I am not saying in the locus of the Other, it is somewhere that must be clearly situated, known, where my quantifying formulae of sexuation are written. Because I would even say that I am going rather far: if I had not written them, would it be just as true that the sexed being is only authorised by himself?

This appears difficult to dispute, given that people had not waited for me to write these formulae, these quantifying formulae of sexuation in order for there to be, in short, a serious handful of people who are labelled ... as is done, in short, who are labelled with homosexuality. Neither on one side nor on the other. It would then be undeniably true, except for the fact that, a curious thing, in fact, it seems, that even though this has been widespread from all time, that people have spent some time precisely in labelling with these terms that, as chance would have it are wrong, by this term of 'homosexual', for example. It is curious that, that I can say they are wrong. In fact, it is altogether wrong as a nomination. Well before, in short, people did not have these terms, in short, this was called, for example - anyway for one side - and the fact that they were distinguished in a serious fashion even to the extent of giving them a different place on the geographical map is already sufficiently indicative. These were called, for one side, sodomites: Sumus enim sodomitae, wrote a prince who, I believe, was himself from the Condé family: Sumus enim sodomitae igne tantum perituri. He said that to reassure his companions when they were crossing a river: nothing can happen to us, we are not going to be drowned since we are igne tantum perituri, we must perish only in fire, so we are safe. Good.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

In the meantime, might it not have come into someone's head in my School that this balances my saying that the analyst is only authorised by himself? That does not mean for all that that he is all alone in (164) deciding it, as I have just pointed out to you, pointed out to you as regards what is involved in the sexed being. I will even say more, indeed, what I wrote in these formulae implies at least that, to make a man, there must at least be written somewhere the quantifying formula that I have just written there, and that there exists – it is a writing – that there exists, this x which says that it is not true, that it is not true, as a foundation for an exception (comme fondement d'exception), that it is not true that Φx namely, that what supports in writing the propositional function in which we can write what is involved in this choice of the sexed being, that it is not true that it holds up, that it always holds up, that even the condition for the choice to be made in a positive way, namely, that there should be something of the man, is that castration should be somewhere.

I am saying then that the analyst is authorised only by himself, which is something, in a word, so crushing, in a word, to think about, that if the analyst is something in the mode of... being named-to, to analysis, as I might say, to analysis in this form which means, well, an associate member, a titular member, some member or Other; everything that I tried like that with which I tried to make people laugh in a little article by marking the stages of what I called the Sufficiencies, the little Slippers, indeed the Blessed, to be named Blessed, is this not something that in itself might make you laugh a little? This made people laugh, but, but not very much, because at that time I wrote that, it only interested specialists, who for their part, scarcely laughed, of course, because they were in the system.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

But this would imply all the same that this formula that I produced in an altogether pivotal Proposal, that this formula should receive the few complements, the few complements implied by the fact that if, assuredly one cannot be named to psychoanalysis, that does not mean that just anyone can enter into it like a rhinoceros into a china shop, namely, without taking account of the following. Which is that it must indeed be inscribed, that there must be inscribed what I expect from it being inscribed, because it is not like when I invent, like when I invent what presides over the choice of the sexed being. There, I cannot invent, I cannot invent for a reason that, that a group, that a group is Real. And even it is a Real that I cannot invent because of this fact that it is a Real that has newly emerged. Because as long as (165) there was not this analytic discourse, there was nothing of the psychoanalyst (du psychanalyste). This is why I announced that there is something of the psychoanalyst, of which for example, I, I was the testimony, but that does not mean for all that that there is a psychoanalyst. It is a properly hysterical perspective to say that there is at least one, for example; I am not at all on this slope, not being by nature in the position of the hysteric. I am not Socrates, for example. Where I situate myself in fact, we will eventually see, well, why not, but for today I do not need to say any more about it.

So there are things, there are things at the level of what emerges in terms of Real, in the form of a different functioning, of what? Of what is involved when all is said and done about letters, because letters, what is at stake is letters, this is what I wanted to put forward in my quadripodes. There can be a certain way in which a certain bond is established in a group, there can be something new and which only consists in a certain redistribution of letters. That I can invent.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

But the way of pursuing this new arrangement of letters in order to pinpoint in it a discourse, pre-supposes, pre-supposes a sequence, precisely, and why not, as I was asked, asked in Rome, when I was asked the question about what was the link between the four quantifying formulae of sexuation, what was their link with the formula – this is what was at stake – the formula of analytic discourse as I thought I should put it forward at first. To connect them up, this would be to give this development which would be made in a school, in mine, why not, with a little bit of luck, that in a school there would be articulated this function from which the choice of the analyst, the choice of being so, can only depend. Because while only being authorised by himself, he cannot but be authorised also by others. I am reducing myself to this minimum because, precisely, I am waiting for something to be invented, to be invented in the group without slipping into the old rut, the one from which it results that by reason of old habits, against which after all we are so little protected against that these are the very ones that form the basis of the discourse described as university, that one is named-to, to a title.

This pushes us, pushes us because I chose to be pushed there – but pushes you at the same time since you listen to me – to try to specify the link there is between the invention of knowledge and what is (166) written. It is quite clear that there is a link. It is a matter, of specifying this link. In Other words, to notice, to ask the question about what one can put one's finger on: where is there situated, where is writing situated? This indeed is what I have been trying to give you an indication of for a long time, by substituting, which I did very early, in sub-slipping as I might say, into the statement that I attempted to give about ... the Function and field of speech and language. I did not all the same entitle a certain article, like that, a pivotal writing, I did not entitle it The agency of the signifier in the unconscious, I entitled it The agency of the letter and it is around letters, as you remember perhaps a bit, in short, like that, in the mist, that S, S_1, S_2, etc. over s, over small s. Anyway, it is all that, all this implying a certain relation that I pinpointed as being that of metaphor, another one of metonymy, it is around that that I made turn a certain number of proposals that can be considered as a forcing, I mean as giving a certain agency not of the letter, but of linguistics. But I would point out to you that linguistics does not proceed any differently than the other sciences, namely, that it only proceeds from the agency of the letter, hence the agency of linguistics, passing by the letter, in short, to propose some remarks to those who practice analysis.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

This does not prevent of course, because I believe that with time, well, is that not so, there are those Surrealists, is that not so, that I am pestered with. Anyway, when people want to write articles about me, these Surrealists, I knew one who still survived at that time, Tristan Tzara. I gave the Agency of the letter to him and of course, it meant nothing to him. Why? Because this indeed shows what I pointed out to you – you perhaps heard it – at my last seminar. What I pointed out to you, namely, that when all is said and done, with all this row, is that not so, they did not really know what they were at.

1896-1963. French writer. B. Romania, formulated the DADAIST MOVEMENT INITIALLY AS A PROTEST STATEMENT. HE MOVES TO PARIS IN 1921 & WORKS WITH ANDRÉ BRETON.

But that, that stemmed from the fact that, in short, they were poets, and as Plato pointed out a long time ago, it is not at all inevitable, it is even preferable that the poet does not know what he is doing. This is even, this is even what gives, this is what gives to what he does its primordial value. And before which one can truly, one can truly only bow one's head. I mean that if one can make a certain analogy, anyway a certain homology, let us say – but with for the word homo (167)the approximate meaning that I underlined for you earlier – a certain homology between, between what one has in terms of works, works of art, and what we pick up in analytic experience.

Interpreting art, is something that Freud always ruled out, always rejected. What is called, what is called the psychoanalysis of art, well, is still more to be ruled out than the famous psychology of art which is PRIMORDIAL: ORIGINAL; OF, PERTAINING TO, EXISTING FROM THE BEGINNING.

HOMOLOGY: IS A SPECIFIC EXPLANATION OF SIMILARITY OF FORM SEEN IN THE BIOLOGICAL WORLD.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

a delusional notion. With art, we have to learn a lesson (prendre de la graine). Learn a lesson, learn a lesson for something else, namely,, for us, to make of it this third which is not yet classified, to make of it this something which, which leans on science on the one hand, which learns a lesson from of art on the other. And I will even go further, it can only be done in the expectation of having at the end to fail to find the answer.

What analytic experience testifies for us, is that we are dealing, I would say with untameable truths, with untameable truths that we... that we nevertheless have to bear witness to, as such. Are these the only ones that can allow us to define how, in science, what is involved in knowledge, in unconscious knowledge, how, in science, this may constitute what I will call an edge, namely, that by which science itself, as such, is, for want of a better word, I will say structured. If what I am putting forward to you corresponds to something, I mean that you waited long enough on me before I stated that there was no sexual relationship, that is what this means.

There again I underline that this does not go so far as to say that the little Real that we know, which is reduced to number, that the little Real that we know, if it is so little, this stems from the famous hole, to the fact that in the centre there is this topos, that one can only plug; that one can only plug with what? With the Imaginary. But that does not mean for all that that the little o-object, belongs to the Imaginary. It is a fact that it can be imagined, it can be imagined in whatever way one can, namely, with what is sucked, with what is shitted, with what constitutes the look, what tames the look, and then, and then the voice. It is I who have added to the list the two last in number, in any case certainly the last one in so far as it is imagined.

But the fact that it is imagined removes nothing from the import of the little o-object as topos, I mean, as what is squeezed to give an image of it. I have done nothing more to give an image of it which has only

TOPOS = A TYPE OF CATEGORY WHICH ALLOWS THE FORMATION OF ALL OF MATHEMATICS INSIDE OF IT.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

one advantage, which is that it is a written image, the one that I gave (168) in the Borromean knot. It is here that the little o-object is knotted. There are therefore two faces, here, to the little o-object, a face that is as Real as possible, simply by the fact that it is written. You see what I am trying to do, there, I am trying to situate writing for you, and it goes a long way to put it forward, as this edge of the Real, situated on this edge.

In order, because I must, in fact give you different fodder than this abstraction, as you would say, because precisely what is tangible here, is that this is not an abstraction. It is as hard as iron. It is not because a thing is not succulent that it is abstract. It is obviously amusing that I experience here the need, for you, the desire of man being the desire of the Other, that I experience here the need for you to have a little funny interlude, to point out to you that it is amusing, in fact, a thing, a little anecdotal sample that I am going to give you, is that not so. It is rather curious, for example, that knowledge, in so far as it is invented, happens like that, as I am going to tell you. When Galileo noticed, in short, some of his inventions, in fact, which completely upset knowledge about the celestial Real, he took care to note it, in the following form. He sent to some people a certain number of Latin couplets, no more, two lines, in which, through which he could in a way fix the date, and by taking a certain number of letters from three to three, for example, demonstrate that he had invented the thing that was impossible to swallow at his time, that he had already invented at such a date. I mean that it was indisputably inscribed by the very way in which he had made these couplets, whose content moreover does not matter, given that of course, one can in fact write anything whatsoever in this style, this does not matter to anyone, all that interests someone, when one receives a letter from a personage like Galileo, it is not what he wanted to say, it is that one has an autograph. And the way under what, in a way, we will call the apparent stupidity of these two lines, there was inscribed, in short, the date, the date of a particular thing, the thing that was at stake, namely, about the sky and the principle of the journeyings that it offers to our sight, is this not something that illustrates in a way that is certainly only amusing, but you have many other illustrations of it, since as I did it, I insisted with leaden feet, it is obvious that if logic is what I am saying, the science of the Real, and not something else, if precisely what is proper to logic, and qua science of the Real, is precisely to make of the truth (169) only an empty value, namely, exactly nothing at all, something about which you simply write that non-T is F, namely, that it is false, namely, that it is a way of treating the truth that has no kind of relationship with what we commonly call truth. This science of the Real, logic, cleared its way, could only clear its way from the moment when people had been able to sufficiently empty words of their meaning to substitute letters purely and simply for them. The letter is in a way inherent to this passage to the Real. Here it is amusing to be able to say that the writing was there to prove, to prove what, to prove the date of the invention. But in proving the date of the invention, it proves also the invention itself, the invention, is the written, and what we require in a mathematical logic, is very precisely the fact that nothing in the demonstration reposes on anything but a certain way of imposing on oneself a combinatorial perfectly determined by an interplay of letters.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Here I ask the question: is the anagram then, since this is what is at stake in the verses of Galileo, the anagram about which our dear Saussure racked his brains in private, is the anagram not simply here to prove that this is the nature of writing, even when people have not yet the idea of there being anything to prove. Is the anagram at the level that Saussure questioned himself about it, namely, at the level where in verses described as Saturnian, one can rediscover precisely the number of letters required to designate a god without there being anything in the heavens to help us to know whether it was the intention of the poet, to have riddled what he had to write, since the writing, already functioned, to have riddled it with a certain number of letters that ground the name of a god.

ANAGRAM = A WORD OR PHRASE FORMED BY TRANSPOSING THE LETTERS OF ANOTHER WORD OR PHRASE

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Can we not sense here that even when it is not supported by anything, by nothing to which we can bear witness, we must admit that it is the writing that supports it, that we have here, that we have here a sort of entity of the written. How will we express entity (entité), are we going to push it towards the side of being or towards the side of a particular being (l'étant), is it ousia or is it on? I think it would be better to abandon this direction.

And I am proposing something to you which is of interest because it goes in the same direction as what I have previously traced out; as was remarked, like that, by an old sage, at the time when people knew all the same already how to write what was required by language, is that not so, a road that ascends is the same as the one that descends, so (170) then, I could propose to you as a formula of writing, the knowledge supposed subject (le savoir supposé sujet). That there is something which attests that such a formula may have its function, it is in any case the best that I can find today to situate for you the function of writing, for this reason and that... to what our question about the entity of writing ousia or on, introduced us to, to situate the fact that it is defined above all by a certain function, by the place of the edge.

There you are. It is quite evident is it not, that as – I underlined it like that, incidentally because I spend my time having it out with philosophers – it is quite evident that it is my kind of materialism. Yeah. I scarcely say it, I scarcely say it because I don't give a damn about materialism. This certain materialism, like that, which is always there, which consists in kissing the ass of matter in the name of the fact that it is supposed to be something more Real than the form, in short, that, of course, has already been cursed. It has been cursed starting from historical materialism which is strictly nothing Other than a resurgence of Bossuet's Providence. Yeah. In any case, this material of the written, in short, of the supposed written, like that,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

OF THE DIVINE RIGHT WAS FINALLY OVERTHROWN IN THE FRENCH REVOLUTION

http://www.lacaninireland.com

because it is the little new, in short, would deserve to have its dugs pulled a little, in order to come back to our fundamental little o-object. Let it be exploited a little, at least for a while, huh.

For this exploitation to become possible is that not so, it is… that means precisely, if you translate modality as I have taught you, that means that it ceases to be written, and not at all the contrary. This must cease to be written for it to prove something. Namely, that it does not cease starting up again. But precisely here is this scansion of which I am trying, of which I am trying to give you an idea. It is a scansion which is curious. Because the pulsation that it implies, namely, what everyone knows, only the possible can be necessary, namely, what I situate by the 'ceasing to be written', is precisely something which does not cease to be repeated, which is here something that we have been clearly able to touch, is that not so, in this function of repetition produced with such genius by Freud.

This is a fundamental thing and I am trying to approach it here for you, to approach it in this sense that this establishes a time two (un temps deux). Far from making time linear, this establishes a time two as altogether fundamental. And I would even go as far as to ask the (171) question of those who might be able to say a little bit about it to me, and I would be very amused if someone were to reply to me, on this point. The fact is that in taking a set of dimensions, set not supposing anything cardinal, but let us say a finite set – how determine on this set of dimensions, why not imagine the dimension as I define it, namely, there where the saying is situated, how arrive at formulating the fact that if we start from the idea that the function of two, two dimensions are situated there on one side of the surface, but from 'to cease' and 'to non-cease' as I have just said to you, is there not here something which gives very exactly the import of writing? In Other words, on a set of dimensions, that we will not determine in advance, how find what acts as surface-function and which at the same time according to my saying would make a time-function?

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Which is in any case very close, very close to the knot that I am suggesting to you.

I formerly risked producing something called Logical time. And it is curious that I put a second time in it, the time to comprehend, the time to comprehend what is there to be comprehended. It is the only thing in this form that I made as refined as possible, it was the only thing that had to be comprehended. The fact is that the time to comprehend does not work if there are not three. Namely, what I called the instant of seeing, then the thing to comprehend, and then the moment to conclude. To conclude, as I believe I sufficiently suggested in this article, to conclude wrongly. Otherwise, if there are not these three, there is nothing to justify what manifests with clarity the two, namely, this scansion that I described, which is that of an arrest, of a ceasing and of a re-departure. Thanks to which it is obvious that these are the only convincing movements, which are valid as proof, is that not so, when the three characters for whom as you know it is a matter of them getting out of prison, as it happens, it is only subsequent to these scansions that they can make them function as proof, namely, do what they are asked, not simply that they should have got out, which is a quite natural movement, but what they are identical to, namely, each one strictly to the two Others. They have the same, the same black or white ring on their backs. They cannot, which is what is asked of them, give an explanation for it unless from the fact that they have all performed the same ballet to get out. That is the only explanation.

It is a way which is altogether, well, altogether charming, is that not so, to explain something which is furthermore quite obvious. The fact is that this does not involve any kind of identity of nature among them, that the illustration, the commentary in the margin that I give of it, namely, that it is like that that people imagine some universality or other. There is no trace of it in this apologue – since we are dealing with an apologue – there is no trace in this apologue of the slightest relationship between the prisoners since precisely this is what is prohibited to them: namely, to communicate among themselves. They are simply, identifying themselves or distinguishing themselves by having or not having a white disk or a black disc on their backs. I apologise for being so long for people who have never opened the Ecrits, there must be many here in this situation, of course. To define then what in a set of dimensions, constitutes at the same time surface and time, this is what I am proposing to you as a follow up, good God, as a follow-up, to what I propose to you about logical time in my Ecrits. Good. Yeah.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Am I, am I a bad judge when I answer that the little o-object was perhaps what I had invented... Perhaps, it is surely, in any case... no one invented it apart from me. Good. But I may be all the same be a bad judge. And that is why it is not unrelated to ousia like that, which I used like a rag earlier. The fact is that if my schema of analytic discourse is true, I must become this little o-object, this is what I have to make come to pass. It is not the 'I', in my case, namely, when I am in front of you. It is the small o. Yes, this place of no one (personne) is of course, as the name of person indicates, a place of rank to be held as semblance, is that not so. It is a matter of holding the role of the analyst. And this indeed is why I put forward a certain something, that is what is asked by the question which is always the same: 'Can I be it?' To authorise myself, might just about pass, huh, but to be it is a different matter. It is here that obviously, there is forged what I stated with the verb désêtre. I 'un-am' the analyst; the little o-object has no being.

I insisted sufficiently, is that not so, I insisted sufficiently at one time on something that psychoanalysts exult in, is that not so, namely, this face, this support, this pathetic aspect of the little o-object when it takes on the form of a waste scrap. I insisted a lot on it, one day, I turned up like that at Bordeaux, and I explained to them that civilisation was a sewer, that there is strictly no other kind of trace of (173) it, and that it is all the same something quite strange, that we

SEMBLANCE:- 1. AN OUTWARD OR TOKEN APPEARANCE. "FOOLISH MEN MISTAKE TRANSITORY SEMBLANCE FOR ETERNAL FACT" (THOMAS CARLYLE).
2. A REPRESENTATION, A COPY.
3. THE BARREST TRACE, A HISTORY. NOT A SEMBLANCE OF TRUTH TO THE STORY.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

should turn our minds to it. Because as far as we know all the other animals that exist do not encumber the earth with their waste, while it is altogether singular that, that everything that man makes, always ends up as waste, is that not so. A single thing which preserves a little dignity, are the ruins, but get out of your shells, all the same, a little bit and you will notice the number of broken-down automobiles that are piled up in places, and you will notice that wherever you put your foot, you put your foot on something that – where people have tried in every possible way to recompress old rubbish in order not to be submerged by it, literally.

Yes... it is a whole business that! It is a whole business of organisation, is that not so. Of imaginary organisation, as one might say. To simulate, to simulate with the crowd, because it is the other face of what I earlier called the choice, the group, simulate with the crowd – and you always have to deal with that when you are assembling a group – to simulate with the crowd something that functions like a body. Yeah. Good. But anyway, this little o-object, all the same what is that... or what is the face of what interests you, not when I write it – because I write it as little as I can, I have too much of a sense of my responsibilities for me not to leave this writing its chance, its chance of ceasing, in order that, if it does not cease, it proves itself. But there, there when I am chatting, what interests you, about this little o of which I speak? There is something that may indeed come into my head, because it is like all the rest, huh, I invent as regards what is involved in knowledge, but as regards what is involved in the truth, I do not invent: the truth is brought to me, I have whole buckets of it.

And then, there is a chap who came to see me, I cannot say how long ago, and then I would not want him to recognise himself, he came to tell me that what he needed, was my voice! It was not for a vote (voix), huh, it was the voice. No, but it is a very serious question, for me, is it the voice – because it is quite obvious that there is something

http://www.lacaninireland.com

here. It is not a question of timbre, if the little o-object is what I am saying, we must not confuse the phonetic and the phoneme. The voice is defined by something Other than what is inscribed on a disc, and on a magnetic tape the way so many people entertain themselves, it is nothing to do with that. The voice can be strictly the scansion with which I tell you all of that. I am persuaded that there is here a source (174) of your gathering in this enclosure, a gathering that today is decent. There is something, like that, that is linked to… to the time that I spend in saying things, since the little o-object is linked to this dimension of time. It is completely distinct to what is involved in the saying.

The saying, is not the voice. And to be loved, since you love me, of course, to be loved for the one or for the other, is not at all the same, huh. The saying that the little o-object involves, in short, is all sorts of things that I even set down in writing, huh, Subversion of the subject and dialectic of desire, and so on and so forth. That is on a completely different path, is that not so, than the exhibition of the voice, namely, like that, of a pathetic testimony, make no mistake, is that not so, of it being squeezed in this whole affair.

On the other hand, the saying, the saying is not writing either. Yeah. Saying is not writing either, it is not enough to have something to say to be able, to be able to know a lot about it. It is a distinction, is that not so, that I would very much like for you to get into your little heads. Yes. Even about what is involved in the truth, is that not so, there is a place for knowledge. There is a place for knowledge in so far as there is question, at every instant, of inventing, is that not so, to reply to the tissue of contradictions of the truth, huh. And this indeed is why the first step to be taken, is to follow it in all its affectations. It is not simply a matter of the fact, is that not so, that the lie forms part of it. I insisted enough on that, is that not so. And it must be seen, in fact, what it is capable of making you do.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The truth, my dear friends, leads to religion. You never understand anything about what I tell you about this thing because I seem to be sneering, is that not so, when I speak about it, about religion. But I am not sneering, I am grinding my teeth! It leads to religion, and to the true, as I already said. And since it is the true, that is precisely why there would be something to be got out of it for knowledge. Namely, to invent. Well then you are not equipped to do it, huh! And it is not tomorrow that you will get to the end of it. Because into all of that you put absolutely no seriousness. It is obvious, is it not, that those who invented the most beautiful things about knowledge – I name them, huh, it is an honours list, huh: Pascal, Leibniz, and Newton! Newton, in fact, do you Realise what Newton wrote about the Book of Daniel and about the Apocalypse of St. John! You have never looked at that, of course, because it is not in paperback, but I (175) regret it. I do not reproach you either for not having gone looking for it. There should be a paperback of that and one well translated. He had a cast-iron belief in religion. And the two Others... it seems to me that it is difficult to renounce what is obvious, huh. They talk of nothing but that. It is even the only thing that interests them.

When one... I must... when I think that I have to go looking in the middle of, a mountain of 'addresses to the curé of Paris', what Pascal wrote about the cycloid, for example, anyway which is the very type, is it not, of the step which meant that people invented, nothing less than integral calculus – do you imagine that integral calculus is nothing other than writing? The parabola from which it started - the parabola – I am talking about the parabola that is traced out, the parabola and then any Other lunule or thingamajig or yoke, whatsoever, in short, these are written things, it is only there that we touch what is involved in the Real. Good, these three were passionate about the true. The true about the true.

Cycloid: 1. RESEMBLING A CIRCLE

*LUNULE: A CRESCENT-SHAPED MARK OR ORGAN, -'HALF-MOON' OF FINGER-NAIL

MISSING Pages 18, 19, 20

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The path to take is to start up again. If you do not question in an appropriate way the true of the Trinity, well you are made, you are made like rats, like the rat man. It is obvious, it is obvious all the same that religion, anyway has its limits, all the same! Anyway, I have just come back from Italy, you understand, so I am, so I am swamped by bodies that stream down all the walls, in a word, there is nothing but that. There are enough pictures to stifle you, moreover it is altogether magnificent, but I do not see why I should say proh pudor! before this streaming of bodies. But anyway, this gives all the same its limit to the thing, it shows all the same that one is in the truth, and that one remains there, that one does not get out of it. What is required, what would be at stake, is to get out of the truth, there, indeed I do not see any other way except inventing, and to invent in the right way, in the analytic way, is that not so, it is to start up again, to go along entirely in this direction is that not so. Yes. Yes.

There is only one thing which is all the same quite annoying and on which I would like to end if you, if you don't mind. It is not by chance that it is among my pupils, a woman, she is made like that, she, good, well, produced like that a whole lot of chattering about the desire to know; it is certainly not from me that she got it...I never even, even suggested such a thing, huh. Yes. There is no shadow of a desire to know, apart from something about which I question myself (176) and about which I have nothing to tell you because I don't know anything about it, which is that there is mathematics, which cannot proceed, it seems to me, unless it is an effect of the unconscious, which do not produce the slightest desire, but it is all the same curious to see that mathematics continues. People imagine that there are among people of your kind, in short, namely, that the mathematicians, are – I think that there are perhaps not two of them in this room, I am talking about the true, the Really bitten: there is not the slightest desire to know. There is not the slightest desire to invent knowledge.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Anyway, there is a desire to know attributed to the Other. One sees that. That is how there arises, anyway, the manifestations of complacency that the child gives in his 'whys'. Everything that he poses as a question, in fact, is designed to satisfy what he supposes the Other would want him to ask. Not all children, huh! Not all children, because I am going to do a little thing for you, I must from time to time give you a little something to get your teeth into, this thing attributed to the Other, is very often accompanied by a 'very little for me' (très peu pour moi). And 'very little for me', a 'very little for me' of which the child gives proof in this form to which I am sure you have not dreamt, but, as you know, I also learn something every day. I educate myself, I educate myself of course along the line of what I like, along the line of what I invent inevitably, but anyway I do not lack food. And if you knew as I know, is that not so, the degree to which what I already illustrated about anorexia nervosa by making this action state, for an action states: 'I eat nothing'.

But why do I eat nothing? That is something you have not asked yourselves, huh, but if you ask the anorexics, or rather if you let them come, I for my part have asked it, I have asked it because I was already in my little vein of invention on this subject, I asked it: so then what did they answer me? It is very clear: she was so preoccupied about knowing whether she was eating, that in order to discourage this knowledge, this knowledge like that, the desire to know, is that not so, just for that the kid would have let herself die of hunger! That is very important. This dimension of knowledge is very important, and also to notice that, that it is not desire that presides over knowledge, it is horror.

(177) Yes. You will tell me that, you will tell me that there are people who work, and who work like that to get the agrégation. But that, you understand, has nothing to do with the desire to know. That is a desire which is, which is as I might say, as always the desire of the Other, and I already explained that it is enough for the Other to desire for, of course, one to fall under its influence. The desire of man is the desire of the Other but the circuit is more or less complicated. There is the desire of the Other, which, which, which is communicated on an equal footing because it is already at sea in the Other, the subject.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

There is the hysteric. The hysteric, is another affair, huh, I will have to take up my schema, is that not so, to show you the exact place held by knowledge, is that not so, for the hysteric. It is a knowledge, in short, that is particularly specified, is that not so, it is a knowledge from which, from which she picks up the thing. Yes. It is a knowledge that does not go very far. It is a knowledge which to stick to the origin - it is a knowledge which is very often, not produced by discourse, the desire of the Other, but palmed off, as one might say.

I mean that it can very well be that a person, in short, who, who had not the slightest desire to know anything about anything whatsoever, is that not so, noticed all the same that in society, the university discourse assures for those who know, a good place, and that it is palmed off on the young one, here, to the kid who is going to become hysterical, and precisely for that reason, that it is palmed off to her that it is a means to power. Naturally, she receives the thing, for her part, without knowing that that is why, she receives it when she is very young, and there, it is a rather frequent case of transmission, in fact, is that not so of the desire to, of the desire to know, but it is something that is acquired altogether secondarily. In other words, what I am trying to get into your head and in connection with this experience, with this experience of the child, who naturally speaks to you about these 'whys', and these 'whys' which concern: Why this, why are children born, how is that done, etc., and all they want is, it is to hear something which, which gives pleasure, which, to show that, who, that they do everything as if they were interested in it. But as soon as they know it, they repress it, as you know well, and they repress it immediately, in fact, they think no more about it, in fact. You should all the same have an idea that is a little clearer about what

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(178) is really happening. This desire to know, in so far as it takes on a substance, takes on the substance of the social group.

In truth, I will not go so far as to be satisfied with this answer as regards mathematical invention, is that not so. It is quite clear that there are people bitten by that, is that not so, I mean that solving the problem of the cycloid was not a way of promoting oneself at the Sorbonne. There was, like that, in fact a miraculous time, a time that that I would like to see being reproduced, is that not so in the form of psychoanalysts, I would like to see being reproduced in them this kind of Republic, is that not so, which meant that Pascal corresponded with Fermat, with Roberval, with Carcavi, with a whole pile of people, is that not so who were all interrelated with one another, in fact, in order that something or other should happen. This indeed is what I would want one day to draw out of the story, something or Other happened which ensured that there were people who wanted to know more about the most unlikely things, is that not so, who drew for themselves like that the cycloid. You know what it is, is that not so, whether it is a circle, a little wheel that turns around another one, you can see what that can give, that gives, I don't know, something like that which is called cardioid, which you can believe, at that moment, did not confer anything, with any Lord, is that not so, that made their reputation. In fact their thing was strictly among themselves, is that not so, they did not go outside that.

Naturally, from there, there has come your television, this television thanks to which you are definitively stupefied, good, good but anyway, they did not do it for that, they provided for the little o-object – of course, but precisely it was without knowing it, but they had all the same, in a word, all the better realised that the object was the little o-object, namely, what you are stifled by, is that not so. They realised it all the more in that without knowing where they were going, they passed by the structure, by the structure that I told you, namely, this edge of the Real.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(178) is really happening. This desire to know, in so far as it takes on a substance, takes on the substance of the social group.

In truth, I will not go so far as to be satisfied with this answer as regards mathematical invention, is that not so. It is quite clear that there are people bitten by that, is that not so, I mean that solving the problem of the cycloid was not a way of promoting oneself at the Sorbonne. There was, like that, in fact a miraculous time, a time that that I would like to see being reproduced, is that not so in the form of psychoanalysts, I would like to see being reproduced in them this kind of Republic, is that not so, which meant that Pascal corresponded with Fermat, with Roberval, with Carcavi, with a whole pile of people, is that not so who were all interrelated with one another, in fact, in order that something or other should happen. This indeed is what I would want one day to draw out of the story, something or Other happened which ensured that there were people who wanted to know more about the most unlikely things, is that not so, who drew for themselves like that the cycloid. You know what it is, is that not so, whether it is a circle, a little wheel that turns around another one, you can see what that can give, that gives, I don't know, something like that which is called cardioid, which you can believe, at that moment, did not confer anything, with any Lord, is that not so, that made their reputation. In fact their thing was strictly among themselves, is that not so, they did not go outside that.

ALL STUDIED THE CYCLOID.
- MENTIONED IN MOBY DICK.

Naturally, from there, there has come your television, this television thanks to which you are definitively stupefied, good, good but anyway, they did not do it for that, they provided for the little o-object – of course, but precisely it was without knowing it, but they had all the same, in a word, all the better realised that the object was the little o-object, namely, what you are stifled by, is that not so. They realised it all the more in that without knowing where they were going, they passed by the structure, by the structure that I told you, namely, this edge of the Real.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

12, 13, 14. + 15. Hoff

Seminar 12: Tuesday 23 April 1974

Good, I am going first of all, by beginning three minutes before the time, I am going first of all to fulfil a duty that I did not carry out the last time. I did not do so, because I believed it would happen all by itself, but since even in my School, I saw that no one had taken this step, I am encouraged to urge others to take it. A book has just appeared in the Champ Freudien, as they say, huh, it is a collection which, as it happens, I direct. If it has appeared in this collection, I am obviously not uninvolved, I even had to force it into it. This book is called – this is a title – this one is worth as much as any other – is called: L'Amour du Censeur. It is by someone called Pierre Legendre, who happens to be a professor in the Law Faculty. There you are. So then, I strongly encourage those who, I do not really know why, indeed, are gathered together here around what I am saying, I strongly encourage them to get to know it, namely, to read it, to read it with a little attention because they will learn something from it.

There you are. With that, I begin.

I begin, or rather I begin again. This is what most astonishes me. Namely, that I have the opportunity each time to notice that if I spoke of hope in certain terms, in connection with a Kantian question that I was asked: 'whether I might...', 'what might I hope for'? And I had said that hope, I had retorted that hope was something proper to each (182) one. There is no common hope. It is quite useless to hope for a Stuff on law in Nanterre outside Paris, not part of the University of Paris. about 10 yrs afterwards he wrote 2 books which we might look in the French legal system. The French legal system speaks "Lacanese" – it has taken over from psychology but the use in it has been psychologised. French legal system is Roman law & is inquisitorial & not adversarial.

re "Television" – one of the questions Miller asked him – what can one hope for?

http://www.lacaninireland.com

common hope. So then I, I am going to admit mine to you. It is the one that possesses me all week until the morning when I wake up with you in mind – namely, for example this very morning – until that moment, I, always have the hope that it will be the last time, that I will be able to say to you n, i, ni: finished. The fact that I am here, because the day when I say it, it will be before, it will before beginning, the fact that I am there proves to you that, however special this hope may be for me, it is disappointed.

Good, as a result of which, in waking up, I naturally thought of something quite different than, than what I had fomented to say to you. There arose in me like that, in short, that if there is – I already said it, in short, but I must repeat it – that if there is something which analysis has discovered the truth of, it is the love of knowledge. Since, at least if what I point out to you has some emphasis, an emphasis that moves you, transference reveals the truth of love and precisely in that it is addressed to what I stated as being the subject supposed to know. That may appear to you, after what I stated the last time, with I believe some emphasis, at least I imagine so, anyway I hope you remember it, not only did I put forward that there was no desire to know, but I even spoke about something which... that I effectively articulated about the horror of knowing. There you are.

So then, how connect that up, as I might say? Well precisely it is not connected up. It is the Marriage of heaven to hell. There is someone called William Blake, as you know, who at his time, at his epoch, with his with his own little material – which was not slight – who stirred up that: he even gave it exactly this title. There you are. So then perhaps what I am in the process of saying to you, is that the marriage in question is not quite what is believed. What is believed, in reading William Blake, precisely. Yeah. This only re-emphasises something that I told you elsewhere, something that our experience implies in any case, the analytic experience that I am only here to situate for you.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

What is a truth if not a complaint? At least this is what corresponds to what we charge ourselves with, as analysts, if in short there is something of the psychoanalyst, that we charge ourselves with gathering. We do not gather it all the same without noting that division marks it. Marks the truth. That perhaps not-all of it can be (183) said. There you are. It is our way (voie), the way people have been speaking about for a long time, huh. And if it is put first in a statement that, that I hope is finally making your ears ring, if it is put first – it is indeed because this is what is at stake first, even though the solutions that are put forward greatly differ among themselves. It is a matter of having a little idea of our own. And then immediately after, when one states this term, the way, immediately afterwards people talk about the truth which, if it is what I have just said, is something like a rotten plank, and then as a third, people dare, anyway someone, in any case, has dared, like that: someone called Saint John, he spoke about life. These are imprudent emissions. Emissions of what? Of the voice. Of the voice which is to be written quite differently: v, o, i, x, for these. They are imprudent emissions of the voice that state these couplings. You can note that this...that the coupling, on this occasion, goes in threes. And what is life on this occasion? It is indeed something which, which in this three, then, makes, makes, makes, makes a hole, huh. I do not know if you know what life is, huh, but it is all the same curious that, that it creates a problem. Life (lavie) that on this occasion I would write indeed as I did, as I did with lalangue in a single word. This would only be to suggest that, that we do not know much about it except that it needs washing (elle s'lave). It is almost the only tangible mark of what enters into life.

Anyway, these couplings, what am I suggesting here, starting from the experience that is defined as analytic, what am I suggesting here? Is it to think out these couplings? Yeah. If that were it, it would be in short, this kind of tipping over, which would mean falling into University discourse. That is where people think. Namely, where they fuck. Good, I am pointing out to you that in this discourse, I am not – like that, it is a little test, simply, it is not at all that I pride myself on it, I am not accepted, I am rather put up with, yes, tolerated – all that brings us back to the status, to the status of, of what I stated the last time, anyway, linked to our relationship, of you, of me, and that I put in suspense between the voice and the act of saying. I dare hope that the act of saying has a greater weight in it, even though this is what I might doubt, since this doubt is what I expressed the last time as such. If it is the act of saying, this is what I get from a codified experience.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I also stated – you see, in insist on repeating myself – I also stated the (184) following: what is required, in the sense of what is lacking, so that this codified experience is not, should not be within everybody's reach? It is not a question of the division of labour, namely, that everybody cannot spend their time analysing the rest. It is not within everybody's reach, due to a fact of... of structure about which I tried to recall the last time, or at least to indicate what I intended to connect it up with. It cannot be within everybody's reach to fulfil this office that I defined just now as gathering up the truth as a complaint.

What is the status of this marriage that I evoked just afterwards, by putting it under the patronage of William Blake? When I say that it is not within everybody's reach, that goes a long way, that implies that there are those for whom it is in short prohibited. And when I state things thus, I intend to set myself apart from what is involved in something, in something that Hegel advances somewhere, about this rejection, inscribed, he says, in what he calls 'the law of the heart', this rejection of the disorder of the world. Hegel shows that if that is done, it is easy. And he is quite right. It is not a matter of producing here the disorder of the world, it is a matter of reading the not-all in it. Is this a substitute for the idea of order? This is very specifically what, into what I am proposing today to advance, to advance; with this question left just now, of what pushes me. What pushes me to bear witness to it.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

What does this not-all consist in? It is obvious that it cannot be referred to what would make an all, to… to a harmonious world. So must the not-all be grasped somewhere in an element? An element which sins precisely by not being harmonised with it? Is it enough that, that everything in it should be won over – allow me here, to put it forward – to bifurcation, to the tree. Yeah. I would point out to you that here, as if nothing was happening, by asking you a question like that, this bifurcation, is also indeed what I have just made, a sign, a y, of something which is tangible, in short, with what we are clearing the way for: there is the tree, there is the vegetable, it makes up a branch, it is its mode of presence. And I do not see why I would not wade in there, into something which all the same is recommended to our attention, because it stems from writing, huh: the old Urszene, the primal scene, as it is inscribed in the Bible, at the beginning of the aforesaid Genesis. The tempter, huh. And then the fathead, is that not so, the one called Eve. And then the ass hole of all ass holes, is that not so, the first Adam? And then what circulates, there, the thing that gets stuck in his throat, the apple as it is called. And worse that's not (184) all, huh: there is the Grandaddy who turns up and then let's fly at them.

For my part, when I read that, I am not against it. I am not against it since it is full of meaning. This indeed is precisely what it must be cleansed of. Perhaps if… one scratched away all the meaning huh, one would have a chance of reaching the Real. This is even what I am in the process of teaching you. That it is not the meaning of the complaint that is important for us, it is what one might find beyond, as definable in terms of Real, yeah. Only to clean away the meaning, it must not be forgotten, because otherwise it turns into a shoot, huh, and in all of that there is something that is forgotten. And it is precisely the tree. What is outrageous is that it is not noticed is that it was what was forbidden. It was not the snake, it was not the apple, it was not the assholes, him or her: it was the tree that was not to be approached!

http://www.lacaninireland.com

And nobody thinks any more about it, it is admirable! But for its part, what does the tree think about it? Here I am making a leap, huh, because what does that mean, what does it think about it? That means nothing other than something that is in suspense, and this is very precisely what makes me suspend everything that can be said under the heading of life, of the life that is washed. Because despite the fact that the tree is not washed – that can be seen! – despite that, does the tree enjoy? It is a question that I would call essential. Not that there might be an essence outside the question: the question is the essence, there is no other essence than the question. Since there is no question without an answer, I have been dinning that into you for a long time, this means that the essence also depends on it, on the answer. Only there, it is missing. It is impossible to know whether the tree enjoys, even though it is no less certain that the tree is life. Yeah.

I apologise to you for having, like that, imagined that, imagined presenting that to you, like that, with the help of the Bible. The Bible does not frighten me. And I would even say more, I have a reason for that. It is because there are people like that who are formed by it, huh, they are generally called Jews. One cannot say that they have not thought about this thing, the Bible. I would even say more: everything proves, everything proves in their history [to Madame Gloria Gonzales: Give me a cigar...], everything proves in their history that they are not preoccupied by the way that they have talmudized, as they say, this Bible. Well then I must recognise that it has worked out well for them. And where do I put my finger on that? I put my finger on it from the fact, yes, that they have truly well (186) contributed, when it came within their reach, to this domain that interests me, even though it is not mine – mine in the sense of the domain of analysis – that they have truly contributed, with particular astuteness, to the domain of science. What does that mean? It is not they who invented it.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The history of science started from a questioning about (put that in inverted commas, I beg you) about 'nature', about phusis – in connection with which Mr. Heidegger wriggles in convolutions. What was nature for the Greeks, he asks himself. They had an idea of nature. It must be said that the idea that they had of it - as the same Heidegger suggests – is completely lost. It is lost, lost, lost, lost. I do not see why one would regret it! Since it is lost, huh? Well then, it is not to be mourned all that much because we know even more about what it is. Yeah. We know even more about what it is because it is quite obvious that if science has succeeded, has succeeded in emerging, it does not appear, moreover, that the Jews put much of themselves into it at the beginning. It is subsequently, when the prize had been won, that they came to add their grain of salt, huh, and that it was noticed, that, it is clear, in short, what Einstein, by adding something to the great construction of Newton, that he is the one who takes things from the right angle. And then he is not the only one, there are others – that I will name for you when the occasion arises, but I cannot speak about everything at the same time, because they are to be found in profusion and then they are not all in the same quarter. What is certain is that, it is all the same striking that, that this blessed thing, written, was enough, the Scriptures par excellence, as they say! – that this was enough for them to enter into the thing the Greeks had prepared and prepared by something which is not to be distinguished from writing, from writing in so far as what specifies it, in short, is that it is possible to read it, that when it is read, it gives a saying (un dire) – an extraordinary saying, naturally, as I told you earlier about this scene that would make you collapse (à la mords–moi le doigt), a saying that would make you think you are sleepwalking - but a saying! It is quite clear that if the Talmud has a meaning it consists precisely in emptying this saying of its meaning, namely, of only studying the letter. And from this letter to induce absolutely crazy combinations, in the style of the equivalence of the letter and the number, for example, but it is all the same curious that this is what formed them.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

and that they find themselves up to date when they have to deal with science... Yeah!

(187) So then, that is what authorises me, I would say to do like them, not to consider as a forbidden field what I will call religious froth (mousse) to which I had recourse earlier. What I call 'froth', here, is quite simply the meaning! The meaning in connection with which I was trying precisely to carry out, to carry out a cleansing, by asking the question, the question about the tree: what is the tree? And what is it on a very precise point that I designated, because I do not remain up in the air: does it enjoy? Religious froth can then, in short, be also laboratory material! And why not, and why not make use of it because it comes to us with what I call, with what I call by making it entirely tip over to one side, what I call the truth, because of course, it is not the emptied out truth, huh, it is the truth like that flourishing.

There you are. I can all the same clearly indicate to you that it is not for nothing, in short, that there are Jewish biologists, huh. For my part, I have just read something of which moreover I will give you the title... I will give you the title, anyway, it is the book, there, On sexuality and bacteria. There is something that, that struck me, anyway, in reading this book which I read with passion from start to finish, because it was along my line, like that, the ~~short~~ is that if, the ~~short~~ is that if the amoeba, ehm... this little piece of filth, there, that you look at in the microscope, there, huh, and then which obviously wriggles, it eats things on you... it... good. It is certain that it enjoys! Well then as regards bacteria, I am questioning myself! Does bacteria enjoy? Well it's funny, huh, the only thing which can, in short, suggest the idea of it to us, is – I can all the same say that it is in Jacob that I discovered it, we must not exaggerate, I had heard like that a rumour... but in this Jacob, who moreover is on this occasion associated with someone called Wollman, what really fascinated me, huh, is that what is characteristic of the aforesaid bacteria is that there is nothing in the world like a bacteria for being infected. It is in a word that bacteria would contribute absolutely nothing to us if there were not the bacteriophage. And the link that is made by – that is made by: he does not make it, that emerges – but anyway it is certain that, the short that, as his name indicates Jacob is a Jew, is certainly not indifferent that his relationship, his relationship of accumulated, minute, swarming experiences in short, that his report about what happens between bacteria and the bacteriophage, that it is here that we may have the 'feeling', let us say that from infection, from its (188) infection with the bacteriophage, the bacteria eventually enjoys.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

And if one looks at it very closely – anyway, consult the text, I am indicating it to you, it will only take a second for you to look through the paperbacks, only its very difficult to find, this yoke is really exhausted, it appeared in America... It really would piss you off! It would be no bad thing all the same for you to make some photocopies. There is perhaps also one in French around, but I cannot say, for my part... I did not rush out looking for it, since I read it in English, anyway, there is also one in French, but I do not even know whether it can still be found. You see the extent of my benevolence, I am indicating it to you just when you are going to enter into the most appalling rivalry with me if I want to get it. Anyway too bad, there are always photocopies...

When all is said and done, it is from there that you can touch on a connection, a very particular connection. If Jacob makes manifest through this that there is sex at the level of bacteria, he only makes it manifest by the following fact - read this book carefully - that between two mutations of bacteria of the same line of descent, in other words of this famous escherichia coli which has served as laboratory material at that level, that between two mutations of bacterias from the same source, what constitutes sex, is that between them, between these mutations, no relationship is possible. This means that one line of descent of bacteria whose mutation consists in a possibility of a greater multiplication than in the other, while it is at the level of this possibility of multiplying that the other is distinguished: foisonnement-plus, fertility they call that in English, fertility-less. When the more fertile encounter the less fertile, they make them transfer to the side of fertility. While the less fertile, when they go towards the more fertile, for their part, do not make them transfer towards the side of the less fertile. It is then essentially from the non-relationship between the two branches – here we find our little tree again! – it is then from the non-relationship between the two branches of a same tree, that for the first time there is suggested, at the level of bacteria, the idea that there is a sexual specification.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then you see the register in which this, this may affect me, because, in finding again this non-relationship at a completely different level of this so called evolution of life which is the one by which I specify the speaking being, is all the same something which, in short, which is well designed to hold my attention, and at the same time to try to give (189) you a little whiff of it... Because in short, what that means, is that in its first apparition – which moreover has strictly nothing to do with its second apparition which is a pure homology – sexuality is not at all the same thing, but that it may be so on occasion at the level of the tree, something linked to infection and to nothing else, is all the same, is all the same worth our dwelling on. Naturally, that does not mean either that we should rush into it, huh, you must not rush, especially, because it is, it is the best way to stick your finger in your eye! But anyway, it is tangible. And that, that the question of enjoyment is suggested from infection, sexuality with a limited import, is also worth remembering. Good. When I say: not to rush, huh, that also means: not to let yourself be led by the nose.

Is there – I am making a break here, I am taking things from the other end – is there knowledge in the Real? It is essential that here I should break, since otherwise I, at least you, you have let yourselves up to now be led by the nose, namely, that you stop there where I stop myself, in order not to let myself be led by the same end. To ask the second question, the one that I am putting forward now, after having allowed myself to be led into religious froth, of what interest is it that now I start over again? It is all the same – it is not difficult to, to sense, is that not so, enjoyment, it erupts (sic) into the Real. And that there will be a moment - which will be later, because things must be carefully put into a series, huh - when the question turns back on itself. What does the Real answer if enjoyment questions it? And that is why I begin – here you see the link – why I begin to ask the question: knowledge is not the same as enjoyment. I will even say more, if there is a point to which I have led you, anyway, in starting from this knowledge that is inscribed in the unconscious, it is indeed because it is not inevitable that knowledge should enjoy itself.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

And that indeed is why, now - a break - I am taking up again a thread from a different end, no term of which is encountered in what I first put forward. I am taking up the thread from another end, and I am putting the question about knowledge in the Real. It is quite clear that this question, like all the others, is only asked from the answer. I would even say more: from the answer such as I have already emphasised it. The unconscious in Freud's sense, is that in whose name I asked the question about knowledge in the Real. But I do not ask it in giving to Freud's unconscious all its import. I am simply saying that the unconscious is at first only conceived of from the (190) following: that it is a knowledge. But I am limiting myself to that. It is in the name of this that the question about knowledge in the Real takes on its meaning.

There is some. And there is no need for Freud's unconscious for it to be so. There is some to all appearances, otherwise the Real would not work. Here is where I am starting from which as you see is a quite different aspect. This one, precisely, has a Greek aspect. The Real, is like the discourse of the master: it is the Greek discourse. The Real must work. And we cannot see how it would work without there being some knowledge in the Real. So then there also, huh, no

http://www.lacaninireland.com

rushing. Here it is not longer a matter of being led by the nose, there, it is to get limes in this step. One must cut through its casing. If I take this step in the Real, I must cut away... all the glue around, in order not to remain stuck in it, huh. And that in the Real, may I dare say, means nothing outside a meaning.

That means in the Real: which does not depend on the idea that I have of it. A further step with the same paste on one's feet: as regards which, what I think of it does not matter. The Real does not give a damn whether I think of it like that. And this indeed is why the first time that I tried to make this category vibrate, anyway, in the ears of my listeners, those of Sainte-Anne, I cannot say that I was not kind, huh, I said to them: the Real is, is what always returns to the same place. Which is precisely to put it in its place. The notion of place, arises from that.

So then, in saying that, I put the Real – I situate it precisely, I put it in its place, with a meaning, let us not forget, with a meaning qua known: the meaning knows itself. So much so that it is astonishing, huh, that people should have become entangled in it: the sensible, the tangible, anything you wish, but that it did not end up by being crystallised: the known meaning (le sensu). It must be believed that it had echoes we did not like.

What I am in the process of saying by that, in any case putting forward to you about the Real, is first of all that, it is that the knowledge at stake in the question, is there knowledge in the Real, is to be completely separated from the use of known in the known meaning. It is from meaning, starting from there that I detach the Real, but it is not from the same knowledge that I question to know whether there is a knowledge in the Real. The knowledge at stake in the question is not the order of knowledge which conveys meaning or more exactly, which is conveyed by meaning.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(191) And I am going to illustrate it right away. To illustrate it from Aristotle. It is quite striking that in his Physics, Aristotle for a good long while, in short, made the leap, the leap by which, it is demonstrated that his Physics has strictly nothing to do with the phusis whose ghost Heidegger tries to make re-emerge for us. It is because what he is tackling, he is tackling to answer the question which is the one that I am asking now: is there knowledge in the Real? He tackles it by way of the knowledge of the artisan. The short is that the Greeks did not have the same relationship to writing. The flower of what they produced, is drawings, it is the making of plans. That is their idea of intelligence. It is not enough to have an idea of intelligence to be intelligent. This recommendation is especially addressed to you. And it is surprising that it should be Aristotle who proves it to us.

This artisan, God knows what he imputes to him, make no mistake. He imputes to him, first of all, knowing what he wants: which all the same is a bit thick! Where have we ever seen anyone struggling along as an artisan, knowing what he wants? It is Aristotle who lays that on his back. Thanks to Aristotle, the artisan is the 'final cause'. And then also, while he is at it, I really do not see what stops him, is that not so, he is also the 'formal cause', he has ideas, as they say. And then after that, he, he, he causes 'cause' (il cause 'cause'), he even causes 'means', he causes 'efficient' in a word, and it is a lucky thing that Aristotle leaves some bit of the role to matter. There it is it: it is the 'material cause'! It causes, it causes, it causes even without rhyme or reason [causer = to cause, or to chat, to bladder on].

Because, to take things, like that, at the level from which they come, namely, the pot – that is how it came out, not at all of course that they only knew how to make that, the Greeks, they knew how to make much more complicated things, but all of that, all of that comes from the pot. When I ask a question of whether there is knowledge in the Real, it is precisely to exclude from this Real what is involved in the knowledge of the artisan. Not only does the knowledge of the artisan not cause, but it is exactly this order of knowledge that the artisan makes use of because another artisan taught him to do it like that.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

And far from the pot having an end, a form, an efficacy and even some matter or other, the pot, is a mode of enjoying. He was taught to enjoy making pots! And if someone did not buy his pot – and that depends on the good sense of the client – if his pot is not bought, well then he has the reward of his enjoyment, namely, that he left with it, (192) and that this does not go very far. It is a mode that is essential to detach from what is at stake when I ask the question: is there knowledge in the Real?

There must all the same simply be some people here who have been, who have been, I don't know, to the exposition of Chinese archaeological excavations, as it is called, Chinese excavations which were the best thing that they found to send us from the land of Mao. There you can see – at that level because there are reasons why, in this zone, in short, one can still see the pots at the moment that they emerge. It is quite clear that these pots are absolutely gripping, admirable, is that not so, these pots from the time of the apparition of words, when for the first time, people made pots – three feet are stuck onto them, as it happens, but they are feet which are not feet, feet that are screwed on, you understand, they are feet, feet which are there in continuity with the pot. These are pots which have spouts of which one can say in advance that any mouth is unworthy. They are pots which are in themselves, with their advent, in short things before which one prostrates oneself.

Do you believe that this emergence here, is something... is something that has anything whatsoever to do with Aristotelian decomposition? It is enough to look at these pots to see that in short they are of no use for anything. But there is one thing certain, which is that this grew, is that not so, this grew, in short, like a flower. That Aristotle, finally, decomposes them, in short, is that not so, con-causes them with at least four different causes, is something that just by itself, in short, demonstrates that the pots are from elsewhere.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

But why am I talking to you about them since precisely I put them elsewhere? I am talking to you about them because if it is the client who finally has to judge the pot, in the absence of which the potter, in short will have to tighten his belt, this demonstrates something to us, which is that it is the client who not only buys the pot, but who, 'potters' the artisan, it if I can express myself thus. And it is enough to see what follows from this link between the fact that the pot, in short, is so well made that people imagine that God is a potter, exactly like the artisan. The God in question is, is... at one time, anyway, my old friend Andre Breton believed that he was pronouncing a blasphemy in saying that, in saying that God is a pig (un porc). It is not for nothing that the last time I told you that I never encouraged the Surrealists. Not at all that I for my part would abbreviate and I would say that God is a pot. God is clumsy (un empoté)! True, God is the potter, but the potter also is awkward. He is the subject, in short, of the knowledge supposed to his art.

But this is not what is at stake when I ask you the question: is there knowledge in the Real? Because this, this is what was encountered the day when from the Real someone succeeded in tearing out a strand, namely, at the time of Newton, when all the same, it happened, and that there in order that the Real should function, at least the Real of gravity, namely, not nothing, all the same, because we are all screwed to this gravity and by nothing less than our bodies, until we hear differently, not that it is a property of it, as what followed clearly demonstrated – but one is screwed onto this Real. And there, what is it, in short, that worried people in Newton's time? It was nothing less than this question which I would say, in short, concerned what was at stake, namely, masses – make no mistake. Masses. How these masses could know the distance at which they were at from other masses so that they would be able to observe Newton's law? It is absolutely clear that that God is required here. One cannot, all the same, claim that the masses, the masses as such, namely, defined by their simply inertia, where would the notion come to them of the distance that they are from other masses? And what is more, as regards what is involved in these masses themselves in order to behave correctly? At the time of freshness when this Newtonian lucubration came out, this escaped no one! It was the only notion in short, that – the only notion that could be opposed to him, were Descartes vortices; unfortunately Descartes vortices did not exist and everyone could see that quite clearly... So then, God was required to inform, is that not so, at every instant, in short it has even got to the point that not only was he required to be there to inform the masses at every instant about what was happening to the others, but... it was even supposed that he had perhaps no other means than to push the masses himself with his finger... Which, of course was exaggerated, in short, was exaggerated because it was clear that once acceleration is already inscribed in the formula, time was also there, so then there was no need for the finger of God! But as regards informing all the same, it was difficult to exclude him. And what I am talking to you about, for my part, here, is the knowledge in the Real.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(194) You must not imagine that because Einstein came afterwards and put something else into it, huh, you must not imagine that things are any better, huh, because there is all the same a funny story, is that not so, which is that this relativity of space, which is henceforth de-absolutised, because indeed it is some time, in short since people have been able to say that in short, that after all God was absolute space – indeed that is, that is only banter. But the relativisation of this space with respect to light, this has a funny feel for you of fiat lux, and that, that has every appearance of starting to put its ass once again into the religious froth. So then, let us exaggerate nothing. It is perhaps here, you understand, that – this is how, in any case for today, I will limit myself, indeed to what made the analyst emerge. You have clearly

http://www.lacaninireland.com

sensed, sentu, huh, that all of this comes from this ~~short~~ fact indeed that we have only spoken up to now about what comes from Heaven. Everything that we have of the Real however little sure it is, including our monsters, huh, has uniquely, uniquely come down from heaven. If it were not from there that we had started in order to always return to the same place, the definition that I give of the Real, we would not have today either watches nor televisions nor all these charming things thanks to which you are not only minuted but I would dare to say 'seconded'. You are so well seconded that you no longer even have living space.

Luckily there is something of the analyst, huh. The analyst – I am going to end on a metaphor: the analyst is the will-o-the-wisp. It is a metaphor which, for its part, does not amount to fiat lux. It is all that I have to say to excuse him. I mean that it opposes to the stars from which everything has descended in terms of what encumbers you and organises you so well here, indeed, to listen to my discourse, is that not so. Namely, that this has absolutely nothing to do with what you will come in to complain to me in a moment.

The only advantage that I find in this will-o-the-wisp, is that this does not amount to fiat lux. The will-o-the-wisp does not illuminate anything, it emerges even ordinarily from some pestilence. That is its strength. This is what can be said, starting from the will-o-the-wisp, whose thread I will try to take up, the wisp of thread, the next time.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

This is one of the most difficult seminars he has ever read.
The dupe is a person who is the dupe of their ucs. You have to love your ucs.

Seminar 13: Tuesday 14 May 1974

The non-dupes-err... That does not mean that the dupes do not err. If we start from what is proposed as an affirmation – can you hear? Can you hear like that, if I am in front of this thing? Would the person who said that he can hear nothing answer: can he hear? Let us say that there is introduced by this affirmation that the non-non-dupes, may well, no more, not err. But already, this introduces us to the question that is posed by double negation. To be...not to be a non dupe, does that come back to being a dupe? This supposes, and supposes nothing less, than that there is a universe; that one can put forward that the universe, is divided by every statement; that one can say 'the man', and that if one says it – I mean to say it – all the rest becomes non-man.

He is kicking around the question of sexual identification. You are 'not man'. Are you a woman. He takes a long time to get started.

A logician – because I am putting forward that logic is the science of the real – a logician took a step a long time after Aristotle. We had to wait for Boole to publish in 1853 An investigation of the laws of thought, which, has already this advantage over Aristotle of being a step, an attempt to stick to what he claims to observe, to found in short a posteriori as constituting the laws of thought. What does he do? He writes very precisely what I have just told you, namely that starting from anything whatsoever that is said and that is stated, and things are such for him that he cannot but put forward the idea of the universe, he symbolises it by a number (un chiffre), a number which is appropriate for it, it is the number 1. He will write then, about this book "An Investigation of the Laws of Thought" see the abstract

Aristotle worked 'a priori' a lot.

Boole symbolises the idea of the universe by the number 1.

slight mean a

http://www.lacaninireland.com

anything that is proposed as notable, notable in this universe, he will (196) then write x, he leaves this x empty, because this is the principle of the use of this letter it is whatever may be notable in the universe [to Gloria Gonzales: if you would carry that away from me, it would help me to go to the board]. Yes, x, he writes, multiplied by 1–x, this cannot but equal zero:

$$x(1 - x) = 0$$

This cannot but, provided one gives this meaning to multiplication, but note the intersection. That is where he starts from. It is in so far as x is notable in the universe that something is sustained simply by no, to men there being opposed non-men as such, everything that subsists as notable being here considered as subsisting as such. Now, it is clear that what is notable is not as such individual; that already in this way of positing logical ek-sistence, there is something which, from the start, appears to be awkward.

How does it happen that there should be posited without criticism, the theme, the theme of the universe that is posited? If I believe this year to be able to support by the Borromean knot something, something which, certainly, is not, is not a definition of the subject, of the subject as such of a universe, it is in that, I will remark once again, my attempt has nothing metaphysical about it. I mean, I mean in this connection that metaphysics is what is distinguished by supposing, by supposing as such the subject, the subject of a knowing (connaissance). It is in so far as it supposes a subject, that metaphysics is distinguished from what I am trying to articulate the elements of, namely, those of a practice, and this along the line of having defined it as distinguishing itself, distinguishing itself from something which is pure place, pure topology, and which means that there be generated from there the definition situated only from the place of this practice, from what is announced, from then on is advanced as being three other discourses. This is a fact, a fact of discourse, a fact by which I try to give to analytic discourse its place of ek-sistence.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

What is it, that properly speaking, that ek-sists? There only ek-sists as the spelling by which I modified this term stresses, there only ek-sists in any practice something that acts as a foundation of the saying (du dire), I mean what the saying contributes as an agency in this practice. It is under this heading that I try to situate under these three terms, the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real, the triple category which makes a knot, and by this gives its meaning to this practice. For this (197) practice has not simply a meaning, but gives rise to a type of meaning that illuminates the other meanings to the point of putting them in question again, I mean by suspending them. With that, as an articulation, an articulation which at the end of a progress made to stimulate among those who sustain this practice, the idea of what for them this Real is, I say: the Real, is writing. The writing of nothing other than this knot as it is written to say it, as it is written when it is according to the law of flattened out writing. And I submit what I am stating to this test of putting in suspense the distinction, the precisely subjective distinction of the Imaginary, the Symbolic and the Real, in so far as they might in a way already carry with them a meaning, a meaning which would hierarchise them, would make a 1,2,3 of them. Naturally, this would not avoid us falling again into another meaning – as already it may have appeared to you by the fact of what I emphasise about the association of the Real with a three, of the Imaginary with a two, and of the Real precisely – [a slip by Lacan] – and of the Symbolic precisely with the One.

Something in, at the level, in the terms of the Symbolic, is posited as One. Is it a One sustainable from any individuation in the universe? That is the question that I ask, and from now on, I will put it forward under this form, namely, to ask the question in connection with Boole's writing. If the One that Boole advances as sufficient to divide up the truth, if there is an x, it is only true if, if the x subtracted from the One is something different to all the rest, than all the rest of the nameable. It is nothing less than gripping to note that Boole himself, by writing what results, what results from the writing of these terms in a mathematical formula, should be led to found on it that the proper of any x, of any x qua stated, is that x minus x 2 equals 0, which is written:

http://www.lacaninireland.com

$$x - x2 = 0$$

$$x = x\,2$$

I mean to be supported by a mathematical formula.

It is strange that here a note in his book, a book whose date I gave you earlier, the major date in this sense that it is starting from there that a new... a new start is taken by logical speculation, and that someone Charles Sanders Peirce of whom I already spoke to you, can for example ameliorate, according to him, Boole's formulation by showing in it that at certain points the result of it can be that it goes (198) astray, let us say. This to highlight what results from functions of two variables, namely, not simply x but x and y, and showing in it that which... that where I myself believed I ought to take up that the function described as relationship, can here serve to show us that, as regards what is involved in the sexual, this relationship cannot be written.

Why, Boole asks himself, rather than writing $x = x2$ and the inverse, cannot one write $x = x3$? It is striking that Boole – and this starting from the notion of truth as radically separating what is involved between the One and the zero, because it is by zero that he connotes error – it is striking that this universe, from then on solidary as such with the function of truth appears to him to limit the writing, the writing of what is involved in the logical function, to the second power of x while he refuses the third power. He refuses it because of the fact that mathematically, it would only be supposable in writing by adding to it a new term of the product, which he certainly does not refuse when what is at stake is to make the operation of multiplication work, he writes on this occasion:

http://www.lacaninireland.com

$$x\,y\,z$$

and he can, according to the case, mark that $x\,y\,z$ such that the variables were situated by a certain function, that $x\,y\,z$ for example also equals 0. But since he limits himself to the values zero and one, it can just as well take on the function, the function taking its value from a certain… from a certain ciphering of zero and one for each of the three – he can, by making x, y and z each equal to one, notice that zero is not the fruit of it.

So then, what can prevent him from adding to his $(1 - x)$ a $(1 + x)$ and to add it not as addition, to add it as a term of multiplication? He sees then very clearly that $(1 - x)$ multiplied by $(1 + x)$ giving $1 - x2$, he will end up, I do not need to underline it for you, with this: the fact is that $x - x3$ will be equal to zero and from this fact x will be equal to $x3$:

$$x(1 - x)(1 + x) = 0$$
$$x - x3 = 0$$
$$x = x3$$

Why does he stop, stop at what? In the interpretation of what this x might be precisely as added to the universe. Is it not proper to what (199) ek-sists the universe, to be added to it? This is properly what we do every day, and precisely what I designate by a plus in supporting it by the small o-object. But then this suggests to us, this suggests the following: namely, to ask ourselves whether the One in question, is well and truly the universe, to be considered as a set or collection of everything that can be individualised in it.

I suggest – there is suggested to me, let us say in connection with this writing of Boole – founding what he establishes in terms of universe – because it is as such that he articulates it, that he gives it its meaning – to suppose that this One, far from arising from the universe, arises

http://www.lacaninireland.com

from enjoyment. From enjoyment and not just from any enjoyment, from the enjoyment called phallic, and this in so far as analytic experience demonstrates its importance. That from this sequence of what is posited as logical, as signifier, but literal, I mean inscribable, in so far as the inscription is where there arises in our experience the function of the Real, at least if you follow me, that something like an x can be added to this enjoyment, and constitute what I already defined as grounding surplus enjoying (plus-de-jouir).

It remains that Boole is far from not indicating that it is not simply the relationship of enjoyment to surplus enjoying, in so far as surplus enjoying is supposed to be precisely what ek-sists, ek-sists with respect to what? Precisely the knot whose use and function I am trying for the moment to illuminate for you. He sees very clearly that in order to end up with the function $x = x3$ and no longer simply x2, he sees very clearly that the third term, the term (1 + x) can be written differently and specifically (-1 –x). I mean (-1 -x) taken in brackets, which is equivalent mathematically – I mean in so far as writing is what is mathematical – what can be inscribed here by minus before the brackets and by (1 + x), put on the inside:

$$-(1 + x)$$

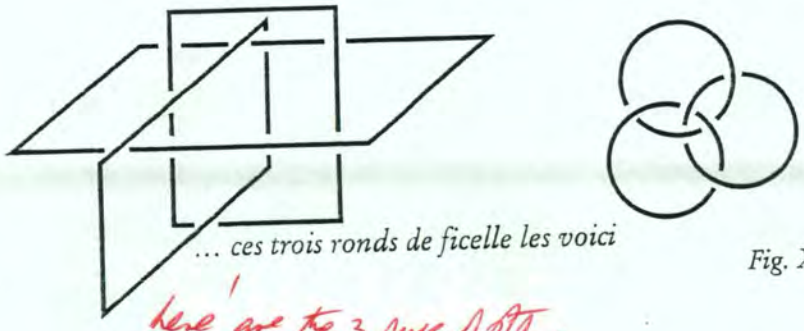
I write –(1 + x) and I say that it is the equivalent to the addition here of (-1 –x) and that Boole adds them in order to reject them, to reject them in so far as logic is supposed to be designed to assure the status of the truth.

But for the moment, what we are aiming at, is not to give its status to the truth, since the truth, we say, is never stated except from a half-saying, that it is properly speaking unthinkable, except at the locus of the saying, to mark that a proposition is not true, and to mark it with a bar, with an upper bar that excludes it, and marks it with the sign of false.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(200) In the order of things, in so far as the symbol is designed to ek-sist it in this order of things, it is properly, whatever may be said, whatever Boole may say studying or claiming to establish the status of thought, it is unthinkable, precisely, it is unthinkable to split anything whatsoever nameable, to split by a pure no to designate what is not named. Does this mean that we ought to put to the test, put to the test what results from $\overset{3}{x3} = x$, assuredly it is already something to see functioning in it this three by which I mark as such the Real, and this is where we are going to take up again our Borromean knot.

I would like once more to give the example of the fact that even if the statement of the Borromean knot ek-sists with respect to analytic practice, it is what permits it to be supported in this space of ours. And this without our knowing, at the present time, despite Aristotle's quotations, what the number of the dimensions of this space is, I mean even the one where we name things. Look, this is the same thing as what I first drew on the board, namely, that we have here a ring, a ring of string as I precisely called it the first time that I introduced this function.



... ces trois ronds de ficelle les voici

Fig. XIII-1

Here is the ring of string, the three rings of string. You see that they hold together. They hold together in so far as there is here one which I put on the horizontal, the two others being vertical and the verticals crossing over one another. It is obvious that this cannot be unknotted. The Borromean knot as such has made a lot of people here work, and they have even sent me the testimony of this. This is the simplest form.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(201) It is striking that in the works – it is veritable works that have been sent to me on this point – works which do their share in all sorts of other ways, they are innumerable, to knot these three in such a way that they allow, with the unknotting of a single one of the three rings, exactly to free all the others, and as I told you, whatever may be the number of them. But to limit ourselves to three, since this three goes with our three functions of the Imaginary the Symbolic and the Real, this very precisely not to distinguish them, to see up to what point the fact that they are three, and by this fact to construct from them the very logic of the Real. Namely, to see at what moment we are going to be able to see arising, simply from these three, strictly equivalent, as you can immediately see – from these three to give rise to the beginning of what would be differentiation in it. Differentiation is initiated, is initiated from the fact, and I am astonished that in the works that I have received, no one has pointed it out to me, here you are: through these three as they are arranged here, there are determined let us say eight quadrants, 1,2,3,4,5,6,7,8. I take one of them, any one whatsoever, and from this quadrant I pull the flattened out one, the one that you are going to see – you are going to see from where you are, but by being where I am, it is certainly exactly the same, namely, that you see that something is already found there, because of this flattening out, is found to be already oriented. I mean that you certainly see the same inscription of the knot which is the one that I see, namely, on this occasion, for what I have shown you, by having taken my knot in the way it has been depicted, the fact is that by the flattening out something is outlined that is inscribed in following out its shape, which is inscribed as dextrogyratory.

Once it is flattened out as it is and turned over, I know in advance that it is the same dextrogyratory. It is enough to do this small job, indeed to imagine the turning over – and this also can be written – you will see that it is not the mirror image, that in turning over the Borromean knot you do not see something which is its mirror image.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

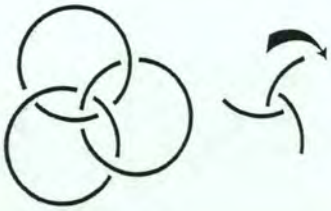

Fig. XIII-2

Fig. XIII-3

(202) Does this not render all the more striking this fact: it is that in taking up again my quadrants – let's say that I chose earlier – I do not know if it is effectively what I did – that one for you on the top right – if I take this one, that not only as I said on the top and at the right but I also say, in front, if I take the one no longer on the top right and in front, but below on the left behind, the one that is strictly opposite it and if it is from there that I start to flatten it out in the same way that I previously did, it is quite notable – and you can verify it – that what will result from this flattening out will be a way in which the knot is squeezed, in which the knot is tightened in the exactly inverse way, namely, laevogyratory.

There comes out then from the simple handling already of the Borromean knot, there arises a distinction which is of the order of orientation. If one is in the clockwise direction, the other is in the inverse direction. We must certainly not be astonished, be astonished that something of this order can happen, because it is in the nature of things that space should be oriented. It is even from there that there proceeds the function described as that of mirror image, and of all symmetry.

I apologise for the asperity of what my discourse today implies. Simply, I note for you that this fact of orientation for the opposite

http://www.lacaninireland.com

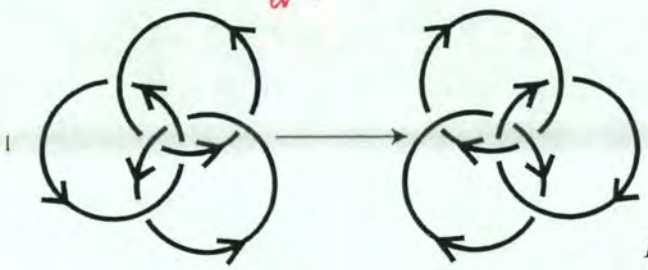

Fig. XIII-4

quadrants is something that already indicates to us that it is in (203) conformity with the structure, from the simple fact that the orientation arises from the single support from the single nodal support for which here I take up arms. It is conceivable from these rings themselves to mark a direction in them, namely, an orientation. In other words, to take the last, the one that is written here (1), to ask ourselves the question about what results from making use of an orientation in conformity with the one that we have abstained from of two species [?] and of two species alone which are different, namely, to Realise that there will result from it a figure, a figure such that its periphery will mark by that fact the same orientation. What is required for one of these figures to be transformed into the other, namely, this one equally completed (2)? You have seen from my hesitation the very mark of the difficulty that is encountered in the handling of the aforesaid rings of string. This is the mirror image of the other. But what is enough to transform the one into the other? Something which is definable in the following very simple way: namely, that, as you see the Borromean knot itself displayed, you see that any one of them is manifested by cutting each of the two others in such a way that the one being freed, the one being sectioned, the two others are free. Which means that one of these rings can turn around one of the two others, and that this all by itself will give us a new Borromean knot. The law of what is happening on this occasion is the following: here you only have to – I apologise for not having coloured chalk, it would be better, I am drawing it in chalk – what happens if we fold back one of these knots, one of these rings, around another?

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Fig. XIII-5

This is exactly what we get – from this we get a new figure which – I'm going to rub out the old one so that you can see it better – we get a new figure which has as a property to be of this kind. Namely, that, (204) you see – this one is rubbed out – namely, that you see it, the figure is presented in this way, we have this which has remained invariable, and two others... two other elements. There you are: the two other elements present the sort of orientation which is the one defined here... namely, that, as compared, is that not so, to this... this being marked by a for example you will subsequently have a presentation like this, namely, if this is b, you will have an inversion of direction from the b and of the c and an inversion of orientation of their curves, things being completed in the following way. There you are.

What matters is the following: it is to see that, by inverting the a what results from it, is a totally different orientation of the tightening of the knot. Namely, that from the simple fact that we have turned over one of the rings, the two other elements, those that we have not inverted, the two other elements change direction. I mean that, as is conceivable, the segment, the segment that I section in this mess, the segment that is found to be sectioned by the turning over of this ring which was first of all there, the segment has changed direction. Namely, that to one, to this one here, this other segment and this one has fitted here in a way that we will call if you wish, centripetal, while previously the three were centrifugal. This indeed is why, when we turn over a further ring of string, this ring of string will remain in its primal orientation for the segment itself that we are going to have to turn over. Namely, that if now, after having turned over a we turn over b, b will find itself keeping this centripetal direction, but then it is these two others, namely, one centrifugal and the other centripetal, that will be inverted so that the result of this will be that the centripetal becomes centrifugal and the centrifugal becomes centripetal, we will have here anew one centrifugal and two centripetal. But the one that will be centrifugal will be one of the turned over centripetals.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Do have to do all of that again, or has someone followed it?

I exposed myself to, to not even looking at notes, for this simple reason, which is that the very difficult of handling, the so small imaginable, as one might say, of this Borromean knot from which we are trying to draw some profit, is the very thing that that I am not unhappy, in short, to highlight, is that not, so to highlight a way... of ... there you are, after the second circuit, is that not so, a laevogyratory that has been reproduced like the preceding one, is that not so, and it is (205) in so far as we have turned over the b after having turned over the a that we obtain the following: that we have a centripetal in place of a centrifugal which is here, and a centrifugal at the place of the centripetal which is here, is that not so. As a consequence, we have here c, a, and b.

I was asked the question, I was asked the question in a place where people were working, I was asked the question as to what relationship this Borromean knot had with what I have stated about the four – I would say – options, described as sexed identification. In other words, what relationship this might have with the

$$\exists x \,.\, \overline{\Phi x} \qquad \overline{\exists x} \,.\, \overline{\Phi x}$$

$$\forall x \,.\, \Phi x \qquad \overline{\forall x} \,.\, \Phi x$$

Fig. XIII-6

I am now going to try to tell you. Suppose that we give to this this position in a quadrant that we designate according to the mark in

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Cartesian co-ordinates, the eight quadrants in question. You should be able to see, to notice that, let us take the top right quadrant in front, it is by folding over – ah, finally... good there you are! – it is by the folding back of the ring of string marked here, I mean in so far as this ring of string, this one then, is held – there you are – in so far as this ring of string is held by this one, namely, the one that I will call the 'in depth', we will call this one here 'the top', and this one here 'the flat'.

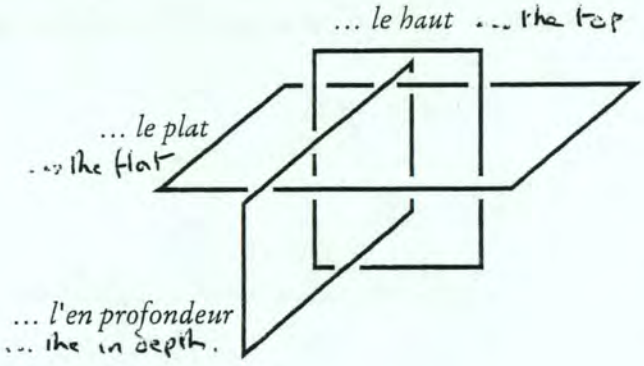

Fig. XIII-7

Good, so then the flat comes here... and it is the one that comes there [Lacan demonstrates with a knot that he has in his hand], so then, green, blue, red. This is how things will present themselves. Good. (206) It is a little bit... a little bit different. There you are. You will have to take a bit of trouble, yourselves, to make the things, because after all, I note that it doesn't work out all that easily. Good.

The important thing is the following: it is, it is to indicate that it is by folding back this one, namely, the vertical towards the in depth; by folding back this one, is that not so, namely, the one that was first of all well marked at its place here, it is by folding it back in this way that we are going to get the ring, the Borromean knot as it is situated in this quadrant on the left of whatever quadrant we started from. In this quadrant, then, with inversion, inversion of the laevogyratory, is that not so, namely, a passage to the dextrogyratory, because the one that I did at the bottom was a laevogyratory. I took it that way because in the way that the knots are arranged – the way that the rings of string are arranged, this is how it is knotted. So then here we have an inversion. Which means that, to take things by placing them like here for example, in this quadrant there, is that not so, we have to pass into this one, we have a first inversion. By passing into this one, we have a second inversion, as in some direction – on condition that it is a direction of symmetry with respect to one of the planes of intersection we have, at the three extremities, a change in the Borromean knot, we have an inversion. Good, if we pass along here, namely, that we go through it from the top to the bottom we have a new inversion, namely, a return of what was here, of the laevogyratory. These operations are commutative, namely, that by passing in this way, we arrive at the same return.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(207) In others words, it is at the four opposite points, namely, on the eight quadrants of four definable quadrants by as I might say the inscription in the cube of a tetrahedron, it is with that that we are going to see appearing four homogenous figures, all three, on this occasion, laevogyratory, since we have started from a laevogyratory. Good. What results from this? How consider this multiplication, as I might say, by four, from what results from simply the flattening out, or the writing of the Borromean knot. I propose simply something that, given the time, I will only be able to give a commentary on the next time, it is this. If, as you have just seen, what is at stake is a tetrahedral figure, a tetrahedral figure in so far as it is produced by the tipping over of two of the rings of string, and one can say two, whatever they are. Whatever they are, we come back to the laevogyratory figure, to specify it. We come back to it whatever the one of the two that has been folded over. There will remain one which has not been folded over. The one that remains is obviously the third, I mean the one that remains after the two others have been folded over. That for example, if we make of these rings of string, the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real, what will remain in short, and what will remain in a centrifugal position, this again I would have to verify for you, I mean that you should be able to see that it is by tipping over the S and the I that at the end the R remains centrifugal.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

There is a good reason for that. If you have clearly seen the last figure, it is the R, namely, let us say the Real, that must be tipped over to obtain the last figure, which itself will be dextrogyratory and will be entirely centrifugal. It is a convenient way for you to remember what is involved in the second phase of what happens after two tipping overs, since you ought as I showed you, you ought shortly find in the strictly opposite quadrant, the one about which I spoke to you when I made this remark to you, this remark that was not found, namely, that in passing from one quadrant to the strictly opposite quadrant, to the contradictory quadrant, to the diagonal quadrant, we obtain a knot, a knot no more if we start from the laevogyratory – we obtain a dextrogyratory knot. Good.

So then, verify all of this when you have a chance, in short, by making small manipulations like the ones that I made such a mess of before you and you will see in short the following: that by staying with the laevogyratory knot, we obtain what I qualified or specified as a tetrahedron, because you see how things happen. You can make, reconstitute: here for example you have to take one of the faces of the (208) square, you pull it, you reconstitute the cube, you reconstitute the cube starting from this, the fact is that it is always in a diagonal arrangement with respect to one of the faces of the cube that there are found the quadrants which are of the same kind of orientation and specifically on this occasion, of the laevogyratory kind.

I am simply going to suggest the following to you: this is what comes out of it starting from the function of enjoyment, what comes out is the following: it is that somewhere in one of these extremities of the tetrahedron somewhere there is situated the $\overline{\exists x}.\overline{\Phi x}$ there is no x to say no to $\overline{\Phi}$ of x somewhere, and we are going to put it, $\exists x.\overline{\Phi x}$ there is something which says no to $\overline{\Phi}x$ somewhere, there is

http://www.lacaninireland.com

masculine

$\forall x . \Phi x$ namely, that: all (tous) are a function of it

And that somewhere, you have:

$\overline{\forall} x . \overline{\Phi} x$ not all (pas-toutes) — the feminine.

It is not for nothing that I put it in this form, namely, a basic form.

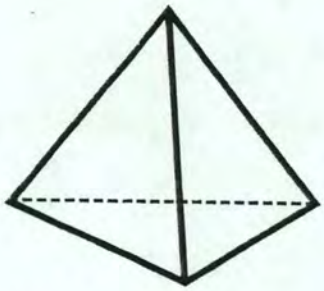

Fig. XIII-9

a step on a Rhod.

It is connected up with castration & the assumption of your own desire

We will have in a way to put the following in question: the not (pas), not the exclusive not like the earlier one, the step of what exists by saying no to the phallic function. We will on the other hand have what says yes to it, but which is reduplicated, namely, that there is the all, on the one hand, and on the other hand the not-all (pas-tous) in other words what I qualified as not-all (pas-toutes). Does it not appear to you that we have here a programme, namely, to take in what is a subject to be examined, to take the criticism of what is involved in the not, of what is implied by the saying no, namely, the interdiction, (209) and very specifically, when all is said and done, that which, specifying itself by the saying no to the $\overline{\Phi} x$ function, says no to the phallic function.

Saying no to the phallic function, is what we call, in the analytic discourse:

$\exists x . \overline{\Phi} x$ the function of castration

There is what says yes to the phallic function, and says it as all, namely, very specifically a certain type which is altogether necessitated by the definition of what we call man. You know that the not-all very essentially served to mark that there is no the woman, namely, that there are only as I might say the diverse and in a way one by one, and that all of this finds itself in a way dominated by the privileged function of the following, that there is nevertheless not-one to represent the saying that prohibits, namely, the absolutely-no.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Voilà. .

So then because there is an exam now, I simply began the thing today. I beg your pardon for having spent so long on it, we will take it up the next time.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 14: Tuesday 21 May 1974

I apologise for being late and I want to thank you for having waited for me. You see that I am persevering, as regards the foundation that I am giving this year to my discourse in the Borromean knot. The Borromean knot is here justified by materialising, by presenting this reference to writing. The Borromean knot is only on this occasion a mode of writing. It finds itself in short presentifying the register of the Real.

When, at the start, I questioned myself about what the unconscious was, I only intended to take it at the level of what analytic experience effectively constitutes. At that time, I had in no way elaborated discourse as such; the notion, the function of discourse was only to come later. And it is in so far as this discourse is where there is situated a social bond and then, it must be said, a political one, it is inasmuch as this discourse situates it, that I spoke about discourse. But I started only from the experience, and in this experience, it is clear that language, that something which undisputedly is required by the practice of analysis, that the practice of analysis is founded on a pathos, on a pathos that must be situated, and it is a matter of situating how one intervenes in it.

To intervene gives rise to the notion of act. It is also essential to think out, this notion of act, and to demonstrate how it can come to consist in a saying. At one time, as they say, I thought I should point out that the analyst, not only operates by the word alone, but is specified by only operating with that. Refusing this intervention on the body, for example, which passes by the absorption, in any form whatsoever, of (212) substances that then enter into the chemical dynamics of the body, for example medications, as they are called, good. The point that I am at in it, is simply something, the circuit, is that not so, it is the circle that you see drawn here. The fact is that there is a link – but it is a matter of knowing what one, between sex and the word. It is clear that sex involves the duality of corporal structure. A duality which is reflected in a cascade, as one might say, about the duality for example of the soma and the germen, on the opposition between the living and the inanimate world, etc.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

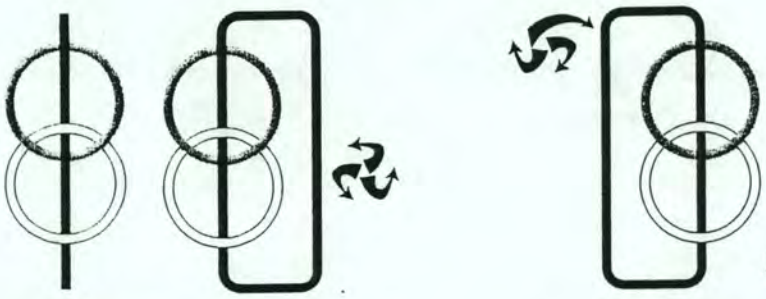

Fig. XIV-1

Is the notion of duality enough to homogenise everything that is two? You see right away that this is not true. The simple enumeration that I carried out, is that not so, of the duality of corporal structure, of the duality of the soma and the germen, of the opposition between the living and the inanimate world, ought to be enough for you to see that this polarity, to call it by its name, in no way homogenises the series of poles that are at stake, is that not so. It does not in any way suffice to ensure that the notion of world, or universe, is correlated to this unthinkable thing which is the subject, in so far as it is supposed to be what? The reflection, the consciousness of the aforesaid world. And this by reason of what I will call the pathos of meanings. There is no need to marvel at the fact that there is a being to know what? The rest, is that not so, and it is obviously from all time that the metaphor of the sexual relationship has been cherished for this patent duality. Patent, but specified, local, distinct from other dualities. Hence the accent given to the word 'to know', (connaître), hence also the idea of active and passive, without one being able to know moreover in this polarity described as the subject and the world, where is the active, where is the passive. There is no need for an active for the pathos to subsist and attest itself in our lived experience, as they say, is that not so. We suffer. That is what is at stake when we are dealing with (213) analysis. We act also in order to get out of it, of this suffering, and on occasion, we put a lot into it. It is a matter of knowing what our two persons, as they say, namely, two animals situated by a very specified political organisation that I called a discourse, it is a matter of knowing what is the saying of an exchange ritualised in words, and what is called, what is supposed to be at stake in this exercise, namely, the unconscious.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

There I am trying to tell you: there is some knowledge in the Real, which functions without our being able to know how the articulation is made in what we are used to see being realised. Is this what is at stake and what we would indeed have to admit, is that not so, as stemming from an organising thought? This is the option that religion and metaphysics take, and in this respect they are on the same side; they join hands in the suppositions that they ordain for being.

So then what I want to say, is that unconscious knowledge, the one Freud supposes, is distinguished from this knowledge in the Real in such a way, that whatever of it there is, even science manages to make this knowledge providential, namely, something, a subject, guarantees it as harmonic. What Freud puts forward – but I note in passing that it is not all – is that it is not providential, that it is dramatic. Arising from something which starts from a default in being, a disharmony between thought and the world, and that this knowledge is at the heart of this something that we name ek-sistence, because it insists from outside and it is disturbing. It is in this sense that the sexual relationship shows itself in the individual – whom I am not the only one to characterise as a speaking being, is that not so – shows itself to be disturbed. This in contrast with everything that seems to happen among other beings. It is even from this that there has come the distinction between nature and culture. And very specifically this nature, as I might say, we must indeed characterise as not being as natural as all that. Because from where we are living, nature is not indispensable (ne s'impose pas). For us what is indispensable, is a different mode, a different mode of knowledge, a knowledge which is in no way attributable to a subject who is supposed to preside over its order, who is supposed to preside over its harmony, and it is in this that, first of all, in my first statements, to characterise Freud's unconscious, there was a formula that I find... – that I came back to on several occasions – that I find I put forward at Sainte-Anne, which is the following: that God does not believe in God.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(214) To say: "God does not believe in God", is exactly the same thing as to say "there is something of the unconscious". Of course, given the order of the audience, is that not so, that I had then, namely, psychoanalysts as they were able to present themselves at that epoch, that had no effect. It had no effect except for the fact that they asked me the question whether, whether I in short believed in him. There is someone since, in short, is that not so, who defined me by saying that I was someone who believed he was Lacan, is that not so, it was the way in which I had myself defined Napoleon, but... about the end of his life, in short, when in sum, my God, he was mad, is that not so, because to believe in one's own name, in short, is... is the very definition of it. Good. Contrary to what someone called Gabriel Marcel imagined, in short, I do not believe in Lacan. But I ask the question of whether there is not a strict consistency between what Freud puts forward as being the unconscious, and the fact that there is no one to believe in God, especially not himself, because it is in this that the knowledge of the unconscious consists.

The knowledge of the unconscious is completely contrary to instinct, namely, to what presides, in short, not simply over the idea of nature,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

but over every idea of harmony. It is inasmuch as, somewhere, there is this break which ensures that the most natural thing, as one might say, the one that appears from our point of view, when we look, indeed animals, are completely differently, objects in the world: we construct on this all the extrapolations that we can. What we note is something which seems to produce something between two bodies which indisputably is completely different, moreover, among most species, than the relationship of the body described as masculine to the one that is acknowledged as feminine. Namely, that there is in sum between these two bodies, I would say very little resemblance, while among animals, what is striking is the degree to which male and female – let us say the word to go quickly and to indicate my thought – are narcissistic.

So then, I would like to put forward today, because I must all the same put forward something, something which is important, is that not so. It is that if I put the accent on the fact that what creates an obstacle to the sexual relationship, is nothing other than this function that I found myself the last time rewriting on the board in the form of Φx and it is not for nothing that I wrote it thus, mathematically, it is inasmuch as what can be written, I trust to be in the right direction to (215) reach the Real. What does that mean? Is it because here it sometimes happens – in the whole measure that you allow me because of this microphone – to write things on the board, is it this that supports my relation with you as it is established in this discourse? I do not believe so, I ceaselessly question it: what I want to highlight here, is something which implies, which is that I say, I always say the truth, and that this is inscribed in the Symbolic, I always say the truth not simply because I repeat it, I open up the path that makes a saying exist, and that your relationship with me in this situation, is that this makes you enjoy. I have more than once asked the question, in short, I turn around it, but what is certain, is that here there is to be found the accent, in short, of this proper saying that I am trying to state inasmuch as elsewhere no doubt, I take support on writing, but that it is on the side of writing that there is concentrated what I try to question about the unconscious when I say that the unconscious, is something in the Real.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I said 'knowledge' (savoir), on the one hand, but I also underlined the following: that if this dimension of knowledge touches the edges of the Real, that it is by grasping, by playing with what I would call, in short, the folds, the edges of the Real, it is inasmuch as I have faith in the fact that writing alone supports this Real as such, that I can say something that is simply orientated, orientated simply. Because to say the truth, is as I might say, within reach for everyone, and in a certain way, for us in the analytic experience the truth is our material (étoffe). In what way is it our material? In the fact that it is the truth about this pathos, about this suffering that I designated as such, which leads to this circumscribing of an experience structured like a discourse. And I tried to give the articulation of these discourses, but a written articulation: it is only by this that something can bear witness to the Real in it.

So then what is at stake when the last time, I recalled to you the four terms, the four punctuations, the written punctuations of the identification that I would call on this occasion not 'sexual' but 'sexed', when I recalled that the Borromean knot allowed there to be situated each of these writings in which something that can be mapped out starting from the primal knot. This knot that I showed you as best I could with these rings, the rings of string that I held in my hand, in the four quadrants that they determine, that they determine starting (216) from a first flattening out, and from a first flattening out in that two of these rings must – and I said two and not the same ones, not the same since moreover, if it were the same it would come back to the same place. Namely, that there must be two of them, two different ones for us to be able to reach a quadrant that is homologous to the first that was flattened out. I thought I was able, able at that moment to show you on the board in a way that was obviously risky, since, as you were able to see – and to my great exasperation – I became entangled in it, is that not so. I became entangled in it because, a curious thing, there is in sum, this is what this experience signifies, there is something of the... of the still not mastered in – you know it, I pointed it out to you, I remind you – of the still not mastered in what is of the order of knots. It is strange, it is singular, even though already something was able to be put forward about it, that the Borromean knot had been identified to the plait of six movements, six, and not three, as it might seem to be able to appear there. It is already something, and today what I am showing you... to put... to refer to what I already marked for you, already wrote, already wrote as being the simplest form, the simplest form of the Borromean knot which is very exactly the following, namely, the one where there is nowhere a third ring, the third ring here being represented only by a straight line that you will allow me to suppose to be infinite. It is an altogether capital and even illuminating supposition in itself, I would say. Illuminating in that it is very well known, it is the first remark that any elaboration of knots, that of Artin, for example, whose volume you know perhaps – some of you in any case have surely got hold of it – that of someone like Artin who says the following: the fact is that there is only a single way on a simple line to affirm that the knot (217) cannot be unknotted, it is either one thing or the other: either the two ends in effect stretch to infinity, which makes it impossible not to recognise anything whatsoever that is formed in a knot, or the two ends are connected, in which case it can be checked out whether or not it is indeed a knot.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

What kind of remark does this suggest to us? The fact is that if this

Fig. XIV-2

http://www.lacaninireland.com

straight line, this straight line of which the knot consists, the Borromean one on this occasion, and which is specified by the fact of crossing the knots, I would say, in a way that cuts the first inasmuch as the first cuts the second, which at the same time requires alternation, namely, that it will cut the first and will be cut by the second that it encounters in so far as it is itself within the first ring and that it will then cut the blue ring twice just as it will be cut twice by the green ring, the blue ring and the green ring being distinguished by the fact that it is the blue ring that cuts the green ring.

It is then from a triadic relationship that what makes the knot is situated on this occasion: and you can see that the infinite straight line requires, requires that it cannot be given any orientation. For where does it start? It must be known whether there is a start in order that with respect to this start an orientation can be taken.

On the other hand, it is enough for this infinite straight line to be joined end to end in a ring, to express ourselves in a way that does not imply any geometrical shape but simply a consistency, for us the very fact that we give it the consistency of a ring, there appears something which is of the order of orientation, not on what I called just now this straight line that all of a sudden I turned into a ring, but in the knot itself, for you see – marked it for you each time by a correspondence – (218) that it is by the fact that the individual specified here as being orange or yellow, it is by the fact that it is flattened out in the form of a ring, it is by this fact and by none other, that there appears here this orientation that I can call laevogyratory. If I force myself to follow the direction that each of the three indicates to me, outside of a knot that they make, while from the other side, the rings appear quite differently namely, here dextrogyratory. It is in so far as here we have the things under this form that we can say that what, in the other, is presented under a certain mode is precisely, in the other form, inverted.

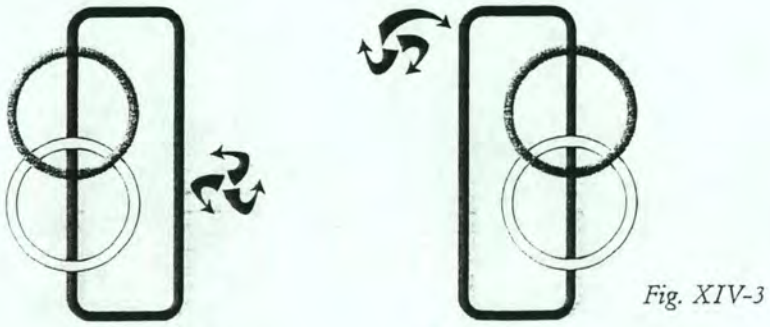

Fig. XIV-3

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is clear that it is inasmuch as we take things in this form that we have here a dextrogyratory form, just as it is inasmuch as we take the things here under the edge, under the opposite side to the point where we have folded back the orange line, that we have here a laevogyratory form. That means that what appears here, is something of that order. At the same time we note the following: that as compared to what is inverted, namely, the orange line, there is inversion of the side: here the blue line is on the right, here it is on the left, and it is in a relationship of extremity with respect to the orange line that the green line finds itself. Namely, that it is easy to understand, this is what I tried to show you the last time, namely, that in folding back one of these rings of string with respect to the two others, what we find of course is that it is elsewhere, elsewhere on one of these circles, namely, [a slip] the one here, the green, that it is the one that is here, the blue, that it is elsewhere we find that we cut it, in other words, that the yellow line [previously called orange] inasmuch as it is the one that we have folded back, is continued and cuts.

There is then every time something that changes, that changes in the orientation of the knot. Each time we pass from one quadrant, from one quadrant into another, there is something that changes in the orientation of the knot. And that is why the knot, the knots are specified four by four, that they have this relationship among one another that I qualified the other day as tetrahedral, and where I wanted to recognise what is involved in the mode of four places

http://www.lacaninireland.com

reserved for the modes of identification, the identification called sexed. It is obviously striking that you see that today again, is that not so, I found myself, even in this ultra simple form, in difficulty, is this not enough to make you sense, in difficulty in demonstrating it myself (219) in writing, what is involved in the effect, the effect of folding back, inasmuch as already what is at stake is one of the terms chosen as such and in a way previously distinguished from the two others.

It is certain that it is in this that this object of writing presents us with something particularly gripping: it is that here is a writing that in a way, I will say, we master with difficulty; it is striking enough that already in a second phase, namely, after having believed that I would get out of it easily by this artifice, that I found myself anew, perplexed, entangled with this writing. Is there not here the sign of this something that has presided over the aversion, the quite striking aversion in mathematics, an aversion that happened with respect to what the knots are. For after all, it would not have been inconceivable that this something which was drawn in a developed geometry which effectively functioned just like a writing, a writing by which science was initiated, I mean in Greek geometry, it is quite striking to see that this might also have been able, to be in an effort concerning the squeezing for example that is produced when we set aside here this knot with respect to the line which serves to constitute it properly speaking as knot, just as in folding it here, we see quite manifestly that we squeeze something, we squeeze, what can we say except what is at stake, namely, something squeezed, there is nothing more to be said about it. And it is this squeezed that is in question, that is in question in this function through which, in order to say the relationship of the Symbolic, of the Imaginary and of the Real, I say that it is here that there is taken up something, something which, on this occasion, is indeed in effect the subject. Again I must try to illuminate this something, try to illuminate it in a way by individualising what indeed each one of these rings indeed is, namely, how the Symbolic differs from the Imaginary and differs from the Real.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

To illuminate very quickly, as best I can, no more, this lantern, I would say that the Symbolic, I would put forward that the Symbolic is of the order of the One, this One that, the last time, I already put forward to you as constituting in the logical order that our friend Boole tries to construct as being the universe. I pointed out to you at the same time that there is something disputable in this; for to make (220) the universe something of One is already to posit a hypothesis over against this and along the very line that Boole proceeds in posing the formula:

$$x(1-x) = 0$$

Namely: everything that is not x, is what is x subtracted from the Universe, and their product, their intersection, their encounter is strictly equal to zero. It is on this foundation that Boole believes he is able to advance a formalisation of what is involved in logic.

As opposed to this, I propose, I propose to give to the One the value of that in which, through my discourse, there consists, there consists phallic enjoyment in so far as it is what creates an obstacle to the sexual relationship. It is inasmuch as phallic enjoyment – and there, let us say that I make an organ of it, I suppose it to be incarnated by what, in the man, corresponds to it as organ – it is inasmuch as this enjoyment takes on this privileged emphasis, privileged in such a way that it stamps itself on all our experience, our analytic experience. It is around this, because it is only there, around, around the sexed individual himself who supports it, it is inasmuch as this enjoyment is privileged that the whole of analytic experience is organised. And I propose, and I propose that it should be to it that there is referred the function of the One in the logical formalisation as Boole promotes it.

In other words, that if there is signifier – and signifier is not sign. The signifier is distinguished from the sign in the fact that we can make the sign circulate in an objective world. The sign is what goes from the emitter to the receiver and which to the receiver gives a sign of the

http://www.lacaninireland.com

emitter. But it is quite otherwise in the form of what I called the message received in an inverted form that the signifier is posited as what it is in so far as it has a relationship to another signifier that it gives rise to a subject, namely, in its configuration. What is suggested by this, is that in so far as something which is designated in Boole by an x, something is precipitated as signifier, this signifier is in a way stolen, subtracted, borrowed from phallic enjoyment itself. And it is in so far as the signifier is the substitute for it that the signifier itself is found to create an obstacle to there ever being written what I called the sexual relationship, I mean something which was the supposed to be able to be written xR and then y. Namely, that in no way can there be written in a mathematical way what is involved in what is presented as a function with regard to the phallic function itself. I mean that it is in so far as what is written is:

$$\exists x \,.\, \overline{\Phi x}$$

negation of the phallic function itself and completely opposite that there is no such thing, namely,

$$\overline{\exists x} \,.\, \overline{\Phi x}$$ that there does not exist an x to deny the function of x, to be opposed to it, and that inversely I introduce at the level of the Universal this something which, sticking to the phallic function, is characterised on the one hand by a universal quantifier, an inverted capital $\forall$ – you know that this is how it is written:

$$\forall x \,.\, \Phi x$$

but in the other, it puts a negative bar, namely, it says that there is somewhere a function that is distinguished from it by being 'not-all' (pas-toute).

$$\overline{\forall x} \,.\, \Phi x$$

Not all, what does that mean? The least that can be said is that there are two of them. It is in the measure where at the level where there is articulated this 'not all', there is not only one enjoyment. Here do not go too quickly, here do not go too quickly and do not start supposing that what I am distinguishing, is something or other like that which sexually would correspond to this so called division of enjoyment called clitoral from an enjoyment called vaginal. That is not what is at stake. What I am talking about is this distinction that must be made between phallic enjoyment in so far as in the speaking being it predominates and that it is from there that there has been stolen the whole function of significance. That there is a distinction to be made between this prevalent enjoyment in so far as it creates an obstacle to what is involved in the sexual relationship, that there is a distinction to be made between this enjoyment and that which, alongside – I introduced it to you the other day, I think sufficiently with what was involved in the tree, the tree described as that of science, of the science of Good and Evil – there is the fact that undoubtedly the animal, the animal is distinguished by subsisting not simply in a body, but that this body as such is only identified, only has identity, not as (222) has been said from all time traditionally, of thought, of this something or other which by the fact that it thinks would make it be, but from the fact that it enjoys itself. I mean that there is not only this apperception, apprehension, sensation, pressure, touch, sight, or any other mode of appropriation through the senses, it is only in so far as it consists and that it consists in a body, what is at stake is an enjoyment and an enjoyment which is found according to our experience to be of a different order than what is involved in phallic enjoyment.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

This is how I began from the beginning of my teaching by authenticating, by making original from the imaginary relation, made reference to what I would call the homology, the resemblance, precisely this part which is so hesitant, when it is the speaking being that is at stake, the homology of bodies. That in the animal we must clearly note that phallic enjoyment whatever it may be does not have the same prevalence, does not have the same weight, the same weight in a way of opposition that it has with respect to enjoyment in so far as two bodies enjoy one another. This is the break through which there is damaged, as one might say, in analytic experience everything that is organised about love. That if one speaks as I said, I recalled it earlier, if one speaks about the knot, it is to make an allusion to the embrace, to the hug. But very different is the way in which there irrupts into the life of each one this enjoyment which, either belongs, as one might say to one of the bodies, but to the other only appears in the form, as I might say, of reference to another as such, even if something in the body can give it a slight support, I mean at the level of this organ which is called the clitoris.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is in so far as we must conceive of the Symbolic as stolen, subtracted from the order One of phallic enjoyment and in so far as the relationship of bodies qua two, by this very fact, cannot but go by way of the reference, the reflection onto something which is different to the Symbolic, which is distinct from it, and it is to know what here and now appears of the three in the slightest writing. What language in a way sanctions, is the fact that in its formalisation it requires something other than the simple homophony of the saying. The fact is that it is in a letter, and that is why the signifier shows, shows this precipitation through which the speaking being can have access to the Real. It is inasmuch as from all time every time it was a matter of (223) configuring something which is supposed to be in a way the encounter of what is emitted, of what is emitted as a complaint, as a statement of the truth, every time it is a matter of everything that is involved in this half-saying, an alternating, contrasting, half-saying, an alternating chant of what leaves the speaking being separated in two halves every time this is what is at stake, it is always, it is always from a reference to writing that what can be situated in language finds its Real, and it is inasmuch as I will try to push further for you this reference to the Real, to the Real as third, that I will leave that for today, apologising for not having been able to advance further.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Network Lawrence

Dundrum.

1st Floor

16/17 Main St.

Dundrum Dn 14

2960163 €226.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 5: Wednesday 8 January 1974

I wish you a Happy New Year, huh, even though naturally several people, I imagine, have here, have hear begun it badly. I am one of them moreover. I am one of them. So that after all, my inclination was to excuse myself because of the fact that the Tuesday with which the year began was not because of that fact a true Tuesday and to put you off to the next one. It would have been a good way of getting rid of my duty today... I still remain, it must be said very tempted by it, there is only one thing that holds me back, I must tell you, it is that today, you are less numerous. I am so grateful to you that it is this perhaps that is going to push me, like that, as best I can, to state some of the things that, necessarily, I continue to cogitate, like that, by habit. The fact also that this morning, my secretary was disturbed a lot, with people asking if I was going to do it, effectively, and since I had not confided in her, she had answered yes. Among them, my God, were some of the best, if I am to believe certain names that were reported to me. So then since they also put themselves out, these, the better ones, I am going to try to have a go at it.

So then let us start from this, let us start from something that I do not hold to particularly: namely, that words have a meaning, and that it is a fact, whatever the problem may be, starting from this fact, of knowing where to lodge them. This indeed is what I have done, lodge these words of course, I must all the same chew things for you, this indeed is the effort that I made, that I made the last time, starting from

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(78) love. It is a fact that I started from the fact that the word exists. And this is why the thing, the thing is to be conceived as possible. Which is expressed in my saying (mon dire) by the fact that the thing, the love thing, is founded, that it is only founded – since it is simply a matter of its possibility – it is founded as I said by ceasing to be written. Namely, on what remains from the fact that it ceases to be written. What remains of it, I articulated since the time, since this almost infinite time for me, that I have been repeating myself, namely, the letter d'(a)mur. The letter d'(a)mur in so far as, in fact, it constitutes nothing other than a pile (tas). A little pile, a petit a of habits, not much more. At least this is how I read, translated into Italian, my famous object with which this petit a of the letters d'(a)mur has only of course the slightest of relationships.

All this does not prevent me saying things which take their air of seriousness from the fact that I am expressing something of the serial. It is a fact, also, that I change the order of the series that is repeated, in other words, that is called ordinary. Is that all that is involved in my saying, changing the ordinary order? It is to this that I would like today to contribute an argument. An argument to give meaning to functions that are more purely cardinal. This is what I am trying to do with my Borromean knot. As you know, this distinction between cardinal and ordinal, it… – the step was taken only thanks to set theory, namely, thanks to Cantor. How can this be of use to us as regards the exploration of a new discourse, as you know, this is how I designate the analytic discourse. This discourse announced itself from a decanting of meaning.

What does decanting (décantage) mean on this occasion? It is properly – and this is why the metaphor of decanting can be sustained here – it is properly about the condensation of what, in terms of meaning, is concentrated by this discourse from the fact that meaning – the meaning of words – are only a garb (appareil) for what we will call if you don't mind nothing more than sexual coitus. This is what is new in analytic discourse. And this indeed is what must be said, if indeed it is what, from this discourse is necessary, it is only necessary in this – and that is why I inflect in this way the meaning of necessary – that its characteristic, in this discourse, is that this discourse does not cease to write it.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Is it true for all that? It is true with the sort of truth that establishes this discourse, namely, a truth of the middle (moyen), if in fact some of you remember the way in which the last time, and precisely (79) concerning love, I distinguished through what is involved in the Borromean knot, the function of the middle as such. The middle precisely, is what only makes a knot because there is an order. Namely, that, to take these 'ones' that the rings of string constitute, let us say quite simply, there is only one of the three which, when cut liberates the two others. This is what you see in a chain of three, with three ordinary links, there is only one of the three that frees the two others. The distinction between this chain, this chain which tangibly, it seems, is of the order of the Symbolic: a subject, a verb and whatever you wish, a complement; a 2, 3, can, having this order, this order that there is something which acts as middle, and this is the very thing that is called, with the ambiguity of this word, the verb – one could begin with the complement and finish with the subject – but it is the verb that acts as middle.

And in this way it can be glimpsed, at the limit, that language for its part is not made of words; for it is the link by which the middle establishes this unity between the first and the last which only has to be broken for the meaning to disappear; this indeed is what shows that language is not made of words, and how what is called – for it is this and nothing more that is called a proposition – a proposition is at least a relative effacing – I am saying that: 'at least relative', to facilitate your access to things – it is the effacing of the meaning of words. Which is not true of the tongue, lalangue as a jingle, you know that I write it in word, lalangue if it, is made up of meaning, namely, how, through the ambiguity of each word, it lends itself, it lends itself to this function that meaning trickles down in it. It does not trickle down in your sayings. Certainly not. Nor in mine either. This indeed is why, this indeed is why meaning is not reached so easily. And this trickling down of which I speak, how imagine it? Make no mistake. How imagine it if it is a trickling that little cups finally bring to a halt? For the tongue is that. And this is even the meaning to give to what ceases to be written. It would be the very meaning of words, which in this case is suspended. This is how the mode of the possible emerges from it. That when all is said and done, something which has been said ceases to be written, this indeed is what shows that at the limit everything is possible with words, precisely on this condition that they no longer have a meaning.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

And the very thing that I am aiming at this year, is that you should not (80) confuse words with letters, since it is only letters that found the necessary, as impossible, in an articulation which is that of logic. If my way of situating the modes is correct, namely, that what does not cease to be written, the necessary – what does not cease to be written, the necessary – is the very thing that necessitates the encounter with the impossible, namely, what does not cease not to be written, which can only be tackled by letters. This indeed what only allows us to tackle by some saying the structure that I designated as the Borromean knot; that is why, the last time, love was a good test for the precariousness of these modes. This love is brought into existence which is indeed the result of its very meaning, by the impossible of the sexual bond with the object, the object whatever may be its origin, the object of this impossibility. It requires as I might say, this root of the impossible. And this is what I said by articulating this principle: that love is courtly love.

It is obvious that the (a)musant in it, if I may express myself thus, is the love of the neighbour in so far as it is sustained by emptying love of its sexual meaning. It is in ceasing to write the sexual meaning of the thing, that one makes it, as is tangible, that one makes it possible. Namely, in so far, it must indeed be said, as one ceases to write it. Once the thing, love, has happened it is obvious that it is starting from there that it imagines itself necessary. This indeed is the meaning of the love letter, which does not cease to be written but only in so far as it preserves its meaning, namely, not for long.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

This is how there intervenes the function of the Real. Love thus proves to be contingent in its origin, and at the same time there is proved the contingency of the truth with regard to the Real. For these modes are veritable and even definable in fact by our pinpointing of writing. They quarter, as I might say, the verification of love, and in a way that by one of its faces, it is certain, founds what is called wisdom. Except for the fact that wisdom cannot in any way be what results from these considerations on love. Wisdom only exists from elsewhere. For in love it is of no use.

For my knot, described as Borromean, and the fact that I strive to make my saying equal to what it comprises, if what it knots together as I state, is properly the Imaginary, the Symbolic and the Real, this only stems from the fact that it commands what I state only by the fact (81) that I tie them with the Borromean knot, that each one of the three is only produced from a consistency which is the same for the three. Namely, that from the angle that I take them this year in my saying, it is only writing that distinguishes them. Which here is tautology, if all three are not written, I have just said that they are the same, it is only writing that makes them three. What must be clearly articulated, is that in this writing of the very knot – because reflect carefully, this knot is only some strokes written on a board – it is in this writing itself that there resides the happening of my saying. My saying in so far as this year I could pinpoint it by carrying out what we could call édupation, if in fact it is by putting the stress on the fact that the non dupes err, which does not prevent this from not meaning that any old dupery does not err, but that it is by yielding to this dupery of making you into a dupe.

Not in Dictionary
the double of the ines.

TAUTOLOGY = the contextual repetition, usually of the same word or phrase, but occasionally of the same idea in different words, esp. as a fault of style.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

a writing in so far as it is correct, that there can be correctly situated the different themes of what emerges, emerges as meaning, precisely from analytic discourse.

At this point I should right away get on with it right away, if something did not tell me that you are already so... groggy, I would say, groggy from this saying, that I must first of all make a filter. which is a mode of writing specified by mathematics at the very source of topology, a filter from which words rediscover their meaning, I mean the way in which they function in the sexual order, which order, it is patent, is only the source of an ordinary. In other words to justify, not them, the terms of this order, but this order of them (d'eux) except for the fact that you are going to see it – because this is what today I have to say not knowing who will follow me – this knot has a quite different function, quite different than founding this order, whatever order in which you could enchain the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real. What we must find, is not the diversity of their consistency, it is this consistency itself, namely, what one cannot say, this consistency itself in so far as it no longer diversifies them but only that it knots them. To emancipate you then, since I presume not unreasonably that I have stunned (sonné) you, I must raie-sonne with you. Namely, I must try again.

The Imaginary is distinguished, is distinguished in meaning from the fact that it is imagined, as someone might say – if in fact that they say it among you – you must all the same look at it more closely, to say then that it is not self-evident, and for this reason which perhaps you (82) may be lacking: that it is not the privilege of the Imaginary. For the Symbolic, what else am I doing except trying to get you to imagine it? Allow me to believe that I am getting there. As regards the Real, well, that's ok, that is what is at stake this year, it is a matter of seeing what Real there is, precisely, in this Borromean knot. And this is why I began, began in my second articulation before you, in my second seminar as this is called, I began by saying that there is no

http://www.lacaninireland.com

initiation. There is no initiation. I mean that there is only the veil of meaning, there is only meaning in what is operculated, as I might say, by a cloud: nuptiae is only articulated when all is said and done from nubes. This is what veils the light which is all there is in the way nuptiae, the rites of marriage, sustain their metaphor.

There is nothing other behind except what one must hold onto, with the support of the semblance, certainly, in so far as this semblance is similar (semblable) to the articulation of what can only be said in the form of a stated truth.

Namely, as necessary, that is to say incessant, unveiling. The articulation is the knot in so far as the light does not illuminate it, that there is no enlightenment, much more: that it rejects all light into the Imaginary. And what I state, what I am aiming at this year, is precisely to tell you that the Imaginary, because it is itself of the order of the veil, is not for all that darkened by it. Consistency is of a different order to the obvious. It is constructed from something of which I think that by supporting it with rings of string, there will get across something of what I am telling you: that it is much more a hollowing out.

The circle, for its part, lends to intuition, it radiates. It is not a matter of obscuring it. It is what makes the One. It is a matter of receiving the effect of the knot. To receive the effect as from its Real, namely, that it is not One. The Real of the Borromean knot, is to hold together only by, I do not dare to say 'being', it is not three: it forms a plait. It forms a plait, and it is here that there must be seen how what I put forward earlier, namely, that the order is not essential in it, is here the important point.

You must clearly sense that it is by ranking them in threes, qua cardinal number – I beg your pardon for the aridity of what I have to say to you today – this, which is proper to the three, implies no

http://www.lacaninireland.com

ordination. No matter how it seems to you, namely, that 1, 2, 3, begins with 1 – no matter how it appears to you, it is not possible to (83) properly order 1, 2, 3 on this simple condition that it is repeated, and this is what happens in the Borromean knot. But it is not simply because of the Borromean knot, it is because of the cardinal numbers 1, 2, 3 whether they are knotted or not.

What does that mean, what I have just said?

It is that in threes, cardinal, one can only – on this single condition that there are not two of the same in succession – one can only manage to write them by finding all the orders such that they can, can be cogitated by a combinatorial.

Write on the board 1, 2, 3, - 1, 2, 3, nothing prevents you from reading them, on the single condition of taking it in the palindromic order, namely, back to front, from left to right, instead of from right to left, instead of from left to right: 1, 3, 2. This means, starting from the knot, from the Borromean knot, something that I am going to try to put on the board for you – give me a piece of chalk – here is how I simplify the Borromean knot. It will be enough for you, to see that this indeed is what is at stake, to complete it in this way, namely, what is summarised by three central strokes in so far as these are what mark how the knot holds together.

I turn this knot over. What is that going to give us? What is proper to a knot, when it is flattened out, an essential dimension. Because the Borromean knot, I think I pointed it out to you when I showed you a little construction in cubes that I brought I no longer know what time, the last time or perhaps the second last time – is made like that: and to avoid the headache of making these little interruptions it should be noted that it is completed by this, this is what constitutes it, it has in, let us say, the three planes on which my little construction was situated, it has on the three planes, complete symmetry, you see

http://www.lacaninireland.com

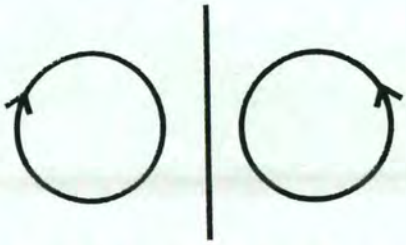
V·2

(84) clearly that here this one is to be put, to make clearly sensed as being underneath the one that cuts it, it is from a flattening out that there comes from the other writing that I gave of the Borromean knot. What is to be said of it from the moment when, having flattened it out, I turn it over? There must be by the simple fact linked to the fact that the writing implies that the 'over-crossing' [English], the croisement supérieur should be written in this way, namely, that it cuts what is the 'under-crossing' the croisement par en dessous, what is that going to give if we turn it over? What was not underneath comes on top. Well then, I think that it will not be necessary for me to complete, to complete these three strokes, for you to clearly see that, by turning over the knot, the Borromean knot, what you are going to find when all is said and done, is something which is distinguished from the fact that it is not its mirror image, that you are going to find, of course, as it would be, for example, for the orientation of each of these circles, if you orientate them, I am not going to go into it yet, if you orientate... any circle whatsoever, if you turn it over, what you have is its mirror image. Far from it, when you turn over the Borromean knot,

http://www.lacaninireland.com



V - 3

(83) you have a... a completely different aspect which in no case represents the mirror image of the first aspect. Far from the direction, the orientation as it is defined, for example very simply, by a watch, make no mistake, the clockwise direction, if you turn over the watch, become the inverse direction, namely, the mirror image. On the contrary, Borromean knot remains what it is when it has been turned over, namely, that the second image, the turned-over image, is exactly in the same direction as the first, namely, laevogyratory. You clearly count on the fact that there can be another direction, namely, this one, which would be dextro, namely, the clockwise direction.

V · 4

V - 5

Given what I pointed out to you earlier, namely, that the order in the three – and by the fact that precisely, it is enough to invert the direction of 1, 2, 3, to go in the palindromic direction to find in it any order whatsoever, you find here a distinction between the effect of order with what you will allow me to call the effect of the knot, or in other words the effect of nodality. This is why it is appropriate, that it

http://www.lacaninireland.com

TERNARITY = A FUNCTION HAVING A THREE ARGUMENTS

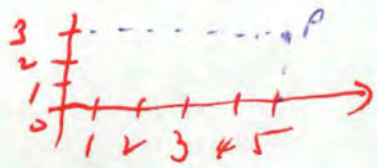
is appropriate for you to remember what I stated first, namely, that it is the pure and simple ternarity of the knot, namely, that the import of this ternarity is only sustained by the fact that we only made them first ...that we only took them from the angle of what does not distinguish (86) them among themselves by any quality that there is no diversification of the Imaginary with respect to the Symbolic and the Real, that their substance is not diverse, that we do not make qualities of them, that we will simply consider them under the species of this consistency which makes each of them one.

Since I use the word quality which is a feminine noun, should I say that their quality is une, it would be a good opportunity to set out here around this one what is involved in terms of one if we take it as qualificative. Does lalangue, lalangue in so far as it has a meaning, does lalangue allow un and une to be considered equal? Is une not a different mode of un? It must be said that this would be a rather comic angle to make duality re-enter at the level of the one. Yad'lun, I said, but also when I said it that it is that with which there is founded what? Uniquely – it was the meaning of what I put forward at the end of my seminar last year – uniquely the numerable, namely, $\aleph_0$, and nothing more, namely, what says it is a One, but in so far as saying 'it is a One,, is to cut it off from any ordination. It is to take it – and this is what only Cantor permits – under its purely cardinal aspect.

DENOTES A QUALITY = aleph 0

Certainly, you will tell me, it can only do it – if in fact you were to say something to me – it can only be done by alienating its unity in the set, as a result of which the elements preserve nothing more of this unity, except that of being open to the fact that one can count them, namely, subjective computation; which does not prevent the objectivity of the one, I will say, only giving rise to a question by the fact that it is surely not without an answer. And this answer is precisely why I state that it is in the three.

OBSERVATION: THE VERTICAL OR Y CO-ORDINATE OF A POINT IN A TWO-DIMENSIONAL SYSTEM OF CARTESIAN CO-ORDINATES, EQUAL TO THE DISTANCE OF THE POINT FROM THE X AXIS MEASURED PARALLEL TO THE Y-AXIS. FOR EXAMPLE IN THE FIGURE BELOW, THE ORDINATE OF P IS 3



http://www.lacaninireland.com

What does the 3 make of the 1, if there is no 2? Is it simply because there are 3 of them, $\aleph_0$ is already there? It is certain that if I state that there is no 2, because this would be to inscribe at the same time in the Real the possibility of the relationship as it is founded from the sexual relationship, is it not only through the three and as I wrote it the other time on the board by the difference between one and three that there proceeds this 2, is it – all of this brings us to asking the question – it was required, for us to take this step, that $\aleph_0$ ceased not to be written? In other words that it is contingency, the happening of Cantor's saying that alone allows us to have a glimpse of what is involved, not in (87) number, but of what constitutes in its ternarity the relationship of the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real. Must we then from the contingency of this saying of Cantor go to the necessary of the fact that this $\aleph_0$ no longer ceases to be written, that it no longer ceases henceforth to be written in order that there should subsist what? Nothing other than a notion of truth.

The truth in effect, up to the present in logic, could only ever consist in contradicting. It is in the dualism of the true and the false. The true only being supposed by knowledge, in so far as knowledge imagines itself – this is its meaning – as the connection between two elements. And it is precisely why it is imaginary if the One, if a One, a third One, does not come to connect it at the cost of making an addition to it. An addition not of the same categorical circle, not of the same order, as I was saying earlier, but coming from nodality.

Well then, since, today, I had to force myself to lead you to there, you will allow me to stay with it, and after all, if there are some people that it discouraged, I do not see for my part any disadvantage, since the only reason that I spoke to you today, was because you were less numerous.

NODALITY = NODE = 1. A POINT AT WHICH TWO OR MORE BRANCHES OF A GRAPH MEET.
2. ANOTHER WORD FOR A VERTEX OF A TREE, NETWORK OR DIGRAPH.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 6: Wednesday 15 January 1974

Voilà. Ah! You saw me the last time a little bit overcome by your number. Since it is... that leaves me with some hope that it will reduce. So then I continue.

The trouble with this number is that – I ~~was~~ thought about it earlier – I am... I am led, anyway, every time to... to be inclined, anyway, towards the fact that if I am speaking to you, this can only be for the first time. Namely, that it is a notion of order. This notion of order obviously embarrasses me and it is what I try to get out of by showing you something else, namely, that there is nodality.

In order to say it, is that not so, the question is to know what unconscious knowledge – there, inevitably, I see clearly that... I see clearly that I am making a link, namely, that I posit unconscious knowledge. I posit it as what works. And what works can work – there is no kind of grip on work except in a discourse. It is a matter of founding what is working in the analytic discourse. If there were not this social bond and this social bond in so far as it is founded by a discourse, the work would be ungraspable. Let us say, with the irony that it involves, that in nature, work is not done. So then, it seems indeed, anyway – this moreover is what grounds nature – that the idea we have of it, is that it is the place, it is the place where work is not done. Knowledge, knowledge qua unconscious, in so far as it works in us, seems then to imply a supposition. It is a supposition, you will tell me, for which we have no need to force ourselves, since in short, (90) we ourselves are the subject, the hupokeimenon, all that means exactly the same thing, namely, that it is supposed that something exists, which is called – that I in fact designated as – the speaking being. Which is a pleonasm, because there is no being except from speaking; if there were not the verb to be, there would be no being at all. Nevertheless, nevertheless, we know well that the word to exist has taken on a certain weight. A weight in particular though the quantifier, the quantifier of existence. The quantifier of existence, in reality, has completely displaced the meaning of this word ex-sist, and if I even can write as I have written it: ex hyphen sist, it is precisely there how... how... how there is marked the originality of this quantifier.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Only there you are. The originality only displaces the order, namely, that what ex-sists, is what is supposed to be original. It is starting from existence that we find ourselves questioning again what is involved, what is involved in supposition. A simple displacement, in short. And what I am trying, what I am trying to, what I am trying to do, this year, huh, with my non-dupes, is to see what one must, in short, be a dupe of for all of that to hold together, and for it to hold together in a consistency. And that is why I am introducing this ternary, or more exactly that I notice that by starting, because of having started from this ternary, of the Symbolic the Imaginary and the Real, I ask a question, or more exactly, since for every question, for every question it is from the answer that it started... from the answer which, in maintaining, in maintaining as distinct, the Real, makes us ask the question: where is this knowledge situated, this unconscious knowledge that... which we are worked over by on in the analytic discourse. It is quite certain that it is the discourse that makes us stick, the psychoanalytic discourse, that makes us stick to this knowledge in a way that has no precedent, has no precedent in History.

$\frac{0}{S_2}$

Saying the same thing twice.

The old debate of Lacan that there is a substance underneath. Hupokeimenon is Aristotle's word for Subject. The word has been lost in favour of Cogito – a subject. The substance is not the res.

Substance became a dominant notion but Le Gaufey that is not the way Speaking Beings operate.

Quantifier Logic – Instead of saying "all men are mortal" – you get busy for it by saying "there is no man who is not mortal" – He includes them in the formula of seduction.

$\forall x \ldots$

$\exists x \ldots$

New Logic of Quantifiers – Frege – there is no man who is not mortal. 'Exist' does not mean it in the new Logic. We would not have a subject without language – He wants to be.

The non-dupes err. ∴ You must be a dupe of something – i.e. you have to become a dupe of the unconscious knowledge

The History of Thought before Freud →

Modal Logic (Aristotle yes not)

Necessary	Contingent
Possible	Impossible

Pro (or Dark)

there exists does not mean there is a substance. Ex-sist → it emerges from something as the Nothing.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Sanity does not cease to be written " cease not to be written etc.

Lacan bases the nature of love on the contingent
" also " " sexual relation " " (the gap is not in of Quantifying Logic but the greatest break-through in the 19th century.

The modal Values in Book are
- divine
- human
-

etc. They link not Aristotelian modal Logic

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Why after all could we not consider this discourse itself as contingent since it starts from a saying (un dire), from a saying that constitutes a happening, the one that I am trying to… that I am trying to prolong before you, and the question of the contingency of this saying, is indeed what we are turning around. If this saying is only contingent, and moreover this is what we have to account for, where is the Real situated? Is the Real never anything but supposed?

(91) In this knot, this knot that I put forward, in this knot, this knot made up of the Symbolic and of the Imaginary in so far as it is simply something which with, with, makes three, that knots then, it is the Real that is at stake. The Real stems from the fact that they are three. Why is the Real three? It is a question that I ground, that I justify from the fact that there is no sexual relationship. In other words, that I specify, that I specify from something that can be written, as a result of which, as a result of which what is written, is that, for example, there does not exist an f, an f such that between x and y which here signify the foundation of such and such speaking beings, to be chosen from the male part or the female, this, function which would constitute the relationship, this function of the man with respect to the woman, this function of the woman with respect to the man, there does not exist one that can be written.

$$\overline{\exists f} \cdot f(x, y)$$

This is the thing, the thing that I am putting forward before you, this is what, somewhere – because I repeat myself like everyone else, you are not the only ones who notice it – this is what I already stated under the name of the Freudian thing; it is there in all its length and breadth and of course, it passed completely unnoticed for a simple reason, which is that we remain in this Imaginary. In this Imaginary which is precisely what is put in question by the slightest experience of the analytic discourse, it is that there is nothing more fuzzy than belonging (l'appartenance), than belonging to one of two sides: the one that I designate by x and the other by y, precisely by the fact, that at the same time I must note that there is no function that links them. So then, it is a matter of knowing how, all the same, it functions, namely, that all the same people fuck within it.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

In stating that, I must all the same take off from something which is a... a supposition, a supposition that, there is a subject male or female. This is a supposition that experience quite obviously renders untenable, and which implies that what I am putting forward, that what I am putting forward as a statement by my stating, by the stating of which I am only the subject inasmuch as I am working myself in the analytic discourse, that I must not put the subject under this x and under this y. It must be then that the statement – and already simply by writing it on the board – it must be then that my statement does not imply a subject. If there is something, if there is something that is found written there, it is that there is no question of a subject except in (92) the function, and precisely that what I am writing is that under this function, precisely because it is denied, there is no existence. The there does not exist, means that: there is no function. What is at stake, what is at stake, is to prove that if this function has no existence, this is not simply a contingent matter it is a matter of the impossible.

It is a matter of the impossible, and to prove it is no small matter. It is no small matter because the fact is by simply writing, by simply stating, even only in writing, the thing does not hold up until there is proof of the contrary, namely, until the moment, until the moment where something contingent denies this saying, and by good luck – as I might say - good luck (bon heur), the two words separate, are written f(x,y), there is a function which knots the x and the y, and that it has ceased not to be written.

For it to have ceased not to be written, it must be possible, and up to a certain point it remains so, since what I am putting forward, is that it has ceased to be written. Why would that not begin again? Not only is it possible, it is possible that one might write f(x,y) but it is clear that people have not deprived themselves of it. To demonstrate the impossible then, one must take one's foundation elsewhere. Elsewhere than in these precarious writings since after all, they have ceased, and that from the moment they have ceased, one might believe that it can start up again. This indeed is the relationship between the possible and the contingent.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

By basing myself on the knot so that something of the impossible can be demonstrated, what am I doing? I am basing myself – perhaps the question deserves to be raised – on a topology.

People want order in the relationship between the sexes, but it's not the same order [and] in the psychoanalytic discourse.

Since as regards what is involved in order, well then one can say that it is indeed what, up to the present, has not been lacking, namely, that it is in order to establish order that people support everything that has been able to be put forward about the relationship described as sexual. It is true that as regards this order, people have got their paws in a bit of a tangle in it, and that it is certain that it is not the same, it is not the same order, in any case, that is established, that is established by what analytic discourse puts forward, or appears to put forward, about what concerns the sexual relationship. The order 1, 2, 3, well, there is a 1 that comes first, and it is not by chance – we do not know moreover which comes first – it is not by chance that it is the 1, since the second (93) seconds it and that the third simply results from their addition. This gives a sequence that has been qualified as natural. Which leaves us something to ponder on. Which leaves us something to ponder on all the more because the last time I remarked to you that in writing them in a sequence, the privilege of these first three, in fact it is enough to take them in reverse for every order to be possible. It is enough in effect that there should be 1, 2, 3, or 1, 3, 2, this is what I mean by taking them in reverse, for the six other ways of arranging the 1, 2, 3, to be possible.

This comes back to the point which Solaris did last week

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The idea of a successor, is that not so, and that, in terms of successor there is only one, only one in the natural sequence of numbers, this is an idea that was only separated out rather late, which is rather curious, because it really seemed it was the most tangible, the most real thing there is about the natural sequence. Why should there not be a multitude of successors? It is not self evident. We have a crowd of examples, that of the tree in particular, of the tree that we encounter everywhere, towards our descendants as towards our predecessors, why should the idea of a successor be inherent to a privileged sequence of successors being founded on the fact that there is only one of them?

If you look at a fractal tree you have a whole range of successors. The notion of a natural sequence was only hinted in (19).

That there are three of them in a particular case, a particular privileged case, is certainly related to the fact that there is something of the One. Yad'lun, that is how I expressed myself. But it is quite imaginable that the three should not be taken in order. That is not new, huh, the famous triangle that the Greeks profited from – the profit that you know – rests on that, and with, and with that, all the geometry that they extracted from it, and through which for a long time the clear idea took priority over the distinct. The clear and distinct ides, as they say! As a result it was more geometrico, that things were proved for centuries and that this was an ideal and still remains one. The link between measure and the phenomenon of the shadow (I underline phenomenon), namely, with the Imaginary, in so far as it presupposes light, established this order that is called harmonic, established, founded, everything that is involved in proportion, a proportion which was the only foundation of measure, and established an order, an order which served to construct a Physics.

In the end. All Greek geometry is based on notion of pole to orbit the sun. You get a triangle between Top of pole & the shadow. This is imaginary.

The shadow is a phenomenon & not a noumenon. What happens when the light goes out?

It is from there that there started this idea of supposition. Because, by founding things on this Imaginary, there had to be something else behind: a sub-stance, it is the same thing, it is the same word as supposition, subject and everything that follows from it. This whole (94) business was far, as I might say, far too phenomenal. When I

This is Plato. If you have something in the world there must be something behind it.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

testify, when I say that the knot, is what cogitates me, and that my discourse - in so far as it is the analytic discourse – that my discourse testifies to it, it happens that, because I have taken a few more steps than you, that this knot is Borromean, on this occasion, this knot, but it could be a different one. Even if it were a different one, my question, my question of knowing, of knowing how this is related to what distinguishes topology, to what distinguishes the topology of space founded by the Greeks, space in so far as it gave a prime matter to be disengaged from supposition.

What does topology presuppose? Topology only presupposes, only presupposes, as regards what is involved in space a consistency – you know that or you do not know it, in any case, I cannot give you a course in topology, but it is not ruled out that you might consult a mathematical text in which this notion is elaborated, starting from the abandonment of measure as such, namely, whatever may be the relativity of this measure, since moreover it is only produced from homothety, in order to know the time and the height of the sun, we have nothing except the relationship of the shadow with the stick that projects it, and that it is on a triangle that there rests everything about measure. Topology for its part, elaborates a space which only starts from the following, from the definition of neighbourhood, of proximity, it has the same meaning, it is a definition of the neighbour (proche), which starts……from an axiom, namely, that everything that forms part of a topological space, if it is to be put in a neighbourhood, implies that there is something else that is in the same neighbourhood. The pure notion of neighbourhood already implies then triplicity, and is not founded, is not founded on anything that unites each of these triple elements, if not that they belong to the same neighbourhood. It is a space that is only supported from the continuity that is deduced from it, because in topology there are no other relationships described as continuous except those founded on the neighbourhood and at the same time imply what I will call – which is not said, stated, formulated as such in topology – what I will call

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It can be put into any shape

malleability. This is what the mathematicians for their part call continuous distortion. You see that the reference to the continuous is in the word, and joined, stuck, to the word distortion, which, to be more correct is stated as: continuous transformation.

These are also images. But it must be said, they are less well grasped. The fact that I talk about grasping, Begriff, begrifflich implies a (95) reference to what is well grasped, namely, solid. The supple is less well grasped, if you take it in your hand. The idea, the idea that grounds topology, mathematically defined, is to tackle what is involved from the fact that it supports, it is topology which, here, supports, it is not a subject that is supposed to it; what topology supports, the idea, is to tackle it without an image, not to suppose to them, not to suppose to these letters, as they ground topology, not to suppose to them anything but the Real. The Real in so far as it does not add… - do you notice that this term is still excessive, since it evokes addition – as it does not add, to what we are able to distinguish as the Imaginary, this suppleness linked to the body, or as Symbolic, the fact of denominating the neighbourhood, the continuity, that it only adds something, the Real, and not from the fact that it is third, but from the fact that all of them make up three. And that this is all the Real they have, nothing more. I mean each and every one. It is the only Real they have. This does not seem much, but it is not nothing.

Very mysterious. Its not clear why the Real should be this.

It is not nothing since, as has been clearly felt from all time, it is precisely on this that the Real was supposed. It is a matter of ousting it from this position of supposition which when all is said and done subordinates it, subordinates it to what one imagines or to what one symbolises. The only Real they have, is that they make up three. Here, three is not a supposition thanks to the fact that we have, thanks to the theory of sets, elaborated the cardinal number as such. What must be seen, what you must support, is the following: it is to put in question, to put in question that it is not a model, which would be of the order of the Imaginary. It is not a model because, because with respect to this three, you are not its subject imagining or symbolising it you are, you are squeezed (coincés): you are only – qua subjects – you are only the patients of this triplicity.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

You are the patients, first of all, because, it is already in the tongue. There is no tongue in which the three is not stated. It is in the tongue, and it is also in the functioning that is called language, namely, the logical structure such that, quite naively, in fact, the first one who began in that, for example – the first as far as we know, of course – the first as far as we know, namely, Aristotle, in fact, the one whose writings we have precisely, he had to manipulate the thing with little letters, and it cannot be manipulated without there being three of them. Apart from the following, of course, apart from the fact of course that there remained something of the supposition of the Real, and that he did not believe he could support this Real by any other thing than the particular, the particular which he imagines is the individual, while precisely, in situating it in logic as particular, he clearly shows that of the individual, he only had… a quite imaginary notion. The particular is a logical function and that he gave it as a support to the individual body is very precisely, in fact, the sign that he needed a supposition. A saying that supposes nothing, except that the triple is the Real, I said triple, namely, three, not third, it is in this that there consists the saying that I am constrained to put forward through the question of non-relationship, of non-relationship in so far as it specifically touches what is involved in the subjectifying of the sexual. My saying consists in this Real, in this Real which is what the three insists on, insists to the point of being marked in the tongue.

It is not a matter here of a thought, since qua thought it is, as I might say, still virginal; and moreover thought, with respect to what is supported by this advancing of the three, of the three as knot, and as nothing else, thought is only what I earlier called what is cogitated, namely, a black dream, the one in which, commonly, you dwell. For

http://www.lacaninireland.com

if there is something that analytic experience initiates you into, it is that what is closest to lived experience, to lived experience as such, is the nightmare. There is nothing that is more of an obstacle to thought, even to thought that claims to be clear and distinct: learn to read Descartes as a nightmare, that will make you progress a little. How can you even not notice that this guy who says to himself: I think therefore I am, is a bad dream?

The happening for its part, the happening is only produced in the order of the Symbolic. There is no happening except the saying. I think that, in the century in which you live, you should all the same be able to see that every day. This flood of information, as I might say, in the midst of which you may be astonished that you still subsist, that you preserve your common sense, namely, that in the last analysis you do not make too much, huh, of what the paper announces every morning. Well, thank God, it runs off you, as they say, like the water off a duck's back... Otherwise, where would you end up? There must indeed all the same be something fallacious, in which alas, the (97) misunderstanding of my saying – I mean the very one that I am giving you here, in so far as I am myself its victim – to which it must then be that a certain saying, the saying about the said, has contributed, for you to be able to believe that in what holds your body together, it is a circulation of information starting from some places or other, first of all from the DNA, as we are told, or from the DN something or other, that it is on this that you are supported, that everything is only, in short ... only a piece of information about which luckily we are warned in fact, that this information only holds up by violating one of the very foundations of that which moreover is built up as energetics, is not all of this also of the order of cogitation? Are we in other words obliged to take account of it when what we have to deal with in politics what we have to deal with, is a type of information whose meaning has no other import than to be imperative, namely, the signifier One. It is in order to command us, in other words, so that our noses will follow, that all information, in our epoch, is poured out as such.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

In what I state to you then about a certain saying, the important thing is nothing other than the consequences that it may have. Again, in order that it may have its consequences, I must take trouble over it. This saying is only veritable – here I am putting it forward in the more than probable case that you have not noticed it - it is only veritable in so far as it constitutes a limit to the import, to the import of what interests us in the very first place, in analytic discourse, in that it puts a limit to the import of the truth.

There was formerly like that an... an office boy who cried out after each one of my seminars, cries which were resumed in: "Why does he not tell us the true about the true?"

This character is well known, there was even confided in him the care of a Vocabulaire... I did not say the true about the true, for the reason that I can only say this about it: it is that the true is what contradicts the false. But on the contrary I can say, I can say but again I had to spend some time on it, for there is a time for everything, I can tell the truth about the truth.

The truth is that it cannot be said, since it can only be half-said. The truth is only founded, as I have just said, on the supposition of the false: it is contradiction. It is only grounded on the no. Its statement is only the denouncing of non-truth. It says nothing except by the half-. Let us say the word it is mi-métique (mimetic); it is from the (98) Imaginary. And this indeed is why we are forced in my opinion to take this path. It is from the Imaginary in so far as the Imaginary, is the false second, with respect to the Real, in so far as the male, in the speaking being, is not the female, and that he has no other angle from which to posit himself. Only, these are not angles with which we can be satisfied. It has got to the point that one can say that the unconscious is defined by this and by nothing but this: that it knows more than this truth, and that the man is not the woman.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Even Aristotle did not object to that! First of all how could he, huh? To say no man is a woman would have been really cheeky, especially in his time! So then he didn't do it... if he had said every man is not a woman... Huh? Well then you see, huh, you see the meaning that takes on: that of an exception; there are some of them who are not. It is as all that he is not a woman. Here, the $\forall$ of the quantifier, huh, the quantifier of x, full stop, and y barred:

$$\forall x . \overline{y}$$

Only the annoying thing is that it is not at all true and that it is obvious that it is not true. The only thing that one could write, is that there does not exist an x of which one can say that it is not true that to be a man is not to be a woman:

$$\overline{\exists x . \overline{xy}}$$

All of this, of course, it must be noted in passing, presupposes that the One is triple. Namely, that, there is the One of which one makes the all, namely, what is unified as such, there is the One which means any one whatsoever, namely, what I will tell you later, and then there is the unique One, which alone grounds the all.

To deny the unique One, is the meaning of the bar over the quantifier of existence. As regards any one whatsoever, it must be considered as a pure void. That unconscious knowledge is topological, namely, that it only holds up from the proximity of neighbourhood, not of order, is why I am trying to say, to ground on it that it is nodal. Which is to be expressed by the fact that it is written or is not written. It is written when I write it, when I make the Borromean knot, and when you try at that instant to see how it holds together, namely, that you make of it... that you break one, two others wander off. It is no longer written.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

And it is here that it is seen that the convergence of the nodal and the modal is initiated.

(99) So then this unconscious knowledge is not supported by the fact that it insists, but by the traces that this insistence leaves. Not of the truth, but of its repetition in so far as it is qua truth that it is modulated. Here I must introduce what grounds neighbourhood as such. Neighbourhood as such is founded on the notion of open. Topology immediately plays this card. It is on sets as open that it is founded. And this indeed is why it tackles, it tackles from the correct angle the fact that the class does not close. Namely, that it accepts the paradox, the paradox which is only a paradox because of predicative logic, namely, that if logic simply renounced being, namely, if propositional logic were purely and simply crossed out, there would be no problem, the problem, if there is one, the problem designated as paradox, being simply this: that the class Man is not a man. All the paradoxes come down to that.

What does that mean, except that at the limit what we can designate as Man is an open set, which is obvious?

So then let us clearly see that the truth has a limit on one side, and that is why it is half saying. But on the other side it is limitless, it is open. And that indeed is why unconscious knowledge can inhabit it, because unconscious knowledge is an open set.

You see, you see, I am flaunting it, huh, that love plagues me. You too, of course. But not like me! Yeah…that is even why, a parenthesis, your number makes me uncomfortable: for some time, I can no longer identify you to a woman. That pisses me off.

Good love, I will say then since – you will excuse me, that this plagues me – love is the truth, but only in so far as it is starting from it, starting from a cut, that there begins a different knowledge than

http://www.lacaninireland.com

propositional knowledge, namely, unconscious knowledge. It is the truth in so far as it cannot be said about the subject, in so far as what is supposed, as what is supposed to be able to be known about the sexual partner. Love is two half-sayings that do not overlap. And this is what gives it its fatal character. It is the irremediable division. I mean why it cannot be remedied (remédier), which implies, which implies that the 'médier' might already be possible. And precisely, it is not only irremediable, but without any mediation. It is the connectiveness between two knowledges in so far as they are irremediably distinct. (100) When that happens, it creates something … quite privileged. When the two unconscious knowledges overlap that makes an awful hotchpotch.

And here, I am going to put forward, at the end of this speech (laïus) this indeed is the proper word – I am going to put forward something which… is like that, anyway, that settles things: masculine knowledge, in the speaking being, is irremediably a track (une erre); it is a cut, initiating a closing, precisely, that of the start, this is not its privilege; but it starts in order to close; and it is because it does not get there that it ends up by closing without noticing it. This masculine knowledge, in the speaking, is the ring of string. It goes around in circles. In it there is something of the One at the start, as a stroke that is repeated moreover without being counted, and by turning round in circles it closes, without even knowing there are three of these rings. How can it, how can we suppose that it gets there, to know some little thing about this elementary distinction. Well then, luckily, for that, there is a woman. I already told you that the woman – naturally this is what results from what I already wrote on the board, that the woman does not exist – but a woman … can happen, when there is a knot, or rather a plait.

It is a curious thing, the plait, is only produced from the fact that it imitates the male speaking being, because it can imagine him, it sees him strangled by these three categories that suffocate him. He is the only one who does not know it up to then. She sees him imaginarily, but it is an imagination of his unity, namely, of what the man identifies himself with. Not of his unity as unconscious knowledge, because unconscious knowledge remains rather open. So then, with this unity, she completes a plait. To make a Borromean knot, as I told you, six gestures are necessary and six gestures thanks to which, thanks to which they are in the same order, except for the fact that precisely, nothing allows them to be recognised. That indeed is why one must make six of them, namely, exhaust the order of permutations two by two, and know in advance that one must not make more, otherwise one makes mistakes. This indeed is why, in fact, a woman is not at all necessarily trained (dressée), so that it is not at all necessarily with the same element that she completes the round when all is said and done. That is even why she remains a woman, among others, because she is defined by the plait that she is capable of, well then, this plait, it is not at all inevitable that she knows that it is at the end of six that it holds together to make a Borromean knot. It is not at all sure that…she knows either that the three has a relationship to the (101) Real, she may lack the distinction, so that it makes a knot, as I might say that is still more knotted, from a unit still more one. In the best case, huh, in the best case, it may be that…it only makes one, of cord, of ring of string when all is said and done. It is enough for you to imagine, is that not so, that the 1, 2, 3 joins up with 2, 3, 1. This will make a still more beautiful (beau) knot, if I can express myself thus, is that not so. I mean that everything is continued in everything, and after all, it nonetheless remains a knot, because if you have made a plait, that inevitably gives something, something which knots inevitably at least two, and if two of the strands join up, well then, that will make something that will be knotted or not knotted to the third. That is not where the question lies. The failure, as I might say, of this affair, namely, that by which the woman does not exist, is indeed how, the very thing by which she manages to succeed the sexual union. Only this union is the union of one with two, or of each one with each one, each one of these three strands. Sexual union, as I might say, is internal to its threading (filage). And this is where she plays her role, by clearly showing what a knot is, it is that by which man for his part succeeds in being three. Namely, because the Imaginary, the Symbolic and the Real are only distinguished by being three, quite crudely. Namely, that... without her subject discovering itself, it is starting from this triplicity by which a woman, sometimes, reaches her success by failing it, namely, by which she is satisfied as realising in herself sexual union, it is starting from there that the man begins to grasp, by a little common sense, the idea that a knot is of some use.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

http://www.lacaninireland.com

+ also plays the man.

I told you that the hysteric makes the man. But it is as formed by the hysteric that man starts from the idea, the first idea, the right one, the one that leaves him a little chance, starts from the idea that he knows nothing. Which is moreover her own case, because she makes the man. She does not know that sexual union only exists in her and by chance. She knows nothing, but the man finds himself due to the backlash noticing this knot. And that gives in him a second result which is quite different in short: it is that by refusing his open knowledge, at the same time, he closes it. He constitutes the correct Borromean knot. He accedes to the fact that the only Real is the 3, he knows, he knows that, he knows that when he speaks to say nothing, but to obtain effects, that he imagines with all his force that these effects are effective, even though they go round in circles, and that he supposes the Real, as is appropriate, since supposing it involves (102) nothing, nothing except preserving his mental health. Namely, to be in conformity with the norm of man, with the norm of man which consists in the fact that he knows that there is something impossible and that, as was said by this charming woman, in fact, that I quoted for you already: 'Nothing is impossible for man, what he cannot do he leaves'. This is what is called mental health. In particular never to write the sexual relationship in itself, except in the lack of his desire, which is nothing but its squeezing in the Borromean knot. This is why I expressed for the first time, some time ago, but there are people that have only noticed it now, I was able to affirm – it is true that it is someone who, who only had notes, anyway to inform himself: 'I ask you to refuse what I offer you because it is not that'. Not what I desire that you to accept, nor to arrive at anything whatsoever of this kind, because I am only dealing with this knot itself.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 7: Wednesday 12 February 1974

Good, well then I was hoping... I learned late that there were what are called the Mardi gras holidays, precisely because it is not Mardi gras. So then I have kept to my... my something or other, my seminar, did I not, I kept to it today because I was hoping that thanks to that I... could perhaps walk among you because you would be less numerous, and in short talk a little with the people who are supposed to be listening to me. True you are a little less numerous which allows me moreover to do so, but anyway, I regret not having had this opportunity to express myself in a more familiar and direct way. There you are. (VOILA)

On this point... on this point I announce to you, a sort of a little booklet like that has just come out (Dr Lacan tosses the booklet into the audience) that I am sending you, there is an inset in it, the inset is as interesting as the booklet, so that it works just as well if it is not the same people who received it. There you are. In principle – in principle, this is supposed to be shown on television – give the inset to someone else... there you are. It is the questions that Jacques-Alain Miller was good enough to ask me in the hope of making... Télévision. Naturally, naturally it is a completely unwarranted hope: he asked me the questions he is capable of asking me, starting from the idea that he is doing television. He asked me Kantian questions in particular, as if (104) everyone was a Kantian, but up to a certain point it is true, everyone is Kantian, so that the questions that he asked me simply there in a translation in "OCTOBER"

http://www.lacaninireland.com

gave me an opportunity to... an opportunity to answer at what is presumed to be a television level by Jacques-Alain Miller. The result seemed to me all the same worth being remembered since I had it published. There you are.

So ~~then~~ now, I am going to talk to you a little, today, trying to remain on the note of what I was hoping. What I was hoping to tell you, was in short, it was something, let us say, in general, like that, whose aim, anyway, you can give it the title that you wish – whose aim was to tell you, to tell you the difference (this is what appeared to me, this is what appeared to me important in what I am trying to bring you this year) to tell you the difference between the true and the Real.

As you have perhaps noticed, is that not so, I advanced this year with you, I advanced this year with you, as in Courteline's La paix chez soi, is that not so, 'the whatsit on one side and the thingamajig on the other', this is all she succeeded in obtaining, the little woman, buying some chandelier or other, anyway which precisely is in two pieces... anyway, contrary to her, my three pieces, namely, the three, the three consistent rings with which the Borromean knot is set up, this is what I am holding in my hand in order to speak to you about the non-dupes err. This does not seem to have a direct relationship, an immediate one at least, it is not self-evident. But you know perhaps that one of these... one of these three rings, I denominate, I denominate as Real, the two others being the Imaginary and the Symbolic, and that it is around that that I am trying to get you to sense something.

To get you to sense this, first of all what I already put forward, but this does not inevitably leaped to your eye, is that not so, is that, is that precisely I take them simply from this angle that they are three, that they are three and equally consistent. This is a first way of tackling, of tackling what is involved in the Real. It is quite certain that the Real, is what makes them three, without for all that the third being what makes them three. If they are added to one another, it is only to make three. And precisely they are not added together. Because each one of the three is added on just as much, without for all that, without for all that being the third. It is only there because the two others do not constitute a knot without three, if I can express myself thus.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

And this is what I would like to say to you: that logic can only be defined by being the science of the Real. The annoying thing, is that it (105) only talks and it only starts from the true. It did not immediately begin like that. There was perhaps, as all the same on the whole, anyway you know, there was someone called Aristotle who opened up the question. Obviously the word true, to alethes, is found a lot in this thing that he calls the Organon from which logic has since been constructed. He opened up the path, he worked things out as best he could, and the trouble, currently in our business with the Organon, is that it cannot appear without half the page being taken up by, let us say, commentaries on the Organon, which are not at all properly speaking what one can call commentaries, but a certain way of organifying about the Organon, namely, making it edible.

This begins with a certain Alexander, another who was called Simplicius, and then later someone called Pacius, and then after that anything you like, a Peter of Spain, a St Thomas Aquinas, anyway, thanks to that, the thing was, anyway, completely diverted. It has got to the point that it is not at all easy, because despite everything we have a kind of scumble, we have a smattering of these different authors, and we hear them, we hear Aristotle, despite everything, through them.

It would be good if someone, if someone managed to make the effort, in short to read, to read for example, just this, which is the second volume of this Organon, to read what is called – what is called, it is because it has been entitled that, it is also a title that came later, it is called Prior analytics – managed to read, not of course in a first impression, because someone who might read it in a first impression, simply, will not understand it any more than on the whole, anyway you understand what I am talking about, namely, not a lot... The thing that someone must absolutely manage to do some day, is precisely to get to know well enough the difference between what Aristotle said and what has been transmitted. In fact, those who have sifted out the thing to see well enough in it the difference by seeing the degree to which Aristotle opened things up and how he opened things up and why not, even the places where he slipped up, where he twisted his ankle, where... it's a whole world! Yeah...

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is quite clear that I am not adding anything on here. Or rather what I am adding on, is designed to propose, anyway at least a task, namely, up to what point, and in Aristotle, it seems to me, one can (106) grasp, the degree to which it is a clearing of the ground (un frayage) and a clearing of the ground that is only illuminated starting from the fact that I stated just now: that logic is properly the science of the Real.

Steady point.

In Aristotle we are not all that encumbered by the true. He does not talk about the true in connection with the predicate. He is stumbling, of course, and because of that people believed that they were obliged to do the same, they speak about man, about animal, about living being (vivant), on occasion, and again, here I am saying things that immediately have a vague sense. Man, animal, living being, all dovetail; every animal is living, every man is an animal, as a result of which man is living... yeah... It is quite clear from this start, as what followed moreover clearly showed, that all of that means nothing. In other words, that the true, in the affair, is altogether out of season, displaced.

And what renders it tangible, what renders it tangible, is that it is... these compartments, is that not so, these... that he fills as he can with these, for example these three words that I have just said: man,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

animal, and living being, is that not so, he can moreover put anything whatsoever, is that not so, the swan, blackness... in fact anything else, the white... the white is found everywhere, we do not know what to do with it; it is mademanifest in what I called his clearing of the ground, that these terms, his whole effort, is precisely to be able to do without them. Namely, that he empties them of meaning, and he empties them of meaning in this way that he replaces them by letters, namely, α, β, γ, for example, instead of my first three terms, there that I extracted for you, which are in Aristotle... he says is that not so, it only begins to take shape starting from the moment when he will announce that all β... all α is β, all γ is β... no, all β is γ, as a result of which everything will be γ. In other words, he proceeds by way of being able to qualify two of these terms, those that make the connection, of middle, as a result of which he will be able to establish a relation between these two extremes. That is why at the start, from the start, it can be felt that it is not the true that is at stake. Because it matters little that such an animal should be white or not, everyone knows that there are black swans – des cygnes c-y-g-n-e-s - the important thing is that something should be articulated thanks to which there is introduced the Real as such.

It is not for nothing that in the syllogism, there are three terms: the two extremes and the middle. The fact is when all is said and done – I say 'when all is said and done' because it is only a first attempt – everything happens as if there was something like a presentiment of (107) the Borromean knot. Namely, that right away he puts his finger from the moment that he tackles the Real, on the fact that there must be three. Obviously these three, he handles completely wrongly, namely, he imagines that they hold together two by two. This is an error. He imagines that they hold together two by two, and even, up to a certain point, one can express the thing by saying that he makes them concentric. Namely, that there is the sphere of the living, for example, then inside the sphere of animals – the sphere or the ring –

http://www.lacaninireland.com

and then more inside again the sphere of men. This is what is called 'translating in extension'. Naturally, people have worked on it, because they are just as perplexed by it as by a term that I use a lot, but it is not without a raison d'être: people are perplexed by it like a fish with an apple.

To allow you to relax, I am making here a clear parenthesis. It has nothing to do with Aristotle, because Aristotle, had not the slightest idea of it... Me, for example, I am perplexed by your number, exactly like a fish with an apple. And nevertheless there are other moments when I say to you that the relationships of my saying with, anyway, this audience precisely that I do not know what to do with, are of the order of the relationships of a man with a woman. I will point out this to you like that, something I found this morning, that leaped to my eyes, that... well then, that it is already in Genesis. What Genesis indicates to us by Eve's offer, is nothing other than this: that man – here there is a vacillation at that moment, it is the woman, but as I told you, the woman does not exist, is that not so, but just like Aristotle, hesitates a little, I do not see why Genesis, even though inspired, should have done any less, and that this offer of the apple is very exactly what I am saying, namely, that there is no relationship between the man and the woman, which is incarnated very manifestly by the fact that, as I underlined, the woman does not exist, the woman is not not-all, and from that the result is that man with a woman is as perplexed about her as a fish with an apple, which normalises our relationships, and which allows me to assimilate them to something of which it would be a lot to say to say that it is love, because in truth, I do not experience the slightest feeling of love for you. And no doubt it is reciprocal, as I stated: in what is involved in love, feelings are always reciprocal. That's a parenthesis, let us come back to Aristotle.

(108) Aristotle what? Shows clearly that the true, is not at all what is in operation. Thanks to the fact that he clears the ground, that he opens up the business of his science that I am calling the Real, of the

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Real, namely, of the three, at the same time he demonstrates that he only gets to the three by opening things up by means of writing, namely, that from the first steps in the syllogism, it is because he empties these terms of all meaning by transforming them, by transforming them into letters, namely, into things which of themselves mean nothing, this is how he takes the first steps in what I called the science of the Real.

What is logic thus conceived, caught hold of by that end, what is logic doing in analytic discourse?

The reason why you are in short, as I complain, so numerous hearing me, it is in the measure that what I am conveying is what is emitted by analytic discourse. In analytic discourse things proceed in a different way and that is why – and that is why you are there – in so far as here I am drawing it out; what constitutes the body of what I am saying, is something quite different to what, up to the present, logic has been founded on, namely, the said (des dits). The said that is manipulated. Aristotle does it, but as I have just told you, the characteristic of his step forward is to empty this said of its meaning. And it is in this way that he gives us an idea of the dimension of the Real. There is no way to trace the paths of logic, except by passing through writing. This is what Aristotle demonstrates from his first steps, and this is the way the written shows itself to be of a different dimension to the saying.

On the contrary what holds you, what excites you, and what will no doubt excite you more and more, is that the true saying is something quite different. The true saying, is as I might say the groove, this is what defines it, the groove along which there passes what... what it must indeed supply for the absence, for the impossibility of writing, of writing as such the sexual relationship. If the Real is indeed what I am saying, namely, what is only opened up by writing it, it is indeed what justifies my putting forward that the hole, the hole that will ensure, that ensure forever the impossibility of writing the sexual relationship as such, this is what we are reduced to, as regards what it is, this sexual relationship, to realise it all the same.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

There are little channels, there are things that weave in and out, there are things that one gets lost in, but where one gets lost in such a way that this is properly what constitutes what is described as the metaphor of the labyrinth. One never gets to the end of it, but the important (109) thing is not that, it is to show why one never gets to the end of it, namely, to tightly circumscribe what is happening when what is at stake, everything by which we touch the Real, of that which no doubt ensures that the Real. We have, like that, a proper and distinct idea of the Real, the Real is what is determined by the fact that there cannot in any way be written in it the sexual relationship. And it is from this that there results what is involved in the true saying, at least what the practice of the analytic discourse demonstrates, it is that by saying true – namely, stupidities, those that come to us, those that drip out of us like that – that one manages to open the path towards something as regards which it is not altogether contingent that sometimes and by error, it ceases not to be written, as I define the contingent, namely, that this leads to establishing between two subject something which has the air of being written like that: hence the importance of what I give to what I said about the letter d'amur.

This distinction that specifies analytic discourse, which allowed me to discern it among four others that were there because... they really seem, like that, to live, and not only do they seem, but they are infinitely more robust than the analytic discourse which has still everything to do as regards clearing its path. Analytic discourse not only reserves the place of the truth, but it is properly speaking what allows to be said what, as regards the sexual relationship, flows in it, fills the groove. It is very important. It is very important because this completely changes the meaning of this saying true that I have just posited at first as distinct from any science of the Real. It completely changes the meaning because, as I have just said, for once, this groove is not empty: something passes along it.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

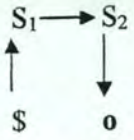
If some of you remember what I put forward, structured, as the discourse of the master, they can read in it, if they are capable of reading something, they can read in it that the truth of the master, is nothing other than the subject. For the deaf I recall that the discourse of the master is this: with here two arrows and here two arrows like that, and here nothing at all:



(110) What the discourse of the master is based on, is what I have called S_1, S index 1. In other words: the commandment, the imperative. The discourse of the master is there. And for quite a while. Simply because, because the signifier exists. Because S_1 namely, the signifier 1, is nothing other than the fact that the signifier, there are piles of them, but they are all some one or other. And this is all the existence of the One is based on: it is that there is something of the signifier, and that each is not unique, but all alone, which is not quite the same thing.

It is precisely because there are not two... two what? Two speaking beings that can be conjoined, make two, it is precisely for that reason that there are signifiers, namely, that they speak. And what analytic discourse demonstrates, is that what happened as regards the place of those who could be subjects, subjects of something, of the sexual relationship, when at their place there are two signifiers, well then it is that, and it is nothing else, that flows in what I called the groove of the true saying.

For that, it must be that the S_2 has nothing to do with the true saying. In other words: that S_2 is Real. And if you are following me in what I tried to open up, in my first stammerings in this seminar, you will

S_2 is knowledge – + it's a puzzle that he should call knowledge the real
S_2 is the embodied jouissance as opposed to symbolic knowledge

http://www.lacaninireland.com

conceive that S_2, this is what I wrote in my schema of the analytic discourse, that S_2, namely, knowledge qua unconscious, is what flows in the groove of the true saying. What I am in the process of telling you does not mean nothing! It means that it is a Real, there is some knowledge that even if there is no subject who knows it, remains being of the Real. It is a depot. It is a sediment that occurs in everyone when he begins to tackle this sexual relationship to which of course he will never get, whatever education he is given, because if there is indeed something which will in no way improve the situation, the situation of the relationship, it is indeed everything that you can bullshit them with on the subject of what this relationship might supposedly be.

I have 3 brothers -- etc. Amen. The speaking being does not have the slightest idea that he is a subject

It will nonetheless remain that it is from quite incidental angles that there will enter for him what makes the three, namely, the Real. Because, of course, thank God, when the speaking being begins, he has not the slightest idea that he is a subject. He counts one and two, whatever you want, but not himself, and as three, he will put into it anything you wish, even what fakes (maquille) the two others, namely, himself, the child, as you might say. It is a good pretext for making the Real enter while completely veiling it: the Real is only a (111) child; if it is not the child itself it will be any third whatsoever, it will be Aunt Yvonne, in fact, is that not so, or anybody else... Grandfather whatshisname: once it makes up three, anything is acceptable in order not to notice that what is at stake is only the three as Real. As a result of which there are things which, through Aunt Yvonne or Grandfather whatshisname or by the child himself, namely, his pathos, namely, that he is relegated, nobody understands anything about it, and for good reason. There is nothing to understand.

There will all the same be something that will be imprinted, namely, not three, because the three is always veiled from some side, the three steals away, the three is the support, there will be S_2, S index 2, 2 S's, two signifiers S which will be imprinted, and which will give along the path of pure chance, namely, of that which, above all, was missing in the relationships with those who were there to preside over what is called his education, his formation, he will form this knowledge, this indelible and at the same time absolutely not subjectivised knowledge, he will form for himself this Real knowledge, imprinted there somewhere, imprinted just like in Aristotle, the α, the β and the γ, and this is what will be the unconscious and there will be nothing else, huh, as was said by the character going through customs: "That's food for my goat". To which the customs man says: "Listen, that's amazing, because they are braces (bretelles), no?" The other answers: him: "Anyway, that's how it is, and if she didn't have that, she would have nothing else..." It is the same for unconscious knowledge: as truth, there will be nothing other than these braces.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Unconscious knowledge, this is what must be connected up for the true saying to succeed in some way, namely, to succeed in being understood somewhere to supply for the absence of any relationship between the man and a woman (some, not all). Here is the distance, the difference between the true saying and the science of the Real. That is why that as regards dealing with the unconscious, we are much closer to it by manipulating logic than anything else, because it is of the same order. It is of the order of the written, as I pointed out to you; moreover the great opener up of analytic discourse, Freud himself, was not able to eliminate it, or when he gives his little schemas, is that not so, in his projects, those by which he tried to understand what the knowledge of the hysteric might well be, well (112) what does he do? He does exactly nothing other than that, namely, these little points and these little arrows, these modes of writing thanks to which he accounts – he believes he accounts – for something which was as old as the world, namely, anamnesis. It is obvious that for a long time anamnesis was considered as a mark, as an impression, it must moreover also be said that this is quite vacillating and insufficient. Here our dear Freud confirms in a way that this indeed is what is at stake, when it is the Real that is at stake, that what is at stake is something that is written, something that is written and that it is a matter of reading, of reading by deciphering it, and what does that mean? That means nothing except this something which, in – as I might say – in reanimating it in the sense of this something, of this something which creates a barrier to every attempt to debouch onto the relationship properly so-called, by reanimating thanks to this something which is this kind of parasite, of movable part of the body, that analytic discourse designates by the phallus, ensures that what acted as a stopper, which is properly speaking enjoyment, and phallic enjoyment as such, what acted as a stopper thanks to something that discourse manages to obtain, is that not so, namely, to separate it in the Imaginary, to accomplish Symbolic castration, allows something to succeed or to fail, most often to fail, which establishes at least between two subjects something which resembles a relationship, something that ceases not to be written for some rare and privileged cases.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I am speaking of course here about what is obtained along the proper path, through analytic discourse, because, it must indeed be said that this concern for the truth is only necessitated in extremely rare cases, those for whom the aid of the analytic discourse which I said is required in the other discourses, is much easier to obtain. In the discourse of the master, indeed why not in the university discourse, huh... In the discourse of the hysteric, huh, a knot becomes a dream... But in the two other good old discourses, the king and the queen, listen, it happens automatically! It is enough to be a king and to be a queen to understand one another. It is even unthinkable that they should not understand one another. Of course, this has nothing to do with the truth of the sexual relationship, but the important thing is not that, huh, it is that it supplies for it.

So then, because in some cases unconscious knowledge is lame – not only is it lame, but it clearly creates an obstacle for the sexual

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(113) relationship being established. So then, in those cases, one is dealing with the necessity of going by way of the analytic discourse, namely, one has the need to speak true, and especially to suspect a little what bad company speaking true keeps. Namely, that everything that comes to muddy, disturb, good God, the calm and tranquil discourse that we usually have to deal with, which grounds the normal, namely, that what comes to muddy these perfectly well established discourses, never brings out anything except cases, cases where there is a need, in short of a psychoanalysis, namely, the cases of truth.

In this you are not trying to reduce somebody to the normal discourse in or the university discourse.

This does not make me reduce them to being unworthy, which is what I am telling you: the fact that they are not normal – is because they have with the truth a kind of... a kind, like that, of kinship, which stems from the fact that they are in the connection where it does not work for a single Real, namely, what is involved in the relationship described as sexual.

Let it be well understood then – I am making here, like that, some remarks which seem useful to make to you so that you do not make errors – let it be well understood then that the analytic discourse does not at all consist in making what is not working out, what is not working out re-enter normal discourse, huh, two of which I have designated for you. This is not at all what is involved. It is not at all a matter of making them enter into it. It is simply to note that the discourse which only proceeds by the true saying, is precisely what, what does not work, as has always been demonstrated, it is enough for someone to make an effort, to say true, for it to upset everyone. I am simply restoring things here to their context.

In the analytic discourse you are listening for the hysteric discourse. If you later she touch it's for it to upset everyone

What I simply want to point out to you is that in constituting this break, this break between the true saying and the science of the Real, in reconstituting it for what its worth, in reconstituting it at the very place where it is situated, I am not closing here, very far from it, any

She is not trying to create a scandal

http://www.lacaninireland.com

system of the world. On the contrary. For a system of the world to exist, there is only one means, is that not so, it is to make suppositions in it. The fact is that … a discourse like that of Aristotle (who was surely not an idiot, nor even a sod) is full of hard edges, I mean stimulation. What is stupefying is that there is no text where what is called supposition is clearer.

This distinction that I have articulated for you today, between the true saying and the science of the Real, I called it that, I called it as best I could: the true saying, is there, this is what I am trying to do, the (114) science of the Real, is this something which is logic, and which, also holds up, is that not so, which holds up for those who know, of course, how to locate themselves in it. The distinction is somewhere, I could show you where, somewhere in the Prior analytics, huh: 1–37, there, yeah…37…no it's at…if you take your reference from the manuscripts, is that not so, it is towards the 7th line of the page of the manuscripts of what is numbered as 49a. Good, the 37 is the division of translation. It is a matter of different kinds of attribution, of expressions…No that's not it, it's further on…Ah!

> *There must also be brought into operation the exchange of…*it's further on, is it not, it's at 49b, there must also be brought into operation the exchange of terms of an identical value, words for words, expressions for expressions, word and expression one for the other, and always prefer a word to an expression in order to facilitate in this way the presentation of terms

He seems to be only talking about his own little affair. But it is when he gives an example…

> For example, there is no difference between saying…

And then in connection with this he says something true: but, if I may say so it is indeed a risk, you are going to see what he says about the true,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

> ... the object of supposition is not the genus of the object of opinion and to say the object of opinion is not identical with a certain object of supposition (for the meaning is the same in the two judgements), instead of the expression that has been stated, it would be better to posit as terms...

By blocking them... and this is what he calls hupolepton, the object of the supposition and the object of opinion doxaston, dozaston.
(I beg your pardon, I'm tired...)

What is the object of opinion?

Well then the object of opinion is what works. Opinion is just as true as something else. True opinion, it is precisely about this that Plato racks his brain in Menon. The object of opinion is what ensures that one does not notice that... (until it falls on your head, naturally), that there is no sexual relationship. The object of supposition is not identical, he says on this occasion. Namely, that everything that he talks about in the Prior analytics, is something which makes us understand how much, when one is in the order of the Real, one must make suppositions.

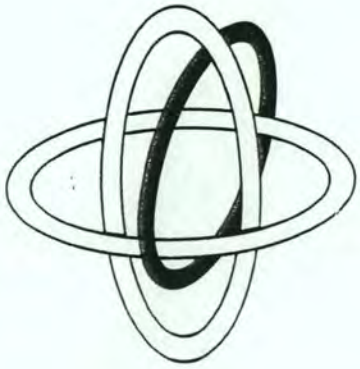
In the order of the Real we are all the time forced to suppose. We are forced to suppose, in fact those crazy things: spirit, matter too, sometimes, and even some other things of the same kind, is that not so, which are luckily a little bit closer to us, but which are nonetheless suppositional. Here I am trying to proceed along a path where I am not making suppositions, where I do not suspect anything of being suspect. Since supposition, has that aspect. Yes.....in Aristotle, he called that hupokeimenon sometimes, but there, in that case it is something that can only be translated into Latin by suspicabile, it is to hupolepton, it is the suspect (la soupçonnable).

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Of course, the suspect is very respectable, like the rest, is that not so, this is what we must suspect as being Real, and that takes us very far, that leads to all sorts of constructions. The important thing would perhaps be to remain with simply what the science of the Real allows there to be affirmed, namely, that the kernel of all of that is above all logic, namely, what has never succeeded in advancing by a step, by a quarter of a step, by the tip of its nose, huh, except by writing. Which is already something.

Good, I told you that, and then I made you my Borromean knot, you must Really try to imagine that this Borromean knot here, is as I might say the only one which... which is presented decently, as I might say.

It is presented decently because it has the place to be deployed but that does not prevent it easily being the object of all sorts of deviations. You will note in it for example, that it is very easy to find in it, for example the three planes of reference of Cartesian co-ordinates. And this indeed is what is fallacious about it. Because the Cartesian co-ordinates, are all the same something quite different, they are something which by the very fact that they imply the surface as existent, is that not so, are at the source of all sorts, of all sorts of fallacious images: the more geometrico which sufficed throughout the centuries to guarantee many things a supposedly demonstrative character, comes entirely from that.



http://www.lacaninireland.com

(116) The fact that, the fact that the fallacious character of the surface, is that not so, is demonstrated by the fact that when you try to join it up with this apparatus here, you obtain, what constitutes the – for some time, anyway, I think for you – the siglum of what is involved in the Borromean knot, namely, the joining at which the three rings are knotted together. And where they are knotted, in fact, in a way which is properly speaking concise, namely, the one, the way, which allows it for example to be seen that that is how it is squeezed, in fact, huh. And there you are: that is how you must conceive that the... that the knots are connected up to define this something which is a completely definition of the point: namely, the point where the three rings are squeezed together.

Yes, this is not quite what I had foreseen, in fact, telling you today, but since after all I felt like improvising, I allowed myself to be led, like that, to tell you other things. This has a sequel, of course, it will have a sequel the next time, I would like all the same to point out to you that there are points in the Prior analytics, for example, among others – there are others, there are points of logic, there are points of the Organon – where we see all of a sudden that Aristotle himself, (117) who knew bloody well what he was doing, does not fail to stumble. I mean without letting out what, when all is said and done worries him [me?] like everyone else.

There is a thing somewhere, I must find that for you, I am going to find it for you right away, at... at page 68 still the page number of the manuscript... There is something unbelievable. I note – I spoke to you earlier about... about 'all A is B', 'all B is γ' and about what is deduced from it that 'all A is γ'. He questions himself apparently about what results from that, by inverting the conclusion, namely, for example to say that 'all γ is α'. He shows its overwhelming consequences, namely, that the conclusion must be put at a different place, namely, at the place of a major or of a minor in order for it to culminate properly speaking at a conclusion that is the one that inverts one of the premises. Good. All that seems to be unimportant and nevertheless it certainly is not unimportant, because it is on this occasion that there begins to emerge something else, namely, the qualifications that are applied to every kind of being.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I must tell you that I spared you something which is the degree to which, the degree to which the use of the term huparchein, 'to belong to', creates a problem. Because in his definition of the universal, it is completely beyond question to give a univocal sense to this 'to belong to'. It is impossible to know in a univocal fashion if the subject belongs to the predicate or if the predicate belongs to the subject. It depends on the passages. It cannot be, of course, that someone as vigilant as Aristotle must have been did not notice that.

In any case in this chapter, this small little chapter which is extremely instructive, one sees by progression – and by this progression which consists in that, from well defined universal beings, it passes on to all beings – it is very singular that it is in connection with that, that there emerges, that there emerges like an irruption, the following passage:

> If then (textually) every lover, in virtue of his love, prefers A (it is not prefers to, huh, it is the written A), to know that the beloved is disposed to grant him his favours (that is described as suneinai, to go together) without for all that granting them to him (which we image by the γ, it is then non-suneinai, to call it by its name: he does not sleep with him) rather than see the beloved accord him his favours (which is imaged by Δ)...

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(118) It's marvellous.

So then, Δ what have we said, that, that the... what?... ah! yes!

It is then γnot to grant them to him, rather than to see... etc. Good. Good, so then it is obvious that α namely, to be disposed, which stands in Aristotle for loving him, is that not so – it is obvious that the object of love A, is to be loved, is to be disposed to grant his favours to him, this is what, in Aristotle, is perfectly well designated in this text (I would ask you to consult it), is described as phileisthai.

Good, to love, is then philein.

What is at stake for him is to demonstrate the following: after this passage concerning the whole conversion, and quite especially the conversion of predicates which concerns every being – what is at stake is that if one starts from that, is that not so, that the conjunction of this A with this B, namely, to be loved by the partner – a partner who does not grant you his favours – if one posits that this is preferable to the contrary combination, is that not so, namely, that he grants his favours without for all that loving you, he demonstrates that, if one posits this – it is the object of his demonstration – there results from that at the end love, A, is something, if one posits it here, is that not so, the result is, what seems in effect inevitable to be admitted, that the suneinai is worth less than the kharixesthai namely,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

this good disposition which testifies to being loved. The emergence, in this place, and in a way that is all the more problematic in that it is absolutely characteristic of love as homosexual, is a quite striking thing, concerning, as I might say the eruption in the middle of what I defined as being articulated as the science of the Real, as the eruption (119) at a certain point, a point which, I repeat is at 68b to which I would ask you to refer in the Prior analytics, a thing which is truly the irruption of the true, and of the true which is precisely a true to which there is only, when all is said and done, the approach, since the problem we are dealing with is precisely that of a love which, when all is said and done, is of concern only by the mediation of enjoyment, of the suneinai that is at stake, namely, a perfectly localised homologous, homogeneous, enjoyment, in fact, the one that ensures that when all is said and done, if there is, in effect, something that allows the non-existence of the sexual relationship as such, it is very precisely that the homoios is assuredly something like a step in it no doubt, but a step, in a way, that confirms, that supports the non-existence of the relationship [or: that the non-existence of the relationship confirms, supports].

And what I would like to conclude on is the following, is this not so, that in so far as it is around this x which is called the phallus that there continues to turn – to turn only because it is at the same time its cause and its mask – the non-existence of the sexual relationship, I am announcing, if I can say the theme of my next seminar; as regards man – and first of all when I say man, I write it with a capital L (L'homme) namely, that there is an all-man – for man, love, I mean, what is hooked onto, what is situated in the category of the Imaginary, for man, love goes without saying. Love goes without saying because his enjoyment is enough for him, and that is moreover very exactly why he understands nothing about it.

But for a woman, things must be taken from a different angle, is that not so. If for a man it goes without saying because enjoyment covers

http://www.lacaninireland.com

everything, including precisely that there is no problem concerning what is involved in love, the enjoyment of the woman – and it is on this that I will end today – the enjoyment of the woman for her part, does not go without saying, namely, without the saying of the truth.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 8: Wednesday 19 February 1974

So, my dear Rondepierre, I pinched it from you, huh? I pinched it from you, it was you who had ordered it, but I took it. There you are. So, what I pinched from Rondepierre, is a book by Hintikka called Models for modalities. It is a very good read. It is a very good read that is well designed to demonstrate what should not be done. In this respect, it is useful. Good. There you are. Yeah... what time is it?

This Hintikka is a Finn, a logician, it is not because he did what should not be done, that as I have just told you it is not very, very, very, very useful. It is precisely particularly demonstrative. If you read what I have just written on the board:

Necessary that p does not cease to be written p	Possible to cease to be written $(p \vee \sim p)$	Necessary that $\sim p$ does not cease to be written $\sim p$
Contingent that p ceases not to be written p	Impossible not to cease to write $(p \wedge \sim p)$ No	Contingent that $\sim p$ ceases not to be written $\sim p$

Does not cease not to be written

The Real: p $\sim p$

Both are logically unverifiable

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(122) You see perhaps where that can be placed, you see perhaps what must not be done. Anyway, you will see it better when I will have said a little more about it. Yeah...

On the other hand – since I still have a minute – on the other hand there is a good example, a good example of what one can do. It is another book. It is another book by the same Jaakko, Jacques, that is how it is pronounced, it appears – Jaakko Hintikka, so then he is called Jacques. Jaakko Hintikka produced another book called Time and necessity, subtitled: A study of the theory of Aristotle's modalities. It is not bad. It is not bad and... it implies – I have only had it two days – it implies that someone, the Hintikka in question, had anticipated me, had anticipated me long ago, since his book has not simply been written but has been published... – anticipated me long ago in what I was pointing out to you the last time, that Aristotle's Organon, is worthwhile reading because the least that one can say, is that, is that it, is that it will make you rack your brains, and that what is difficult is indeed to know, with somebody who opens things up (un frayeur), as I called it, like Aristotle, is indeed to know why, why... why he chose these terms and not others. There you are. He chose these and not others because... it is not possible when all is said and done; it is not possible, it is not possible to say why if, if I do not begin by articulating what I have to say to you today.

What I did the last time, naturally, is no small thing. Make no mistake about it! Naturally it went unnoticed, I imagine, by more than one of you, but anyway there were some who realised how important it was. Good. So then, if I am not going astray, and I do not seem to, how does the game that guides me, play out (joue le jeu)?

That makes a verb, huh: jouljeu, you jouljeux, that continues, that holds up to il jouljeut and then afterwards it becomes uncertain. We jouljouons, or the verb jouljouer does not hold up. That proves that one only jouljeut's in the singular. In the plural, it is doubtful, the jouljeu cannot be 'conjeugated' in the plural. And the fact that there is no plural does not prevent there being several people all the same in the singular. There are precisely three of them. This is how there is recognised the three of the Real, as I have already... tried to get you to sense: it is three (trois), huh, and even étroit like La porte... So then, what I did the last time shifted something. What? What I am claiming, precisely, is that it does not shift the not-all (pas-tout). (123) Something, this not-all. This is even why I am lucky to be serious... lucky to be serious, because the serious does not squeeze (serre) all. It squeezes the series closely. What I put forward, is the fact that there is already a logic. And this is even something that may surprise you. If Aristotle had not begun it, it would not be there already.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then, I get that far and I say: it is the knowledge of the Real. I demonstrated on every occasion, make no mistake. I recognise the three in it. But the three as knot. My beloved structure, huh, my nutty structure proves to be a Borromean knot. Naturally, it is not enough to name it, to call it that; because it is not enough for you to know that it is called a Borromean knot for you to be able to make something of it. Make no mistake, is that not so: it must be made (faut l'faire). Here there emerges a little light about what I am doing, because that is what I started from, I am going to tell the truth. That already proves that it is not enough to say it to be in it, in the true. And I put forward right away, is that not so, one of the pivotal points of what I intend to advance into today, in what I am doing here, as an analyst, since that is where I am speaking from: I do not discover the truth, I invent it. To which I add that it is that, knowledge.

Because the funny thing, huh, it is really amusing: no one has ever asked what knowledge was! Ah! Me neither. Except the first day when like that, held by the arm, in fact, in this thesis, in this thesis that between ourselves, huh – where is Francois Wahl? I don't know but anyway what matter, he is there perhaps, he is perhaps not there, but anyway, if he is there I point out that I promised one day publicly, like that, yielding to a, a tender pressure, that I would re-publish this thesis. I said it, this was enough for them, for Seuil. In order to publish it... naturally they never stopped snapping at my heels at the start, when I brought out the Ecrits, so that I would re-publish, this thesis, I said at that time that I did not want to, I have changed my mind, but now they are not in a hurry. In short, after all, what matter, I promised, but if it does not happen, huh, it is obviously not my fault. Anyway, that is all the same how I was nibbled by something, by something which made me slide like that gently... towards Freud. It was something which had here and now, the closest relationship with the question, indeed, that I am formulating today.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is curious – it may appear striking, is that not so, that it was like that, in connection with psychosis, is that not so that I had, that I had slid towards the question of... that it required Freud in fact, for me to truly ask it, it is: what is... what is knowledge?

Knowledge seems to discover, to reveal as they say, aletheia, my beloved. I show you to the world. Completely naked. I unveil you. The world is not able (n'en peut), but of course! Because it is what is at stake: when I show her, this truth, my beloved, it is what I am showing. If I said that logic is the science of the Real, this has obviously a relationship, a very close relationship with the fact that science can be conscience-less. Because precisely, this is hardly ever said, huh, that logic is the science of the Real. That this is hardly ever said, is already a sign, huh, it is a sign that it is not taken to be true... What is curious is that, for want of saying it, people are not in a position to say anything worthwhile whatsoever about what logic is. It is demonstrated in class, but when it is announced, there, at the start, open any book whatsoever of logic, you will see the hesitations. It is even quite curious. It is certainly moreover why... why Aristotle did not at all call his Organon, 'Logic', and he got into the thing... The astonishing thing is that he called it Organon.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

In any case, conscience-less science then, there is someone who said one day – he was called Rabelais, like that he was someone particularly astute, and it is enough to read what he wrote to perceive it. To write what Rabelais wrote, that is why I say: it must be made/done (il faut le faire). 'Science without conscience', he said, 'is but the ruin of the soul'. Well then, it is true. Only it is to be taken not as the priests take it, namely, that it works havoc in this soul which as everyone knows does not exist, but that it brings the soul down to earth (ça fout l'âme par terre)! No doubt you do not see that, that I am saying that this brings the soul down to earth, namely, that it renders it completely useless, is exactly the same thing as I have just said to you in saying to you that to reveal the truth to the world, is to reveal the world to itself. That means that there is no more a world than there is a soul. And that consequently, in fact, every time one starts from... from the state of the world, as they say, to highlight the truth in it, you stick your finger in your eye! Because the world, well then, if it is already enough to affirm it, it is a hypothesis that sweeps away all the rest. Including the soul. And that is clearly seen in reading Aristotle; On the soul. Just like Hintikka, I strongly advise you to read it.

If there is knowledge, if the question can be asked of what knowledge is, well it is quite natural, of course, that I was held, because the patient in my thesis, le cas Aimée, well she knew, simply she confirms, she confirms what you will comprehend I started from. She was inventing, of course that is not enough to assure, to confirm that knowledge is invented, because as they say, she was talking nonsense... Only, that is how the suspicion about it came to me. Of course, I did not know it! This indeed is why a further step is required in logic, and one must note that knowledge, contrary to what puts forward epistemic logic, which starts from the following: about the hypothesis, it is even on this that there rests the clean sweep that it constitutes, it is to see what this will give if you write it, that is how they write it, there, the knowledge of a, small a – it is not so badly chosen, this little a, anyway, it is by chance if it is the same as mine – the knowledge of small a, this must obviously be commented on, here it designates the subject; naturally they do not know that the subject is what the small a is the cause of, but anyway it is a fact that they write it like that:

http://www.lacaninireland.com

This is a different type of writing. It's like the letter, but it's not the same.

$$S(a, \alpha)$$

Epistemic logic starts from the fact that knowledge is inevitably to know the true. You cannot imagine where that leads. To madness....even if it were only this, in fact, which unconscious knowledge disputes, that it is impossible to know anything whatsoever that is supposed to be true as such, without knowing it. I mean knowing that one knows.

This leads to madness. Knowledge is separate from the truth. 'Baby, I am just doing science.'

like Donald Rumsfeld – there are things that we know – things that we don't know – things that we don't know that we know.

From which it results that it is altogether impossible, it is not very difficult to obtain, but anyway there is a very nice mathematician, who breaks with Hintikka, and who in effect gives a very pretty proof – the notes have been communicated to me – that the knowledge which is supposed to be supported by the fact that one does not know that one knows is strictly inconsistent, in fact impossible to state in epistemic logic. Yeah.

You can put your finger here on the fact that knowledge is invented, since this logic is a knowledge. A knowledge like another – and here I would like to get your feet back on the ground a little again, like that – this is simply to remind you, what unconscious knowledge is. It fully deserves the title of knowledge, huh! It must indeed be said, that Freud is uneasy about its relationship to the truth, it, even to the point that this gives him quite a turn when one of his... – they were called patients at that time, the term analysands had not yet been found – when one of his patients brings him a dream that deliberately lies.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The fact is that this is where the break (faille) lies.

There is something in Freud that lends itself to this confusion that was created, when all is said and done, by translating Trieb as 'instinct'. Everyone knows that instinct is...is a knowledge, like that, that is supposedly natural. But there is something all the same which takes a trick, in Freud's case, which is the death instinct. Naturally, I took a little step further than him. But it is in the wrong direction. He turns around it. He, he for his part is well aware of it. For that you have to read the famous Beyond, yes, Beyond the pleasure principle, as it happens. In this Beyond, in short...he worries himself about, how something whose module is to remain at a certain threshold; the least possible tension, that is what suits life, as he says. Only he notices in practice that this does not work. So then he thinks that it goes lower than the threshold. Namely, that this life that maintains tension at a certain threshold, starts to slacken all of a sudden, and that beneath the threshold, we see it succumbing, succumbing to the point of rejoining death. That is how when all is said and done, he makes this thing acceptable. Life is, it is something that arose one day God knows why, make no mistake, and then which only asks to go back like all the rest. He confuses the inanimate world with death. It is inanimate, that means that it is supposed to know nothing. That means nothing more for whoever gives to the soul its sensible equivalent. But this fact that it knows nothing, does not prove that it is dead. Why should the inanimate world be, why should it be a dead world? That certainly does not mean very much, but to ask the question has in any case a meaning...

http://www.lacaninireland.com

In any case, correlatively to this question of the Beyond of the pleasure principle, Freud is at sea in something which is much closer to the question of death, namely, of what it is; he starts, he starts and then he lets the thing drop, and it is very annoying. He starts from the question of the germen and the soma. He attributes it to Weismann. I cannot develop this. This is not quite what Weismann said. The person who started from the separation between the germen and the (127) soma, is a chap who lived a little earlier, and who was called Nussbaum. Moreover, for what you make of it, let us stay with that, it does not have any great importance.

What is important, and what Freud touched on, on this occasion, is that there is only death where there is reproduction of the sexual type. That's all.

If we employ Aristotle's term, the huparkhein in question, the 'belonging to', and if we employ it in the right way, in the way Aristotle uses it, namely, without knowing from what end to tackle it, we see that sex huparkhei, 'belongs to' death, unless it is death that belongs to sex, and we remain there, precisely, with the sleeve by which we caught the thing in our hands, yeah.

Where the break is shown by its consequences, is that it is in this connection that Freud, under the pretext that there is something in the world which shows that life sometimes goes towards death, he marries, he marries to it something that is all the same difficult to, to eliminate from sex, which is enjoyment; and that, making the slip that he would not have made if he had firmly held in his hands the Borromean knot, he designates as masochism the supposed conjunction of this enjoyment, sexual enjoyment, and death. It is a collapse. Yeah.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

If there is a place where the clinic, practice, clearly shows us something – and that is why I congratulated, like that in passing, someone who has since taken the wrong road – if there is something that is quite obvious it is that masochism is a sham (du chiqué). It is a knowledge, certainly, a know-how even! But if there is then a knowledge in which we can put our finger on the fact that that is invented, that it is not within everyone's reach, it is indeed there! It must be said that the person in question there that I congratulated in passing, was not a clinician, but he had simply read Sacher-Masoch. If it is here that it can be seen, in short, that masochism is invented, and that it is not within everyone's reach, that it is a way of establishing a relationship there where there is not the least involved, between enjoyment and death, it is quite clearly manifested by the fact that, all the same, huh, one only puts the tip of one's little finger into it, huh, one does not let oneself be seized like that into the machine. Good.

So then this is what all the same, allows there to be envisaged the import of what I am stating. The fact is that knowledge, knowledge where we grasp it for the first time, like that, in a way that can be handled; can be handled because, because it is not we who know – it (128) is not we who know, as one of my pupils says, and calling it non-knowledge, poor chap! He fancies that he does not know! What a funny business... But we all know, because all of us invent something to fill up the hole in the Real. Where there is no sexual relationship this gives a 'troumatisme'. One invents. Naturally one invents what one can. When one is not very smart, one invents masochism. Sacher-Masoch was a sod. You should see the fire tongs, anyway is that not so, the person who wanted to play the game, like that, to answer him, the fire tongs with which he dealt with him, this Sacher-Masoch! She did not know what to make of him. Only Le Figaro expressed itself, huh, which says it all! Anyway let us leave Sacher-Masoch! There are knowledges that are more intelligently invented. And this indeed is why I say that the Real, not simply where there is a hole, is invented, but that it is not unthinkable that it is through this hole that we might advance into everything that we invent about the Real, which is not nothing because it is clear that there is a place where the Real works. It is when we bring it in as three, this bastard thing, because it is sure that this connotation '3' for the Real is difficult to manipulate logically..

http://www.lacaninireland.com

All that we know is that 'one' connotes enjoyment very well, and that 'zero' means there is none, what is missing, and that if zero and one make two, this does not render any less hypothetical the conjunction between the enjoyment of one side with the enjoyment of the other. Yeah.

Not only does it not make it more sure, but it spoils it. In a world that is neither made nor to be made, a totally enigmatic world, once one tries to bring in this something which is supposed to be modelled on logic, and on which there is supposed to be grounded that in the species described as human one is either man or woman. This is very especially what experience rises up against – and I do not need to go far, someone reported to me, no later than a few hours ago, his encounter with a taxi driver – they're all over the place, huh, make no mistake – as regards whom not only was it impossible for the person who was speaking to say whether it was a man or a woman, but that she had even asked and he was not able to answer her. When I say that you find that everywhere, huh, all the same, it is no small thing! And it is even from there that Freud starts.

(129) He starts, like that, as a commentary. Experience is not enough for him because he has to hook on more or less everywhere, to science, huh, from the moment that there is nothing, that there is nothing that more resembles a masculine body than a feminine body, if one is able to look at a certain level, at the level of tissue, huh. That does not prevent an egg from not being a spermatozoon, that it is here that the sex thing is to be found. It is quite superfluous, huh, to point out that as regards the body, in short, it can be ambiguous as in the case of the taxi driver earlier. It is quite superfluous. Because you see clearly that what determines is not a knowledge, it is a saying (un dire). It is only a knowledge because it is a logically inscribable saying. It is the one that I wrote for you, in clear letters, make no mistake with my: $\exists x . \overline{\Phi} x$

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Namely, the exception around which there pivots the fact that it is in the measure that this exception carries a consequence for all of those who believe that they have, that they have what? That we do not even dare to call the prick, we call that the phallus, and this is what remains to be determined.

While on the other side it is about the saying, the formal saying, even though the saying of a non-existent person x. Namely, that it is only for every other that the function $\overline{\Phi} x$ is denied, that negation, let us say, to illustrate, is left, I am not all the same going to say to God, because that pisses us off, this business, this sticking of the Other onto God, but all the same, for anyone who Realises this sort of universality that there is no negation of the function $\overline{\Phi} x$, and it is the only form of universality of the saying of a woman, whoever she may be. It nevertheless remains – I think that you remember all the same what I wrote on the board, and that I am not going to be required to rewrite here – it nevertheless remains that in this set, it is not every saying that formulates the function $\overline{\Phi} x$. In other words, that what must be substituted for my little bar that I put over the inverted A, the sign of the universal quantifier, the little bar by which I inscribe the not-all, what must be substituted, is the sign of the denumerable, namely, $\aleph_0$, aleph zero.

What opposes the one of the all of man – and there is only one of them, as everyone knows, the proof is that it is designated by the definite article – what opposes the 'all' of man, here, is, is, it must be said, 'the' women, in so far as there is no way to get to the end of them, except by enumerating them. I cannot say all (toutes) because what is proper to the denumerable, is precisely that one never gets to the end of it. And if I give you this reference point, it is because this – this must be of use to you for something, it must illustrate what I said the last time about the true saying. The true saying is what comes to grief, is what comes to grief on this: that for, in an untenable either-or which would be that everything that is not man is woman and inversely, what decides, what clears the way, is nothing other than this saying, this saying which is engulfed in what is involved in the hole by which there is lacking to the Real what could be inscribed about the sexual relationship.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then, so then. What is involved in knowledge?

Naturally, I have not managed at this time, namely, 1.20, or something like that...24, I have not managed at this hour, to tell you even a quarter of what I should get into your guts, because that is the function of the saying. If I do not say it to you it is not enough for me to write it, but I am all the same going to give you a little sample of what can be written. Because without this reflection on writing, without what ensures that the saying comes to be written, there is no way for me to make you sense the dimension in which unconscious knowledge subsists. And what you must do as a supplementary step, is to notice that if I make you sensitive by telling you that the unconscious does not discover anything, because there is nothing to discover, there is nothing to discover in the Real, since here there is a hole. If the unconscious, here, invents, it is all the more precious for you to notice that in logic it is the same thing, namely, that if Aristotle had not invented it, the first clearing of the way, namely, to make the saying go into this grinder of being thanks to which he makes syllogisms – naturally syllogisms were made before him, simply people did not know that they were syllogisms. In order to notice it, it must be invented: to see where the hole is, the edge of the Real must be seen.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

And since we are already far gone, and I have not managed to say a quarter of it for you – it will have to be 'too bad', it will ornament, (131) anyway, what will come subsequently – I must all the same make you sense the import of a certain way in which I open up modal logic.

The best part about it, huh, is that naturally, that as regards constructing, as regards inventing – and you can see there all the intuitionist echoes you wish, if indeed you know what that is. One day I translated the necessary for you, huh, by what does not cease to be written. Good. You should know, there is a trace in Aristotle, that propositional logic, namely, that something is true or false, what is marked as zero or one, according to the case, there is a little trace, there is a spot where Aristotle skids off – I will show you that whenever you like – into the peri hermenetas, as it happens, On interpretation, for those who do not hinder it: there is a spot where it is fused, that propositional logic is just as modal as the others. It is true that if it is true that this is only situated where I am telling you, namely, where contradiction is only when all is said and done an artifice, a deputising artifice, but which for all that remains no less true, the true playing here the role of something from which one starts in order to invent the other modes. Namely, that 'necessary that: p' whatever truth it may be, can only be expressed by this 'does not cease to be written'. Everyone sees between this fact, this fact that something does not cease to be written – you should understand by this that it is repeated, that it is always the same symptom, what always falls into the same fold. You see clearly that between the 'does not cease to be written: p' and the 'does not cease to be written: non-p' we are here in the artefact that is testified to precisely, and which bears witness at the same time to this gap concerning the truth and that the order of the possible is as Aristotle indicates, connected to the necessary. What ceases to be written is p or non-p. In this sense the possible bears witness to the break of the truth. Except for the fact that there is nothing to be drawn from it. There is nothing to be drawn from it and Aristotle himself bears witness to it. He bears witness there to his confusion at every instant between the possible and the contingent. What is written here my T towards the bottom: Λ because after all, what ceases to be written can in short cease not to be written, namely, come to light as the truth of the business... It can happen that I love a woman like any one of you – these are the sort of adventures into which you may slip – this however does not give any assurance about the sexual identity of the person that I love any more than of mine. Only there is something that, among all these contingencies, may well testify to the presence of the Real. And this (132) is indeed what only advances from the saying inasmuch as it is supported by the principle of contradiction. Which of course, naturally, is not the current saying of every day. Not only do you ceaselessly contradict yourselves in the current everyday saying, namely, that you do not pay any attention to this principle of contradiction, but it is truly only logic that raises it to the dignity of a principle, and allows you, not at all of course to assure any Real, but to find your bearings in what it might be when you have invented it.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

And this indeed is why what I marked about the impossible, namely, what separates, but otherwise than is done by the possible, it is not an either-or, it is a both-and. In other words, that it should be at the same time p and non-p is impossible, it is very precisely what you reject in the principle of contradiction. It is nevertheless the Real since it is from there that I am starting, namely, that for every knowledge there must be invention, that this is what happens in every encounter, in every first encounter with the sexual relationship.

The condition for logic to pass into the Real, and this is why it is invented, and that logic is the most beautiful recourse of what is involved in unconscious knowledge. Namely, of what we steer ourselves by into the doldrums. What logic has managed to lucubrate,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

is not to remain with this: that one must choose between p and non-p, and that by travelling along the vein of the principle of contradiction, we will manage to get out of it as regards knowledge. What is important, what constitutes the Real, is that through logic, something happens, which demonstrates not that p and non-p are both false, but that neither one nor the other can be in any way be logically verified. This is the point, the point of re-departure, the point on which I will take things up again the next time: this impossible on one side and the other, is the Real as logic allows us to define it, and logic allows us to define it only if we are capable of inventing the refutation of both the one and the other.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Introduction

Preliminary to the Seminar of R.S.I.

19 November 1974

There is no mike. So you're going to have to tell me whether you can hear me.

There you are, there are people, I know because I was told so, who are living the strike like a celebration. I know it, of course, through analysis. One gets to know things by analysis! One gets to know even that there are people twisted enough for that. But anyway, why not? It's subjective, as they say. That means that there are people who can tackle a lot of things from the right angle. Nevertheless, I am not one of them; as analyst, I can only take the strike to be a symptom, in the sense that this year perhaps, I will manage to convince you of it, that the symptom, to refer to one of my three categories, belongs to the Real. The annoying thing – and this is why I have some reservations – is that it is an organised symptom; that is what is bad, at least from the point of view of the analyst.

So then, if all the same I am going to go on strike, it is not because for me it is a celebration, but it happens that this strike comes to me like a ring on my finger; I mean that it happens that today, namely, at the start of this year 74-75, I have not the slightest inclination to do a seminar for you, as is attested by the fact that you have not seen any notice of it, announcing the title like every other year. I must say that

http://www.lacaninireland.com

nevertheless your number today does not fail to shake me. You know that every year I question myself about what it could be that motivates this crowd. It is not any more resolved now, it is not any more resolved for me, but all the same I consider it as an appeal, an appeal (10) linked to the fact that what I wrote, did nothing more than write, I mean what is written on the board with little signs, the o, the S_1, the S_2, the $ of the subject, the fact is that the analytic discourse is something that stirs you, I mean which stirs you. It is not a you, a stirs you in the neutral sense. It is true that to have written it, is an attempt, a tentative approximation. One could perhaps do better. I hope that one will do better.

But in short this year, I have to tell you that I have other concerns. That would, I hope, only give me greater merit in your eyes, if I pursue this seminar here. I have other concerns and I question myself as to whether I ought not let them take precedence. I mean that among you – I see numerous faces of them here – there are people who belong to my School. And perhaps after all my lassitude comes from something that is eating me, namely, that this seminar prevents me from paying more attention to this School.

This year to stimulate this School, I took a tack of which some among you have perhaps heard an echo. I am not going to put the concerns that this gives me into the public forum. Not, of course, that this is something private, quite the contrary, since what is at stake is that there is elsewhere, somewhere other than here, something that gives a place to other teachings than mine. It is strange, strange in the properly Freudian sense, unheimlich, it is strange that it is by some people who do not find themselves properly speaking yet authorised by analysis, but who are on the path, that there comes this resistance to the reason why I am stimulating them. I am stimulating them in short to make effective, to make effective what? In a testimony that they would contribute about the point where they are at, to make effective this passe which perhaps some of you know is what I am trying to introduce into my School, this passe by which in short what is at stake is that each one contributes his stone to the analytic discourse by bearing witness to how one enters into it.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is strange that among them there are some who are fully formed analysts and who when literally – this is what I did in this place where I wanted certain teachings to take place – when literally I beg their help – this is what I did – refuse it in the most categorical way, and go as far as to answer me with the insult, the insult which can be found in the newspapers for example – these are not things that have an effect on me but which, all the same about this insult, which is already not (11) bad to find in the newspaper, in the newspaper Le Monde in particular, as it happens, inflate this insult, and add to it. Yeah.

If I speak this year, I will take things from the angle of the identity of self to self. The question is whether this applies to the analyst. Can the analyst be considered as an element? Does he make, in other words, a set? Making a set/doing it together (faire ensemble), this is something that I will try to explain to you, is not to form a trade union. They are two different terms. Faire ensemble might mean, that means being able to make a series. And what I am questioning myself about is where this series stops? Among other terms, can an analyst, like the example of what I have just alluded to about the insult, behave like an imbecile (imbécile)? This is a very important question. How judge what I am describing as imbecility? It surely has a meaning, even in the analytic discourse; elsewhere, of course, in every discourse no one has any doubt, one is an imbecile or not, I am saying with respect to this discourse specifically to the discourse of the master, the discourse of the university, the scientific discourse, there is no doubt about it. How define imbecility in the analytic discourse? Here is a question, a question that I introduced, faith, I would say, from the first year of my seminar in stating that analysis is certainly a remedy against ignorance, that it is without effect against being an asshole (connerie).

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Hang on, pay attention! I already said that connerie is not imbecility. How can you situate imbecility, specify it as being an asshole?

The annoying thing and what is difficult in the question that I evoke, is something is perhaps something that you got wind of from me, I did not heavily insist on it, but all the same it must be said there are subjects for whom analysis, I mean the analytic experience, when they present themselves to it, does not succeed. And I specify that this makes them imbeciles. It must indeed be that there is something flawed at the start. That means perhaps that they would be more useful, I mean useable elsewhere. I mean that for something else they have obvious gifts. This brings us back to the ethics of each discourse and it is not for nothing that I put forward the term ethics of psychoanalysis. Ethics is not the same in it and it is perhaps with those whose ethics would have made them shine elsewhere that analysis does not succeed. Simple hypothesis, but that perhaps – this cannot be without twists and turns – perhaps if I decide, we will put here, finally we will put, it is a manner of speaking, I will put to the test here, (12) starting from the fact that I am indicating that there is no other ethics than to play the game according to the structure of a discourse and that we rediscover there my title of last year; it is the non-dupes, those who do not play the game of a discourse, who find themselves liable to err. It is not inevitably any worse for that. Only it is at their own risk. Those who err, in each discourse, are not inevitably useless in it. Far from it! Only it would be preferable in order to found a new one of these discourses, that people should be a little bit more dupe.

There you are. So then since all the same it would be quite useless to tell you that I am suspending myself, that I am questioning myself about what I will do this year, it would be quite vain to do so, but to do it for two hours which is what you were expecting, well then, I am not going to do it. I am going to stop there while asking you simply to trust, in order to know if you are to come back here on the 10th December, the second Tuesday, to trust the little notices on which I will inscribe the title that I will have chosen, if do this seminar this year. It is quite superfluous, and I would even say contra-indicated for you to bombard Gloria with telephone calls. The poor woman can't take any more! It will be one thing or another, either this notice will be put up there, let us say to leave the time to do it and then I must also think things out, the notice will be in the corridor two days before, or else it will not be. If it is not there, well then! You can tell yourselves that I am taking a year's sabbatical. If it is there, I am counting on seeing you as numerous as you are today.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 1: Tuesday 10 December 1974

Voilà. So then you saw my notice, which is written like that, Rsi. It can be read like that. It can also be read, since it is in capital letters, it can be read R.S.I. Which perhaps suggested to those who are in the know the Real, the Symbolic and the Imaginary.

I would like this year to talk to you about the Real, and to begin by pointing out to you that these three words, Real, Symbolic and Imaginary have a meaning. They are three different meanings, but you can also note that I said three meanings, like that, because it seems to be self-evident. But if they are different, is that enough for them to make three, if they are as different as I say? Hence the notion of a common measure, which is difficult to grasp, except by defining the unit in it as a function of measure. There are so many, one, two, three. Again it must be, for it to be able to be said that there are so many, again this unit must be grounded on the sign, whether it is a sign or whether it is written equals, or indeed that you make two little strokes to signify equals, the equivalence of these units. But if by chance they were different, as I might say from one another, we would be very embarrassed and, after all, what would bear witness to it, would be the meaning itself of the word other. Again there must be distinguished, in this meaning of other, the other made up of a distinction defined by an external/internal relationship, for example, as Freud did, whether he wants to or not, in his second topography which is supported by a geometry of the sack where you see a thing, somewhere in the New introductory lectures, a thing which is supposed to contain, contain what? It's a funny thing to say, the (14) drives. This is what he calls the Id. Naturally this forces him to add to it a certain number of tools, a sort of lunula which all of a sudden is transformed into a sort of vitellus on which there is supposed to be differentiated an embryo. This is obviously not what he means, but it is regrettable that it suggests it. Such are the disadvantages of imaged illustrations. I am not telling you everything else that he is forced to add, without counting the number of hatchings (hachures) that he entitles Superego. This geometry of the sack is indeed this thing that we have to deal with at the level of topology, except for the fact that, as perhaps the idea has come to you, this is drawn on a surface and that we are forced to put the sack onto it. On a surface this gives a ring (rond) and, with this ring, there is an inside and an outside.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is with that that one is led to write inclusion, namely, that something, I for example is included in an E, a set. Inclusion you know perhaps how that is written, like that, , whence people have deduced a little quickly that one could slip from inclusion which is there above to the lesser sign , namely, that I is smaller that E, which is a manifest imbecility.

Here then is the first other, the other defined from the outside to the inside. Only there is another Other, the one that I marked with a capital O, which for its part is defined as not having the slightest relationship, however small you may imagine it…when you begin to convey yourself in words, you are immediately caught in a wolf trap. Because this however small you imagine it, brings the Imaginary into play, and when you bring the Imaginary into play, you have every chance of becoming entangled. This is even how people started out for the infinitesimal: people had all sorts of trouble getting out of the Imaginary.

That they should be three, this Real, this Symbolic and this Imaginary, what does that mean? There are two slopes. One slope, a very steep one, leads us to homogenise them; because what relationship have they among themselves? Well then! This is precisely where I want to open up the path for you this year. One could say that the Real is what is strictly unthinkable. That at least would be a start. That would make a hole in the affair and that would allow us to question

http://www.lacaninireland.com

what is involved in, do not forget, what I started from, namely, from three terms in so far as they convey a meaning. What is this business of meaning, especially if you introduce into it what I am striving to make you sense? The fact is that as regards what is involved in (15) analytic practice, this is where you operate from, but on the other hand, you only work to reduce this meaning; it is in the measure that the unconscious is supported by this something, it must be said, the most difficult thing that I had to introduce, this something defined by me, structured like the Symbolic. It is from the fundamental equivocation of this something that is at stake in the term Symbolic that you always operate - I am talking to those here who are worthy of the name analyst. Equivocation is not meaning. Meaning is that through which there responds something which is different to the Symbolic, and there is no means of supporting this something otherwise than by the Imaginary. But what is the Imaginary? Does it even ek-sist? Since you hint, simply by pronouncing the term Imaginary, that there is something which ensures that the speaking being shows that he is destined for mental defectiveness. And this results from the simple notion of the Imaginary, in so far as the starting point for it is the reference to the body and to the fact that its representation, I mean everything that for it is represented, is only the reflection of its organism. It is the least of the suppositions that the body implies.

Only here there is something that immediately makes us stumble, which is that in this notion of body, there must be immediately implied the following, which is its very definition: it is something about which one presumes that there are specified functions in the organs, so that an automobile, even a computer according to the latest news, is also a body. It is not self-evident, we should say, that a body is living. So that what best attests to the fact that it is living, is precisely this mens in connection with which, more exactly that I introduced along the path, the journeying of mental defectiveness. It is not given to all bodies, in so far as they function, to suggest the dimension of imbecility. This dimension is introduced by this something that the tongue, and not just any one, Latin… – this to put in their place those who impute precisely this imbecility to Latin – is precisely the only one that instead of sticking on the soul an opaque term like nous, or another metaphor of something or other, of a knowledge, which we for sure do not know whether it exists, since it is the knowledge supposed by the Real. This knowledge of God, it is certain that it ek-sists. We have given ourselves enough trouble in spelling it out, it ek-sists, but only in the sense that I am writing this term ek-sistence, by (16) writing it differently than is usually done. It sists perhaps, but we do not know where. All one can say, is that what consists gives no testimony of it, so then, there is something a little bit striking in seeing that the tongue that is suspected of being the most stupid one is precisely the one that has forged this term intelligere, to read between the lines, namely, elsewhere than the way in which the Symbolic is written. It is from this effect of writing of the Symbolic that there stems this meaning-effect, in other words imbecility, to which there bear witness up to today all the systems described as natural. Without language, not the slightest suspicion could come to us of this imbecility, which is also that by which the support which is the body bears witness to us, I remind you that I said it earlier but this did not do anything for you, bears witness to us of being alive. In truth this mens, attested to by mental defectiveness, is something from which I do not hope to get out in any way.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I do not see why what I am contributing to you would be less defective than the rest. This might indeed be the meaning of this banana skin that was slipped under my foot, by catching me like that on the telephone, to give a lecture in Nice. You'll never guess, they slipped this title under my foot, the Lacanian phenomenon! Ah yes! What I am in the process of telling you, is that precisely I do not expect it to be a phenomenon, namely, that what I am saying is any less stupid than all the rest. The only thing that makes me persevere, and you know that I do not persevere without looking twice at it, I told you the last time why I was hesitating to set about it again this year, it is because I believe that there is something I have grasped (sais), I cannot even say with my hands, with my feet, it is the coming into play of this trace that is outlined, which quite obviously is not easily tolerated, especially by analysts, by the analytic experience. So that if there is a phenomenon, it can only be the Lacanalyste phenomenon or indeed lac-à-pas-d'analyste [être dans le lac: to be in the soup?].

http://www.lacaninireland.com

There is something which happened nevertheless, I am sharing it with you like that, because I am letting myself be drawn along; naturally, I could not explain anything about all of that to them, because for them, I was a phenomenon. What the organisers wanted in fact was to collect a mob. There is always a mob to look at a phenomenon. So, I was not going to tell them, listen I am not a phenomenon! That would (17) have been a Verneinung. Anyway, I let myself go for a good hour and a quarter. I cannot say that I am at all satisfied with what I told them, because what can you say in an hour and a quarter! For my part I imagine that with you of course I have a number of hours, since it is a little bit more than three, it is limitless. I am quite wrong, because in reality, there are no more than 50, including all that I will have between now and the end of the year. But that helps me to take to the road.

In short, at the end of an hour and a quarter of chat, I asked them questions, I mean, I asked them to ask me some. It was a demand. Well then! You can believe me if you wish, contrary to you, they asked me them for three quarters of an hour! And I will say more, these questions were striking in that they were relevant questions, relevant of course like that, in a second zone. In short it was the testimony of the fact that in a certain context, the one in which I do not insist, questions could come to me, and questions that were not stupid, questions that in any case required me to respond. So that I found myself confronted with the situation, without having had to reject the Lacanian phenomenon, of having demonstrated it. That naturally, it was not even sure that they noticed themselves, that that was the Lacanian phenomenon. Namely, that I was an effect for a audience, which had only heard like that, on the rebound, from very far, what I may articulate in this place here, where I give my teaching, my teaching to open up for the analyst the very discourse that supports him. If indeed it is from a discourse, and always from a discourse, that this Thing that we are trying to manipulate in analysis suffers, from a discourse.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I am saying then that this is the phenomenon. It is, in short, part of the wave (vague), if you will allow me to employ a term that might have tempted me to write the letters in a different order. Instead of R.S.I., R.I.S., that would have given a laugh, this famous ris de l'eau, on which precisely, somewhere in my Ecrits, I equivocate. I was looking for the page earlier, there was someone here, a pal of the first order, who had the Ecrits; I found it, it is on page 166, that I play on the ris d'eau (rideau), indeed implicating there 'my dear friend Leiris dominating' something or other.

I must obviously cheer myself up by telling myself that this (18) phenomenon is not unique, it is only particular. I mean that it is distinguished from the universal. The annoying thing is that it is up to now unique at the level of the analyst. It is nevertheless indispensable that the analyst should be at least two, the analyst to produce effects, and the analyst who theorises these effects. That was why it was precious for me that I was accompanied by a person, who perhaps, I did not ask him, at this precise level of the phenomenon, of the phenomenon described as Lacanian, was able to notice precisely there, at the level of what I had to say, about what I have just now stated, namely, that on that occasion I simply demonstrated this phenomenon by the fact that from that, from this mob, I received questions and that alone is where the phenomenon lies. If this person, and I have no doubt about it, is an analyst, she was able to notice that I had in the little I said - which was, I am repeating to you, execrable - demonstrated this phenomenon.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

That closes the brackets. I would like now to come back to what I have to advance in today, namely, that I only found, in a word, a single way of giving these three terms, Real, Symbolic, Imaginary their common measure by knotting the, with this bo-bo…bo-bo…Borromean knot. In other words, that you must pay attention to what I drew there on the board, and you have been able to see, not without difficulty, because I made a mistake in the colour on several occasions. Because it is indeed here that we will find the whole time the question, what distinguishes the way in which each one consists, of those things which at one time, I designated as rings of string, what distinguishes each one from the others? Absolutely nothing but the meaning. And that is why we have the hope, a hope, good God, on which you can thoroughly depend, because hope, in short for me is only in this affair. And if I did not have the answer, as you know, I would not ask the question.

We have the hope, I am leaving you the hope in the short term, there is none other, that we will take this year a step together, a step which only consists in the fact that, if we have won something somewhere, it is inevitably, it is surely, at the expense of something else. That in other terms, if analytic discourse functions, it is sure that we lose something in it elsewhere. Moreover, what could we well lose, if truly what I have just said, namely, that all the systems of nature that have emerged up to now are marked by mental deficiency, why should we hold on to them so much! There remain to us all the same these (19) pivotal systems whose manipulation may allow us, I mean us analysts, to account for our own operation.

I would like to keep you for an instant on the Borromean knot. The Borromean knot consists strictly in the fact that 3 is the minimum for it. If you make a chain, with what this word has for you, in terms of ordinary meaning…If you unknot two rings of a chain, the others will remain knotted (I-1).

http://www.lacaninireland.com

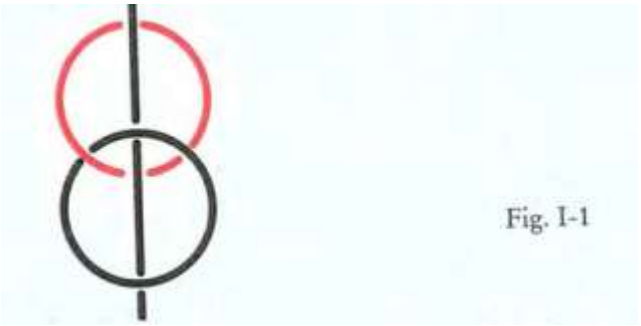

Fig. I-1

The definition of the Borromean knot starts from 3. Namely, that if [I-2] you break one of the rings of the 3, all 3 are freed, namely, the two other rings are freed.

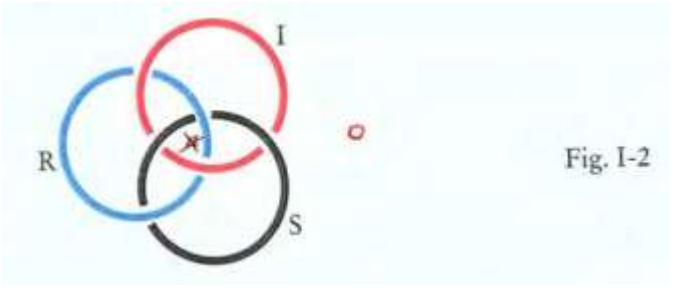

Fig. I-2

The remarkable thing in this, which is a matter of consistency, is that starting from there you can put an indefinite number of rings. It will always be true that if you break one of these rings, all the others, however numerous they are, will be freed. I already, I think, sufficiently made you sense, at a time that has already gone, that to take the example of a ring thus fabricated [I-3], it is quite conceivable that another comes to pass into the buckle which consists, which is realised by the bending of this little circle, and that you grasp, in short, immediately, that simply here by breaking the circle which, here, (20) prevents the third from being liberated, the bent buckle is going to slip from this, and that, in putting an indefinite number of these bent circles, you will see through what really tangible, immediately imaginable mechanism, all the rings are freed, whatever may be their number.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

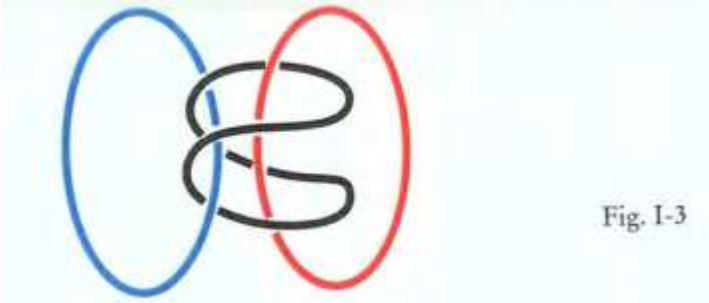

Fig. I-3

This property is all by itself what homogenises everything in terms of number starting from 3; which means that, in the sequence of numbers, of whole numbers, 1 and 2 are detached; something begins at 3, which includes all the numbers, however far they are denumerated, and it is indeed on this that I intended to put the emphasis, in my seminar, particularly last year. That is not all. There is much more than a single way of Borromeanising a certain number of consistent toruses, there is much more than a single way. I already indicated it at the appropriate time, there are very probably a quantity that there is no reason not to qualify as infinite, infinite in the sense of numerable, because you have only to suppose for an instant the following way of making a buckle [I-4] for you to perceive that you can multiply it indefinitely. Have you got that? Namely, to make of

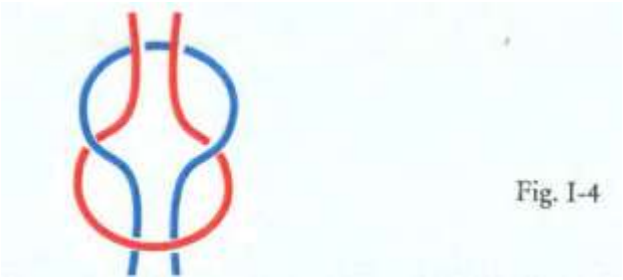

Fig. I-4

(21) these buckles, as many turns as you wish to knot the two toruses together. There is no plausible limit to this arrangement, and consequently, already simply in this dimension, there is a way of tying together, one to the other, as many ways as it is possible to dream of on this occasion. You can even find others, it will be no less true that the Borromean knot whatever it may be has as a lower limit the number 3, that Borromean knot will always bear the mark of three, and that under that heading, you have right away to ask yourself the question of the register to which the Borromean knot belongs? Is it to the Symbolic, to the Imaginary or to the Real?

http://www.lacaninireland.com

From today I am putting forward what subsequently I will allow myself to demonstrate, I am putting forward that the Borromean knot, in so far as it is supported by the number three, belongs to the register of the Imaginary. It is in so far as the Imaginary is rooted in the three dimensions of space. I am putting forward something which is nowhere going to be conjugated with a transcendental aesthetic. It is on the contrary because the Borromean knot belongs to the Imaginary, namely, supports the triad of the Imaginary, of the Symbolic and of the Real, it is in so far as this triad exists, from the fact that there is joined to it the addition of the Imaginary, that space qua sensible finds itself reduced to this minimum of three dimensions, in other words from its attachment to the Symbolic and to the Real.

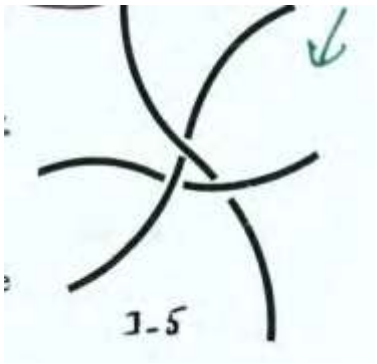
Other dimensions are imaginable, and they have been imagined. It is by sticking to the Symbolic and to the Real that the Imaginary is reduced what is not a maximum imposed by the sack of the body, but on the contrary, is defined by a minimum, the one which ensures there is only a Borromean knot from the fact that there are at least three of them.

I am going here, before leaving you, to give you a little indication, some points, some punctuations of what we are going to have to demonstrate this year. If here [I-2] I depicted the Real with a blue ring, the Symbolic with a white ring, and with a red ring the one that is found to be supported by the three, to be depicted here, dominating them, I would like to point out to you that it is in no way implied in the notion of the knot as such, of the Borromean knot, whether we are dealing with rings of string or with toruses, that it is just as conceivable that, in conformity with the intuition of Desargues in ordinary geometry, these rings open up, or, to say it simply, become

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(22) cords supposed, why not, nothing prevents us from positing it as a postulate, to join up at infinity.

There is nevertheless a means of defining what is called a point, namely, this something strange that Euclidean geometry does not define, and of which it nevertheless makes use as a support because on occasion, it punctuates the individual there. Namely, that the point, in Euclidean geometry, has no dimension at all, that it has zero dimensions, contrary to the line, to the surface, indeed to volume which respectively have one, two, three of them. Is there not, in the definition that Euclidean geometry gives of the point – as the intersection of two straight lines – something, I will allow myself to say, something that falls short? Namely, what would prevent two straight lines from sliding onto one another?



The only thing that would allow a point to be defined as such is presented like this [I-5], three straight lines which are not here simple lines, marks of a saw, shadows, but effectively three consistent straight lines which, at the central point here, produce what constitutes the essence of the Borromean knot, namely, which determine a point as such, something for which then, we must invent something other than simply the indication of a dimension which is supposed to be zero, which for its part has no dimension (ne dimense pas).

I am suggesting to you to try this out, that there is not simply here a banal stroke, namely, that this is also supported by three surfaces, I mean that with three surfaces you will obtain the effect described as a point in just as valid a way as the one depicted here, let us say, with three cords. That on the other hand, you can render tangible that you will obtain here these straight lines here, these cords from free (23) interplay, namely, on three surfaces that are not being squeezed, if you start not from the chain such as it is constituted in the Borromean knot, but in this chain two by two whose ghost I evoked earlier in passing, that in untying buckles knotted two by two, what you get are three straight lines, free one on the other, namely, not being squeezed, not defining the point as such.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

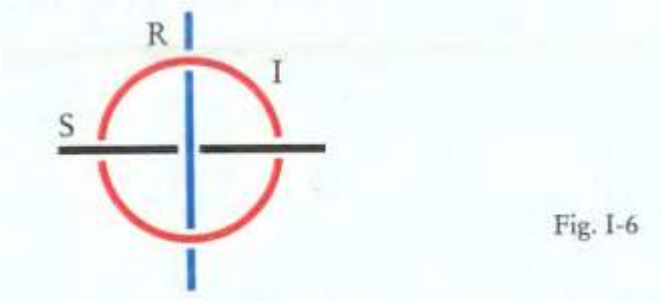

Fig. I-6

What I want to announce to you before leaving you, is then the following. It is clear [I-6], here, from the fact that we can see that with two infinite straight lines, we can, by knotting a single ring of string, maintain the property of the Borromean knot, on this single condition that the two straight lines are not able to cut themselves somewhere between this knot and infinity except in a single way. To take the straight line, R, it must be pulled forward, as I might say, while the line S of the figure on the right can only be pulled backwards. They must not, in a way, be brought to buckle with one another two by two, which, in any case excludes the central figure, which, having already made one of the buckles, that one of the rings, let's say the white ring on the red ring, defines by that simple fact, whatever may be its future fate, the strict position of the blue infinite straight line which must pass under what is below and over what is above, to express myself in a simple way. On this condition the Borromean knot functions.

I would like to indicate to you the fact that if we situate this blue ring of the Real, if we situate this ring of the Symbolic, and that of the Imaginary, I am allowing myself to indicate to you that here there is situated a flattening out, in other words a reduction of the Imaginary. For it is clear that the Imaginary always tends to be reduced to a (24) flattening out. It is on this that there is founded all depiction, it being well understood that it is not because we may have crumpled these three rings of string that they are any the less knotted in a Borromean way in the real, namely, with regard to the fact that each one of them, unknotted, frees the two others. This thing will always be true. How does it happen that we must have this flattening out in order to be able to depict any topology whatsoever? It is very certainly a question which reaches out towards that of the defectiveness that I qualified as mental, in so far as it is rooted in the body itself.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

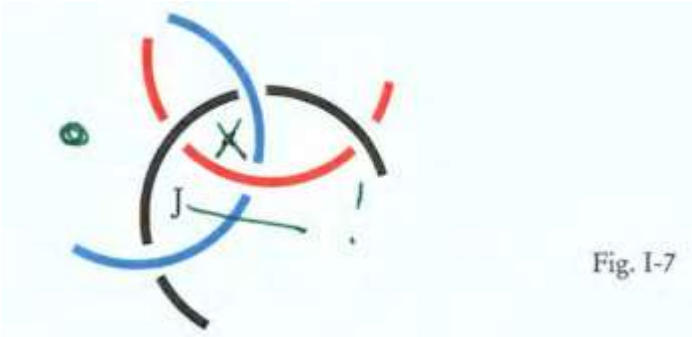

Fig. I-7

- Small o, I have written here; in the Imaginary but just as well in the Symbolic, I am write the function described as meaning.
- The two other functions, those that stem from what is to be defined with respect to the central point allowing there to be added three other points, this is something to be defined. We have enjoyment…

It is a matter of knowing that there are two enjoyments:

- for example, one we could define, but which one? As enjoying life, if the Real is life, we are led to refer to it, but is it sure? Enjoyment, in so far as it participates in the Imaginary of meaning, the enjoying of life in a word, is something that we can situate in the fact that, let us note it, is no less a point than the central point, the point described as that of the o-object, because it links together, on this occasion, three surfaces which also are squeezed.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

- And on the other hand what about this other mode of enjoyment, the one depicted by an overlapping, a squeezing where the Real comes here to squeeze it at the periphery of the two other rings of string? What about that enjoyment?

These are, close up, the points that we will have to elaborate, since moreover they are the ones that question us.

One point that I am suggesting here and now is this, to return to Freud, namely, to something triadic, he stated it as Inhibition, Symptom, Anxiety.

I would say that inhibition, as Freud himself articulates it, is always a matter of the body, or of functioning. And to indicate it already on this schema [I-8] I would say that inhibition is what somewhere stops interfering, as I might say, in a figure which is the figure of a hole, the hole of the Symbolic. We will have to discuss this inhibition in order to know if what is encountered in the animal, where there is in the nervous system these inhibiting centres, is something of the same order as this arrest of functioning qua Imaginary, qua specified in the speaking being, whether it is conceivable that something should be of the same order, namely, the bringing into function in the nevrax, in the central nervous system, of an activity that is positive qua inhibiting. How is it conceivable that the being presumed not to have language finds itself joining in the term inhibition something of the same order as what we grasp there, at the level of the experiority of meaning, that what we grasp there as stemming from what is found in short outside

http://www.lacaninireland.com

the body, namely, as a surface to topologise it in the way in which I told you that it is assuredly only on two dimensions that this is depicted, how inhibition can have to deal with what is a type of arrest which results from its intrusion into the field of the Symbolic.
(26) It is starting from there, a not simply starting from, it is quite gripping to see that anxiety, in so far as it is something that starts from the Real, it is altogether tangible to see that it is this anxiety that is going to give its meaning to the nature of the enjoyment that is produced here, under o, of the cross-checking brought to the surface, the Eulerian cross-checking of the Real and Symbolic.

Finally, to define the third term, it is in the symptom that we identify what is produced in the field of the Real. If the Real manifests itself in analysis and not only in analysis, if the notion of the symptom was introduced, well before Freud by Marx, so as to make it the sign of something which is what is not working out in the Real, if in other words, we are capable of operating on the symptom, it is in as far as the symptom is the effect of the Symbolic in the Real. It is inasmuch as this Symbolic, as I it drew here, must be completed here, and why is it outside? This is what I will have to manipulate for you in what follows, it is in so far as the unconscious is, in a word, what responds to the symptom. It is inasmuch as this knot, this knot quite real for its part even though only reflected in the Imaginary, it is in so far as this knot accounts for a certain number of inscriptions by which the surfaces respond to one another, and that we will see that the unconscious can be responsible for the reduction of the symptom.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 2: Tuesday 17 December 1974

Voilà. Hm! Like that, since I don't like much writing on the board, I am writing the minimum for you. This minimum is enough for you to recognise in it on the left the Borromean knot [II-1]. I think so anyway, inasmuch as you remember what I say. In short, you take notes, or at least some of you do. I think I have justified how the Borromean knot can be written; since it is a writing, a writing that supports a real. This already, just by itself, designates that not only can the Real be supported by a writing but that there is no other tangible idea of the real.

This Real, this Real that is the knot, the knot which is a construction, this Real is enough to leave open this trait, this trait of writing, this trait which is written which supports the idea of the Real. This because of the fact that the knot being made only from the fact that each of its elements is only knotted by a third, you can leave open one of these three. Since this is a fact that I highlighted, that I believe I highlighted the last time, that each of its elements can have two forms, the form of the infinite straight line, and the form that I designate, because it seems to me the best for your imagination, that I designate by a ring of string, which proves when one studies it to be a torus.

Having made this little bit of knot with what I said the last time, as a way of bringing it back to you, I find myself like that, this morning, preferring rather to read what I elaborated with you in mind. It seems to me that there are remarks, preliminary remarks in short, that may (30) well be of use to you in responding, in justifying, as questions, questions that I suppose you must have asked.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

So then I am not going to make these preliminary remarks numerous, I am going to make three of them. [On the board].

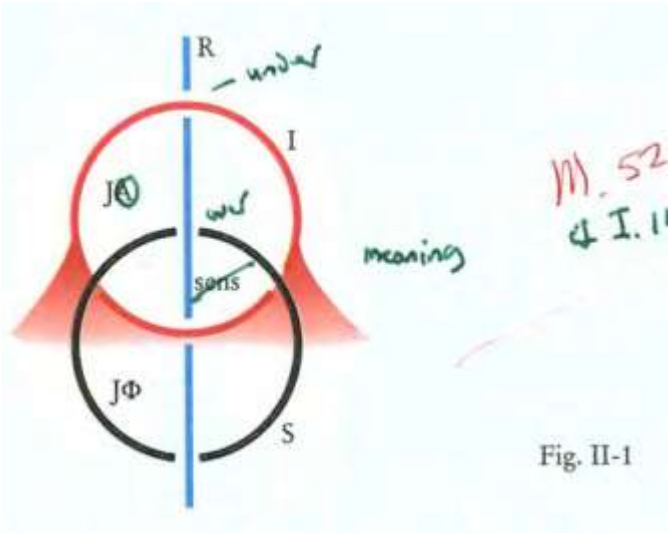

Fig. II-1

This may come to mind, in short, for some people who open books, they do not even need to open them. It's there on the covers! They may ask themselves…

[On the board] This knot that I put forward by way of uniting in it the R.S.I. in the most certain way, namely, when the S, this is the white ring that you see there, and the Imaginary, that's the red ring, this knot is held to be sufficiently defined, by not presenting an ambiguity, when the two rings are crossed by the Real, in a way, as I stated the last time, that the Real crosses them by being underneath the one of the two rings that is underneath and being above the one that is above. That is enough for the squeezing, whether you make it on the left or on the right. I point out to you in passing that it is impossible from this single knot to give the characterisation of this left or of this right; otherwise we would have the expected miracle that would allow us to make a message of the difference between the left and the right for the eventual subjects capable of receiving the aforesaid message. The Borromean knot can in no way serve as a basis for such a message which would permit the transmission of a difference between left and right. It is then a matter of indifference to place on the left or on the right what results because of the fact of this knot, something that we (31) will designate as external, as being the meaning, in so far as it is starting from it that there are defined the terms Real, Symbolic and Imaginary.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The very fact that I am advancing with these terms is something that ought to make you ask the question, it seems to me, by simply having read some titles of books, is the knot a model? A model in the sense that this is understood for example with respect to mathematical models, those that frequently serve us to extrapolate as regards the Real? Namely, as in this case, to establish from a writing what can be imagined from the very fact of this writing, which finds itself then allowing there to be accounted for the questionings which will be brought by experience to this real itself, which in any case is only a supposition there, a supposition which consists in this meaning of the word Real. I claim to repudiate for this knot the qualification of model, this in the name of what we must sup-pose to a model; the model as I have just said and this, because of its writing, is situated from the Imaginary. There is no Imaginary which does not suppose a substance. This is a strange fact, but it is always in the Imaginary, from the spirit that gives a substance to this model, that the questions formulated from it are secondarily asked of the Real.

And this is why I claim that this apparent model that consists in this knot, this Borromean knot, is an exception even though it also is situated in the Imaginary, is an exception to this supposition, by the fact that what it proposes, is that the three function here as pure consistency, namely, that it is only by holding together among themselves that they are consistent. The three hold together among themselves really, which implies metaphor all the same, and asks the question of which one is the impetus (erre), in the sense that I meant it last year, which is the impetus of the metaphor. For if I state, which can only be done from the Symbolic, from the word, that the consistency of these three rings is only supported by the Real, it is indeed because I use the setting aside of meaning which is permitted between R.S.I. as individualising these three rings, specifying them as such. The setting aside of meaning is supposed there to be taken from a certain maximum. What is the accepted maximum of the setting aside of meaning? This is a question that I can only, in the present state of things, put to linguists. How the linguist – and there is one who honours me today by his presence in the front row – how can a linguist define the limits of metaphor? What can define a maximum of the divergence of metaphor, in the sense that I have stated it, a (32) reference to the Agency of the letter, in my Ecrits; what is the permitted maximum of the substitution of one signifier for another? I apologise, perhaps I have been a little quick here but it is certain that we cannot afford to delay. We cannot afford to delay and, because of that, I must pass on to my second remark.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

To operate with this knot in an appropriate manner, you have to ground yourselves on a little stupidity. The best thing is still to use stupidly what is meant by being its dupe. One must not get into this subject with obessional doubt, or haggle too much. One thing struck me in reading a work which it happens my daughter had got wind of, though her work on Buffon. She borrowed it from someone who moreover promptly gave her indications on the appearance of this text. This text is by Maupertuis, who at the Berlin Academy, had given under the title of The physical Venus a report of what was in short at the high point, in his time, of what is known about the phenomenon of the reproduction of living bodies. For him to have introduced it with the term of The physical Venus, shows that he only wants to deal with sexed reproduction.

It is quite striking, to my eyes at least, to see that this reading of Maupertuis – on this occasion, for someone who can be located in history, certainly the first thing that stands out, is the date of this statement, 1756 – bears witness to the time taken by these speaking beasts which men are, let us take them as defined by that, to realise what was specific in sexed reproduction. It is quite clear to my eyes that it is because of not being simply dupe, of not sticking to what his time furnished him as material, namely, already a lot, the mapping out in the microscope by Leeuwenhoek and Swammerdam, of what were called at the time animalculs, namely, the spermatozoon and the eggs on the other hand; namely, what is ordinarily supported by two bodies which, by this fact, are defined as being of opposite sexes, with some exceptions of course, namely, that the same body, may support the two, which happens with snails as you are not unaware of. It is assuredly because of not sticking to this massive fact of the distinction between the animalcul and the egg, nevertheless here and now present in the simple diversity of theories, that Maupertuis, by not being a dupe, by not sticking to this massive fact, and in a word by not being stupid enough, does not realise the point properly speaking of discovery that this constitutes for what is involved in terms of a real (33) apprehension of the distinction between the sexes, does not stick to what was he was brought. If he had been a dupe, he would have erred less. Not that of course his impetus was stupid because he gets to something that is in a way the prefiguration, as one might say, of what was revealed by the later examination of more powerful microscopes to constitute the existence of genes. Between ovism and animalculism, namely, what puts the whole stress on one of these elements or the whole stress on the other, he goes as far as to imagine that the facts of attraction and repulsion can lead things to this composition as regards which moreover the experiment, the experiment conducted by Harvey on the examination of what is stated as existing in terms of a first manifestation of what he calls the living point at the back of the uterus of does that Charles I had placed at his disposition. He manages certainly to have an idea, or at least to suggest it, about what may happen, and as regards which one can say that it effectively happens at the level of what might be a morula, for example, indeed at a further stage which is that of the gastrula, but precisely by guessing…by guessing he does not advance.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

What escapes him is that each cell of what someone like Harvey discovered, and for him to blind himself to it as being the substance of the embryo, is the puzzle, the mixture apparently that one might imagine about it, namely, something that Maupertuis does not fail to imagine. The fact is that in this puzzle, in these cellular elements, there are some that are supposed to be male and others female. Which is certainly not true. It must be pushed much further, and to tell the truth in such a way that the living point can in no way be recognised. We are at the level of these distinguishable genes in the caryosome in the innermost part of the cell. It is because one must go that far that the idea of the mixture, towards which Maupertuis leans, is simply a premature idea, not a forging ahead, precisely! It is, as I might say, by being a non-dupe that he imagines very badly. He is not dupe in the measure that he does not stick strictly to what is provided to him, that in short he makes hypotheses. Hypotheses non fingere. The repudiation of hypotheses seems to me to be what is appropriate and what I designate properly by this advice to be stupid enough not to ask oneself questions concerning the use of my knot, for example. It is certainly not with the help of this knot that one can go further than from where it emerges, namely, from analytic experience. It is analytic experience that it accounts for, and that is what gives it its value.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(34) Third remark, also preliminary. In what does there consist in the knot, as it is presented, this something which, from the first remark, made someone ask me the question of whether it was a model? The fact is of course, that apparently the Imaginary dominates in it; the Imaginary dominating in it is something in effect that reposes on the fact that this grounds its consistency. What I am introducing by this remark is the following. It is that enjoyment, with regard to this Imaginary consistency, can do nothing but ek-sist, or parody it, it is with regard to the Real, it is something other than meaning that is at stake in enjoyment. With that the signifier is what remains. For if the signifier, by this fact, is deprived of meaning, it is because the signifier, all that remains, proposes itself as intervening in this enjoyment. Not of course that the 'I think' is enough to assure ek-

http://www.lacaninireland.com

sistence – it is not for nothing that Descartes stumbled there – but up to a certain point, it is all the same true that it is only by effacing all meaning that ek-sistence is defined. And indeed, moreover, he himself floated between the sum, ergo and the exsisto. Assuredly the notion of ek-sistence, was not then assured. For something to ek-sist, there must be a hole somewhere. It is around this hole simulated by Descartes' I think, since this I think, is empty, it is around this hole that the ek-sistence is suggested. Assuredly we have these holes here at the heart of each of these rings, since without this hole it would not even be thinkable that something can be knotted.

It is a matter of situating, not what Descartes thought, but what Freud touched, and for that, I propose that what ek-sists to the Real, to the Real of the hole, should be symbolised in writing by an intermediary field, intermediary like flattened out, because this is all that writing permits us. It is quite striking in effect that writing requires, as such, this flattening out. And if here I suggest that something supposes, incarnates I would say, that the Symbolic, for example, shows in two-dimensional space [II-2] defined by the fact that something ek-sists by only being supposable in writing from the opening, the opening of the ring into this indefinite straight line, that is here what moreover with respect to one of the elements of the knot as to all the others, what allows to situate what stems from existence.

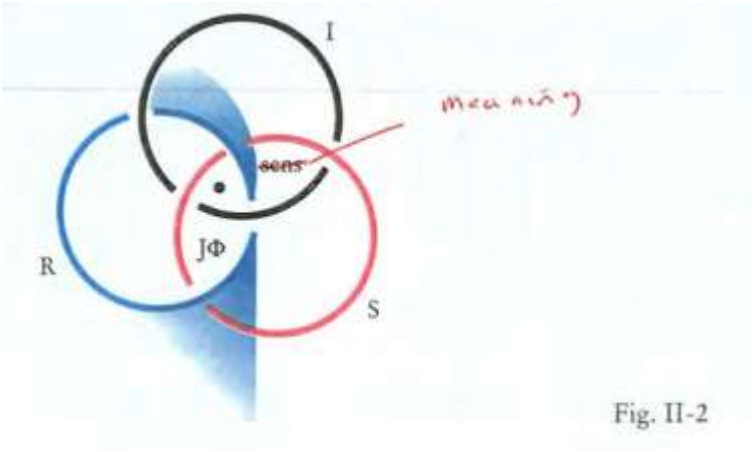

Fig. II-2

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Why then, on the right, have I marked that what is concerned in ek-sistence is something that is metaphorised from phallic enjoyment? This is a proposition which presupposes that I should say more about this enjoyment. To situate it in a way which will not give rise to ambiguity, it is with a blue stroke that I draw what is involved in the Real, and with a red stroke, the Symbolic. I propose, even if only with the aim of completing it subsequently, to situate here, as such, phallic enjoyment, in so far as it is in relation to what ek-sists to the Real, namely, what is posited from the field produced by the fact that the Real ring, that's how I am calling the ring connoted as the Real, from the fact that it opens out to posit itself as this infinite straight line, isolated, as one might say, in its consistency. It is to the Real as making a hole that enjoyment ek-sists.

This is due to what analytic experience has contributed to us as such. There is in Freud…- I am not going, quite simply for want of having collected them – there is in Freud a kow-towing, as I might say, before phallic enjoyment as such. This is what analytic experience discovers, the nodal function of this enjoyment qua phallic. And it is around it that there is founded what is involved in this sort of Real with which analysis has to deal.

What is important to see, is that if there is something by which the knot is supported it is precisely that there is with regard to this phallic enjoyment, as Real, this something that only situates it from the squeezing that results from nodality, as I might say…the nodality proper to the Borromean knot and from the fact that something which here is drawn as a ring, as a ring of string, as a ring qua consistency that constitutes the Symbolic. It is in the measure that a third point, which is defined as what defines meaning, is external to the more (36) central of the points of this nodality. It is in this sense that there is produced what is called phallic enjoyment. Phallic enjoyment always involves the knot that is made with the ring of the Symbolic, to name it only in the way as it ought to be. That this enjoyment as such is linked to the production of ek-sistence is something that I am proposing this year to put to the test.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

For you see what results from it is that this knot, as I stated, this knot is reduplicated by another triplicity, the one linked to meaning in so far as it is from meaning that there starts the distinction of meanings which from these terms makes three terms. It is from this that we ought, can, start for the knot to consist as such. There are three elements, and it is as three that these elements are supported; we reduce them to being three. That simply is what gives them their meaning. On the other hand, under the heading of ek-sistence they are each distinct, and moreover it is with regard to enjoyment as real that they are differentiated, and that at this level what analytic experience contributes, is that it is in the measure that enjoyment is what ek-sists, that it makes the Real, that it justifies it precisely by that, by ek-sisting. Assuredly, there is here a passage which is important, because to what does ek-sistence ek-sist? Certainly not to what consists. Ek-sistence as such is defined, is supported by what in each of these terms, R.S.I., creates a hole. There is in each something which means that it is from the circle, from a fundamental circularity, that it is defined, and this something is what has to be named.

It is striking that in Freud's time, all that is named about it is Imaginary. I mean that the function for example described as the ego, is this something that Freud, in conformity with this necessity, with this penchant which means that it is to the Imaginary that the substance as such goes, Freud designates it by what? Nothing other than what in representation creates a hole. He does not go so far as to say it but he represents it in this phantastical topography which the second is, while the first marked his amazed distance with regard to what he had discovered about the unconscious. It is in the sack, the sack of the body, it is with this sack that the ego is depicted, and this moreover induces him to having to specify something about this ego which is precisely to make a hole in it to allow the world to enter it, to necessitate that this sack should be, in a way stoppered by perception. It is in as far that Freud does not designate as such, but betrays, that the ego is only a hole.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(37) What are the holes constituted on the one hand by the Real and on the other by the Symbolic? This is something that we assuredly will have to examine very closely. For something, of course, is opened up to us, which seems in a way to be self-evident. Namely, to designate this hole in the Real by life, and moreover this is a slope which Freud himself did not resist, in opposing life instincts to death instincts. I note that in questioning by our knot what is involved in the structure necessitated by Freud, that it is on the side of death that the function of the Symbolic is found. It is in so far as something is urverdrängt in the Symbolic that there is something that we can never give a meaning to, even though we are, it is almost a refrain to state it, we are capable logically of saying that all men are mortal. It is in so far as all men are mortal does not, from the very fact that this all, properly speaking has no meaning, that at least the plague must be propagated at Thebes, in order that this all may become something imaginable and not purely Symbolic; that each one must feel himself concerned in particular by the threat of the plague, that there is revealed at the same time what supposed that. Namely, that if Oedipus forced something, it is altogether without knowing it, that, as I might say, he only killed his father for want of having, if you will allow me to say it, for want of having taken the time to laïusser. If he had taken the time that was required, but it would have required certainly a time that would have been almost the time of an analysis, since for himself, it was precisely for that reason that he was on the road, namely, that he believed through a dream precisely, that he was going to kill the one who under the name of Polybus was well and truly his veritable father.

What Freud brings us concerning what is involved in the Other, is precisely this, that there is only an Other by saying it. But that this

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Total-Other (Tout-autre) is quite impossible to say completely, that there is an urverdrängt, an irreducible unconscious, and that to say it, is properly speaking what is not only defined as impossible, but introduces as such the category of the impossible.

That religion is true, is something that I said on occasion. It is surely more true than neurosis in that it represses this fact that it is not true that God simply is (soit seulement), as I might say, in which Voltaire had a cast iron belief. It says that he ek-sists, that he is ek-sistence par excellence, namely, that in short he is repression in person, he is even the person presupposed for repression. And it is in that that it is true. (38) God is nothing other than what ensures that starting from language, there cannot be established a relationship between the sexed. Where is God in all of that? I never said that he was in language. Language, well then! Precisely, it is what we will have to question ourselves about this year. Where can it come from? I certainly did not say that this came to fill a hole, the one constituted by the non-relationship, the constitutive non-relationship of the sexual, because this non-relationship is only suspended on it. Language is not then simply a stopper, it is that in which there is inscribed this non-relationship. That is all we can say about it. God, for his part comprises the totality of the effects of language, including the psychoanalytic effects, which is no small thing to say!

To fix things, what are called ideas, is that not so, and which are not at all ideas, to fix things there where they deserve to be fixed, in logic, Freud does not believe in God, because he operates along his own line as is testified by the powder that he throws into our eyes in order to en-moiser us [play on Moses and moi?]. The en-moisement may also be the en-moisement of which I spoke earlier. Not alone does he perpetuate religion but he consecrates it as the ideal neurosis. This indeed is what he says moreover in attaching it to obsessional neurosis which is the ideal neurosis, which deserves to be called properly speaking ideal. And he cannot do otherwise because it is impossible namely, that he is dupe, for his part, in the right way, the one that does not err. Not like me! I cannot testify that I err; I err in these intervals that I try to situate for you, of Meaning, of Phallic Enjoyment, indeed of the Third Term, which I have not illuminated, because it is what gives us the key to the hole, the hole as I am designating it. It is Enjoyment in so far as it would involve, not the other of the signifier, but the other of the body, the other of the other sex.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

When I say, state, announce that there is no sexual relationship does this not mean this fact that is there in experience, that everyone knows, but about which we must learn why Freud did not take it into account. Why Freud qualified Eros by the One, handing himself over to the myth of the body, of the united body, of the body with two backs, of the completely round body, by daring to refer himself to this Platonic blunder? Is it not that the fact that we may well embrace any other body whatsoever is nothing more than the sign of the most extreme perplexity? It happens that thanks to a fact that Freud (39) catalogues quite obviously as is required as regression, and what's more we suck it, what matter? Apart from breaking it into fragments, it is hard to see what one can really do to another body, I mean another body described as human! There is thus justified that if we seek what this enjoyment of the other body can be bordered by, in so far as it surely makes a hole, what we find is anxiety.

This indeed is why at a time, a time where it was certainly not for nothing that I had chosen this theme of anxiety, I had chosen it, because I knew that it would not last. I knew that it would not last because I had faithful followers who were busying themselves with giving rise to points of order which would subsequently have me declared unsuitable for transmitting analytic theory. Not at all that this provoked anguish in me, or even embarrassment. Anyway that can return any time. This provoked neither anxiety nor embarrassment in me. But I wanted all the same precisely in connection with this anxiety, Inhibition, symptom, anxiety, to say certain things which should now in short bear witness to the fact that it is quite compatible with the idea that the unconscious is conditioned by language, to situate affects in it. This simply means that it is to language and that it is from language we are manifestly and in an altogether overwhelming way affected. And what's more, at the time of my seminar on anxiety, if I introduced something, it is precisely the qualities of affect. That for a long time the affectionate, there, the affected had not simply not found them, but it was completely ruled out that they should be even able to glimpse them. That indeed is why you can find in the mapping out that I made at the time, about what is involved in Anxiety, inhibition, symptom that I staggered on three planes

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Inhibition

Symptom

Anxiety

in order precisely to be able to demonstrate what from that time is tangible, namely, that these three terms inhibition, symptom, anxiety are just as heterogeneous among themselves as my terms of Real, Symbolic and Imaginary. And that specifically, anxiety is that, it is (40) what is obvious, it is what within the body ek-sists, ek-sists when there is something that awakens it, which torments it. Look at little Hans, when it happens that there is made tangible the association to a body, specifically a male one on this occasion, defined as male, the association of a body and a phallic enjoyment. If Little Hans rushes into phobia, it is obviously to give body, I demonstrated it for a whole year, to give body to the embarrassment that he is in about this phallus, and for which he invents a whole series of differently prancing equivalents in the form of the phobia described as that of horses. Little Hans, in his anxiety, source of the phobia, source of the phobia and it is in this sense that in giving him what one might call this pure anxiety, they manage to get him to accommodate himself to this phallus about which, when all is said and done, like all of those who find themselves being charged with it, what I one day qualified as being a smuggler (bandoulière), well then, he simply has to accommodate himself to it, namely, that he is married to this phallus. This is something that the man can do nothing about. The woman, who does not ek-sist, can dream about having one, but the man is afflicted with it. He has no other wife than that.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

This is what Freud said, is that not so on every register. What did he say, in saying in short that the phallic drive is not the genital drive, if not that the genital drive, in the man, make no mistake, is not at all natural. Not only is it not natural, but if he did not have this devil of the symbolic pushing him from behind, so that when all is said and done he ejaculates and that this is of some use, but long ago there would have been no more of these speaking beings, of these beings who do not speak simply to be, but which are so by being [parlêtres]. Which is really the high point of the high point of futility.

Good! Well then, it is a quarter to two. For my part I find that today since I more or less improvised everything that I wanted to tell you, I am rather tired like that. This will all appear in a different shape, since after all I am not all that satisfied with this one.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

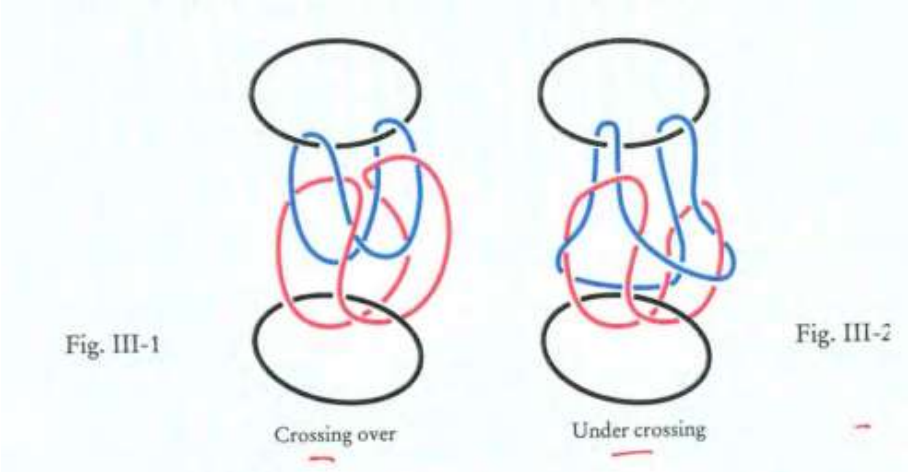
Seminar 3: Tuesday 14 January 1975

Voilà! What I am saying concerns, you are the proof of it, concerns everybody. It does not concern me, for my part, like everybody else. And that indeed is why it concerns everybody, because that is sensed in what I say. Why is that sensed? Because what I am saying is an opening up that concerns my practice, an opening up that starts from this question that of course I would not ask if I did not have the answer in my practice. It is: what is implied by the fact that psychoanalysis works?

You come to see me, but this has nothing to do with what I do in terms of psychoanalysis, you come to see me operating on the board. This was, as you have been able to see, no small matter…I corrected myself time after time, even though I had a piece of paper in my pocket to guide me, otherwise I would have become even more entangled in it, I would have got into even more of a mess than I did! In effect…

What you see on the right [III-1] is the good old granddaddy Borromean knot, the Borromean knot of four, in which it is easy, immediate to see, that if you cut any one of these rings of string, the three others are free. There is then not the slightest complication in making a Borromean knot as long as you wish, namely, to knot to one another any number at all of rings of string. I already pointed out that as I draw it there, the number, the number of rings of string is not, as I might say, homogeneous. As you can see, simply by looking at this schema, there is what you might call a first and a last. The way it is done like that, there cannot be more than four and if I proceed in the same way for there to be five of them, I would have in a way to give to the one that – if you wish, the one on the extreme right – [here on the bottom figure] we will call the last, a different way of being knotted.

http://www.lacaninireland.com



Because when all is said and done, it is the last that holds the whole chain, which ensures that there are four of them there, and if I go a little further, there will be five, on condition that I do not give to the last the same role, because it will be holding five instead of four.

You know this by, I must have made an allusion in passing to it, the way of articulating the essence of number that Peano produced by means of a certain number of axioms, it seems that here the n+1, the successor that Peano highlights as structuring the whole number, this on a single condition, which is that there should be one at the start which is not the 'successor' of anyone, namely, what this ring of string imitates very well, what he designates by zero. It is in an axiomatic fashion that Peano expresses himself, that Peano makes his statement, namely, that he posits a certain number of axioms and that it is from there, in conformity with mathematical requirements, arithmetical on this occasion, that he constructs something that gives us the definition of a series which will be in numbers, in homological whole numbers let us say, since we are here homological, namely, that everything that will be done by means of such axioms will be homological to the series of whole numbers.

But what am I showing you here? Something different, since here there is specified the function of this +1 as such. It is this +1 which (43) ensures that, eliminate that one for example, there is no longer a chain here, there is no longer a series since from the simple fact of cutting out this one-among-others, all the others, let us say, are freed as ones. It is a way, would I call it material, to make it sensed that 1 is not a number, even though this sequence of numbers is made up of a sequence of ones.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

By using rings of string, let us say that I am illustrating something that is not unrelated to this sequence of numbers which, as you know, we have the greatest difficulty not to take as a constituent of the Real. Every approach to the Real makes it very difficult not to take account of number. Number seems (semble)…why not welcome this word which comes to me here prematurely? First of all the Real is woven by number. There is in number a consistency which is indeed of a nature that we can say is not natural at all. Since, for me to make you sense that I am tackling this category of the Real in so far as there is something which knots what I am led to give consistency to also – the Imaginary and the Symbolic – how does it happen that this, as I might say, pushes me first of all to use the knot?

It is by virtue of being the same consistency in these three something that I originated in terms of the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real, it is in virtue of being the same consistency that I produce – and why so, to give myself an explanation of my practice – that I produce this Borromean knot. That was never done, never done what consists…consists in what? Disregarding consistency as such. I isolate consistency as this something that I will call like that, to give you an image because I do not stint myself in giving images.

What is there here [on the board] if not images, images about which the most astonishing thing is that you can locate yourself in them. Because you must not believe that these images function just by themselves! No doubt you are used to the blackboard, but what do you see on it? The very trouble you have seen that I had to go to for these images, which have this property that flattened out, nevertheless a line must pass over, crossing over [III-1] or go underneath, under- crossing [III-2] that this should make an image is already in itself miraculous. I am moreover not quite sure that you will grasp these images as easily as that.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

You clearly see that there is nevertheless a difference. I am putting (44) the problem to you: is this knot, as it is there, as it is made, in the granddaddy way that I have signalled to you for a long time, is it the same? In other words, by simply fiddling around with the thing, are you able I am not saying to transform it into this one here since it is supposed to be the same? Set yourself that as a little exercise…In other words, this is the meaning of what I am asking you, does it work in fours? Is it the same knot, or is one more required? For I am telling you already that in a chain made up like that one, the transformation can be obtained. But I am not telling you, to leave the delight for yourselves, I am not telling you from how many on, because there is one thing certain, which is that with three, you will not produce this very particular little complication that apparently distinguishes the figure on the left from the figure on the right.

If there is something that illustrates that consistency, this something which is in a way underlies everything that we say, that this consistency is something other than what is qualified, in language, as non-contradiction, it is this sort of figure, in so far as it has this something that I am indeed forced to call a real consistency, because this is what is supposed.

The fact is that a cord holds together. We never think about it, we never think about the fact that there is a metaphor in the term consistency. There is even something more, which is that I am communicating to you this real consistency by way of an intuition of which, all the same, I can say, that since I transmit it to you by image, it is by way of an imaginary intuition that I am communicating it to you. And the fact that I am sure that you are not more familiar than I am with these sorts of figures – the few openings out that I am

http://www.lacaninireland.com

creating of it for you by drawing it on the board – I am sure that, let us say, for the great majority of you, the question I am posing, that of the transformation which is not a transformation, which would be a transformation if the knot had to be remade so that the one on the left is transformed into the one on the right, or inversely, I asked you this question, is it the same knot? There are not many who could tell me out of the blue like that. And still fewer tell me why.

Here we are then, as I might say, with this cord in hand as supposed foundation of consistency, in such a way that it cannot be said what is at stake there is something to which we are already habituated, (45) namely, the geometrical line. It is all the same something quite different. Not only is the geometrical line not that, but everyone knows that what it generates, are all sorts of problems about its continuity, which are not nothing and which are not nothing, why? Precisely because we cannot support the line with something that has precisely this consistency, that makes a cord. This is even the principle, the principle of the fact that the first bluff perpetrated about the functions described as continuous. It seemed that one could not construct a line which does not somewhere have a tangent, that this tangent was straight or curved, moreover, was of little importance. It is from this idea that the line was not after all without width that there were produced these mirages with which mathematicians had to fight for a long time and that moreover it took time for them to wake up to the fact that one could make a perfectly continuous line which did not have a tangent.

This is to say all the same the importance of this image, but is it indeed an image? After all, it is not for nothing that you are told 'Hold fast to the cord, huh' (T'nez bien la corde hein!). 'Hold fast to the cord' means that when the other end of the cord is knotted, you can hold onto it. This has something to do with the Real, and it is that here indeed, good God, it does not seem to me to be missing the point to remind you that in his rule among the proper Rules for the direction of the mind (esprit), someone called Descartes did not think it was superfluous, in this Rule X, to make the remark that '…since not all minds are equally inclined to spontaneously discover things by their own strength, this rule – the one that he is stating – teaches that one must not busy oneself immediately with the more difficult and arduous things – less important – but that one must first of all study thoroughly the less important and the simplest arts, those in particular where greater order reigns, like those of artisans who make cloth and carpets, or those of women who embroider or do lace work, as well as all the combinations of numbers and all the operations that refer to arithmetic, and other similar things…".

http://www.lacaninireland.com

There is not the slightest suspicion that in saying these things, Descartes had the feeling that there is a relationship between arithmetic and the fact that women do lace work, indeed that upholsterers make knots. On the other hand it is certain that Descartes never in the slightest interested himself in knots. Quite the (46) contrary we had to be well advanced into the 20th Century for something to be outlined that could be called a theory of knots. You know on the other hand, what I have told you, that this theory of knots is in its infancy, is extremely clumsy. And as it is fabricated, there are many cases where at the sight of simple figures such as the ones that I have made for you on the board, you could not in any way give an explanation for the fact, whether yes or no, the tangle that you have drawn is or is not a knot, whatever may be the conventions that you have given yourself in advance to account for the knot as such. The fact is moreover that there is something that is worth dwelling on. Is it because of an intuition? But what I am demonstrating to you, is that it goes much further than that, it is not simply that vision always more or less makes a surface, it is for more profound reasons that in a way these knots make tangible for you, it is for more profound reasons for what is in the nature, in the nature of things as they say. The being who speaks, since after all we cannot say a whole lot about the others, at least until we have gone a little bit more keenly into the slant of their meaning, the being who speaks is always somewhere badly situated between two and three dimensions.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

This indeed is why, you have heard me putting forward here something that is the same thing, the same thing as my knot, this equivocation on dit-mansion, that I write, as you know because I have dinned it into you, that I write as d-i-t hyphen mansion, a stage set [?] of the said. We do not know very well whether in the saying we have the three dimensions written as they customarily are. I mean whether we are able to move around in it so easily, Ta zoa trexei [animals run] And we are undoubtedly there, zoon. We walk, but it must not be imagined that because we walk, we are doing something that has the slightest relationship with three-dimensional space. That our body has three dimensions is something about which there is no doubt as long as we can pierce the skin of this body. But this does not at all mean that what we call space is not always more or less flat. There are even mathematicians who wrote that explicitly, all space is flat.

Any manipulation of something real is situated in this case in a space that in fact we are able to handle very badly outside techniques that are required by this three-dimensional space. It is obviously quite (47) striking that it is a technique, a technique that can be reduced to what it apparently is, namely, this chatting which for me forces my hand about the weighing up, as I might say, of space as such.

If we start again from something that must indeed be said to be science, does science not allow us to suspect, that in treating space in the same way as the one a technique in fact requires, requires of me at least, what it encounters is a paradox. Because in short, one cannot say that matter, you have heard tell of it a little bit, that matter does not create a problem for it at every instant. A problem, namely, that's what problem means, an advance defence, something to crush before getting to see what it is defending. Science has perhaps not yet completely realised that if it treats matter, it is as if the aforesaid matter had an unconscious, as if it knew somewhere what it was doing. Naturally it is a truth that was very rapidly extinguished. People noticed it, there is a little moment of awakening, at the time of Newton, he was told, listen, this business of this blessed gravity that you are telling us about, be serious! How moreover how could it have been represented before, apart from Aristotle's topos! Anyway! Be serious! That is unthinkable for us! Unthinkable because…why? Because we have Newton's little formulae and we understand nothing about them, which is what gives them their value. Because when these formulae made their entry, it was to this that right away an objection was raised, namely, but how can each one of these little particles know the distance it is from all the others? Namely, what was evoked was the unconscious, in short, of the particle, of course!

http://www.lacaninireland.com

All that, all that has died down. Because why? Because people have simply given up trying to understand anything about it and that, moreover, it is in the measure that people have come back to it that we have been able to arrive at more complicated formulae by knotting a few more dimensions into the affair. This indeed is the problem. What is this analysis, in the proper sense of my technique, one that I have in common with a certain number of people who are here, and what place does this technique occupy with regard to what constitutes science? Science counts, it counts matter, but what does it count in this matter? Namely, if there were not the language that number (48) already conveys, what meaning would have to count? Does the unconscious for example have an accountant (comptable) in it? I am not saying something that can be counted, I am asking whether there is an accountant in the sense of the character that you know who scribbles numbers. Is there an accountant in the unconscious? Quite obviously, yes. Each unconscious is not something of the accountant, it is an accountant, and an accountant who knows how to do addition. Naturally it has not yet, of course, got to multiplication, this is even what perplexes it. But as regards counting things, counting the blows,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I will not say that it knows how to deal with it, it is extremely awkward, but it must count in the style, in the style of these knots.

It is from this that there comes the famous guilt feeling about which you have probably sometimes heard talk…the guilt feeling is something that does accounts, that does accounts and of course cannot work them out, can never work them out. It gets lost in its accounts. But it is indeed there that it can be felt that there is at least a knot, this knot of which, if you will allow me to say it, nature abhors. I mean a different song than nature abhors a vacuum, nature abhors the knot. Nature abhors the knot, and very especially the Borromean and, a strange thing, that is why I am going over the thing with you. The thing, is nothing less than the urverdrängt, the original repressed, the primal repressed, and that is why I advise you to practice my two little things [III-1 & III-2]. It is not because it will tell you anything whatsoever about the repressed, since this repressed is the hole. You will never get to it. But en route, by manipulating this little knot, you will familiarise yourselves, at least with your hands, with this something about which in any case you will never understand anything, because it is altogether ruled out that you should know this knot. That is indeed why, as history bears witness, that indeed is why geometry has gone through everything, through cubes, through pyramids, the different forms of hedgehog about which in short people have cogitated. In short, rigour is what means nothing other than solids! While it had within hand's reach, something which was well worth, good God, the stones with which it made the carriage, or the fields, precisely what could not be measured without stretching out cords. Never has anyone seemed to have reserved for these cords the slightest attention up to very recent times.

(49) In a certain sense, I would say that there is something new, in the fact that people have been interested in words, in terms like that for example of mesology; what is there between, between what and what? It is a matter of defining what does between mean. Yeah! I between you (je t'entre), it is my own tentrisme. Between, is a category that made its appearance, in short, quite recently in mathematics and, that indeed is why, in short, hat from time to time I consult a mathematician so that he can tell me where they have got to in this respect.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Yes! There is something that to take…[on the board].

You see, I am making progress. I have almost managed to draw a Borromean knot without being forced to rub bits out. I would like today, since already time is passing, to announce what I have to say, and what will occupy our year.

Here [III-3] at the joint of the Imaginary and of the Symbolic, and not just in any joint, in this joint here, where you may confuse these two points – even though they still do not come from the same movement, from the same relative movement of the Imaginary and the Symbolic – here, in these two points which moreover are confused, when the squeezing between the Imaginary and the Symbolic occurs, in these two points, there is meaning. I must split things a little, because I apologise, I must have delayed to give you a little of a dit-mansion, a dit-mansion that concerns me, that of the knot.

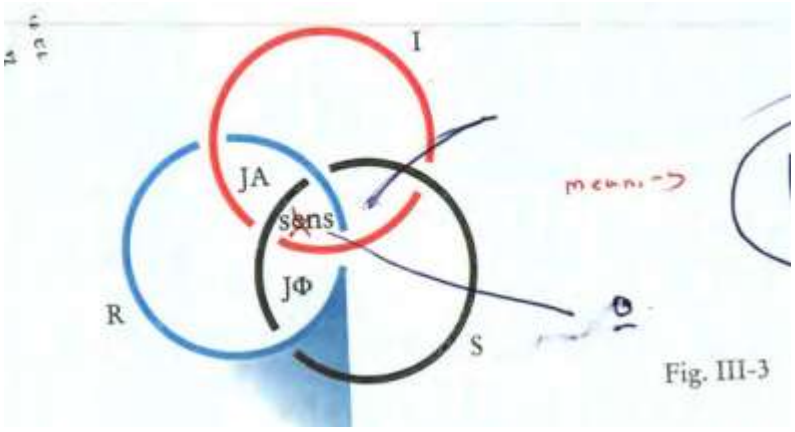

Fig. III-3

(50) Here, and there, you can see how difficult it is, I must all the same fiddle around a bit, we have something that is called phallic enjoyment. There you are! Why do we call it phallic enjoyment?

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Because there is something called ek-sistence. Ek-sistence, I ought to say, has a history. It is not a word that was used so easily, nor voluntarily, at least in the philosophical tradition, and since we do not know how people in the first centuries spoke, I mean that we certainly have glimpses, about a certain Latin tongue, the popular tongue. Perhaps it was spoken over a considerable area, this core tongue from which there came by differentiation the romance tongues. In this popular Latin tongue, we have no testimony that existo nor existere was used. Nevertheless, it is curious that this term emerged, and emerged in a field that we will call philosophico-religious. It is altogether in the measure that religion sucked in, the religious humante, that religion sucked in philosophy that we have seen emerging this word existence, which seems nevertheless to have had, make no mistake, many raisons d'être.

What is this existence, and where indeed can we situate it? This existence is very important in itself, because if we have the idea, the idea that something that comes in place of this kind of naïve production and which only starts from words, namely, what Aristotle advanced into, namely, that the dictum de omni et nullo, he says somewhere, this is what the Universal is, what is said about all can also be applied to a particular. It is from this that the first linguistic disentangling took place. The serious thing is that what followed consisted in demonstrating to Aristotle, who could not accept it for a long time, that universality did not imply existence. But this is not what is serious in a certain apprehension of things. That universality does not imply existence, we sweep aside every day. It is that existence implies universality that is serious. It is that in what is existence, we chatter on about something which participates in the general, while the very reason that my little Borromean knot is made, is to show you that existence is of its nature what eks. What turns the consistent but what creates an interval, and which in this interval has may ways of being knotted, precisely in the measure that we do not

http://www.lacaninireland.com

(51) have the slightest manual or mental familiarity with these knots. Moreover, it is the same thing!

Many people have suspected, in short is that not so, that man is only a hand. If only he were a hand! There is his whole body. He thinks also with his feet, I even advised you to do so, because it is after all the best thing that can be wished for you. Here, what resists the test of existence, to be taken as what is squeezed in the knot?

There is all the same an opening up, the opening up made by Freud. Freud certainly did not have the notion of the Imaginary, of the Symbolic and of the Real that I have, because it is the least that one can have, call that what you wish, provided there are three consistencies, you have the knot. What Freud did is not unrelated to existence and, by this fact, comes close to the knot. I am going, like that, because I am nice and because I have pissed you off enough today, I am all the same going to show you something that I find for my part rather funny and it is naturally something I invented! And in my opinion, this illustrates well something that gives its value to what I asked you to question yourselves about, namely, whether the two in the middle [on the board] are the same knot? [III-1 & III-2] Freud had no idea about the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real, but he had all the same a suspicion of them. The fact that I have been able to extract, with time no doubt and with patience, that I began with the Imaginary and, that after that, I had to chew on this business of the Symbolic, with this whole reference, this linguistic reference in which I effectively did not find in short everything that would have suited me, and then, this famous Real that I end up by presenting to you in the very form of the knot.

There is in Freud a reference to something that he considers to be Real. It is not what people believe. It is not the Realitätsprinzip, because it is too obvious that this Realitätsprinzip is a matter of saying, namely, social. But let us suppose that he had the suspicion simply, that he did not say to himself that this could make a knot. In short, Freud, contrary to a prodigious number of people, from Plato to Tolstoi, Freud was not a Lacanian. I have to say it, but to slip this banana skin under his foot, in short, is that not so, of the R.S.I., of the Real, the Symbolic and the Imaginary, let us try to see how he effectively disentangled himself from it.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

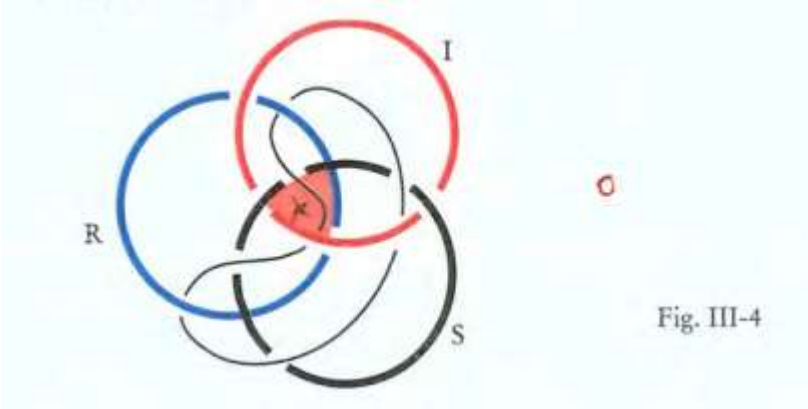

Fig. III-4

(52) These here [on the board] do not hold up, huh! [III-4] I am pointing out to you, they are placed on top of one another, the Real is there, the Imaginary there and the Symbolic is there, just like in the earlier schema. Ah! What did Freud do? Ah! I am going to tell you. He made the knot of four with these three, these three which I suppose to be a banana skin under his feet. But then, here is how he proceeded; he invented something that he calls psychical reality. I should have put the third knot here, the third field of ek-sistence, namely, the enjoyment of the Other. Since these two figures, since they are figures, are the same, you see that it is from a line that is found to cross, to cross these fields which are designated as ek-sistence of something around consistency, to cross these fields, namely, here to be in the enjoyment of the Other, then in the Imaginary, then in meaning, then from the hole of the Symbolic and by breaking through it, to be somewhere in an existence which is outside the Symbolic and the Real, that it returns towards this point which is none other than the one that I designate as the o-object. This is what can knot with a fourth term, the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real, in so far as Symbolic, Imaginary and Real are left

http://www.lacaninireland.com

independent, go with the drift in Freud. It is as such that he requires a psychical reality that knots these three consistencies.

I said, I said here or if it was not here it was elsewhere, it is in my Rome discourse, the last one that I gave, the one called La troisième, I said that if I had not done the Names-of-the-father written this time correctly, I would have stated a consistency such that it would have (53) explained for us a certain number of slippages in Freud. Freud needed not three, the minimum, but four consistencies for it to hold together, to suppose it being initiated into the consistency of the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real. What he calls psychical reality has perfectly well a name, it is what he calls the Oedipus complex. Without the Oedipus complex, nothing holds together, nothing of the idea that he has holds together, about the way in which the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real hold onto the cord. That by which, with time, I was determined to proceed, comes from the fact that I believe that, what Freud stated not, not I am saying about the Oedipus complex, is to be rejected, it is implicit.

And this is demonstrated and each one of the points can in itself be specified, it is implicit in that while having the same effect, but this time at a minimum, it is enough to make what was below pass above into these two points [III-5]. In other words, the Real must surmount, as I might say, the Symbolic in order for the Borromean knot to be produced.

Fig. III-5

This is what by having four terms, Freud himself was not able to do, but it is very precisely what is involved in analysis. It is to ensure that the Real, not reality in the Freudian sense, that the Real at two points,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

that I will name as such, that the Real at two points surmounts the Symbolic.

It is clear that the thing that I am stating here in this form has nothing to do with the surmounting in the Imaginary sense that the Real ought, as I might say, dominate. Because it is enough for you to go back to this little thing for you to note that in the opposite sense, of course, this does not work and one cannot see why the Borromean knot would be less real, if you turn the thing over. I am pointing out to you, I pointed it out to you already once in passing, that if you turn it over, it has exactly the same aspect, namely, that if you turn it over, it is not (54) with its mirror image that you have to deal, it is exactly the same laevogyratory thing that you have in the Borromean knot that you find at the back.

This to specify that it is not a matter, of course, of a change of order, of a change of plane between the Real and the Symbolic. It is simply that they are knotted differently. Being knotted differently is what constitutes the essential of the Oedipus complex, and it is very precisely what analysis itself operates on, namely, it is by going into the finesse of these fields of ek-sistence, that we will proceed this year.

It is rather late already, I am renouncing, as I might say, given the difficulty, the slowness of what I presented to you today, I abandon going any further, putting off to our next meeting which will take place in a week's time the rest of what I wanted to say to you today.

I can all the same mark something, which is that if ek-sistence is defined with respect to a certain consistency, if ek-sistence is when all is said and done only this outside which is not a not-inside, if this ek-sistence is in a way that around which there is elaborated a substance, if ek-sistence, as someone like Kierkegaard puts it forward to us, is essentially pathetic, it nevertheless remains that the notion of a break,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

that the notion of a hole, even in something as worn out as ek-sistence, preserves its meaning. That if I told you first that there is in the Symbolic a repressed, there is also in the Real something that makes a hole, and there is also something of it in the Imaginary, as Freud clearly saw, he niggled out everything that is involved in drives in the body as being centred around the passage from one orifice to an other.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 4: Tuesday 21 January 1975

Precisely because – can you hear or not? – of what I am talking to you about, the knot, I cannot have, I cannot be sure of having a plan, because the knot, if you see the way I draw it there, on the extreme right [IV-1], I will explain to you afterwards why it takes that form, let us say, of three pages. Let us imagine then stitched, [on the board] tied together here. Here then is the first, which is a piece of page, this to make myself understood, it seems to be self-evident, the second, is S which is just below and you see here the third that it is easy for you to imagine starting from this stitching on the left, it is necessary for the third to be palmed off (refile) on the first.

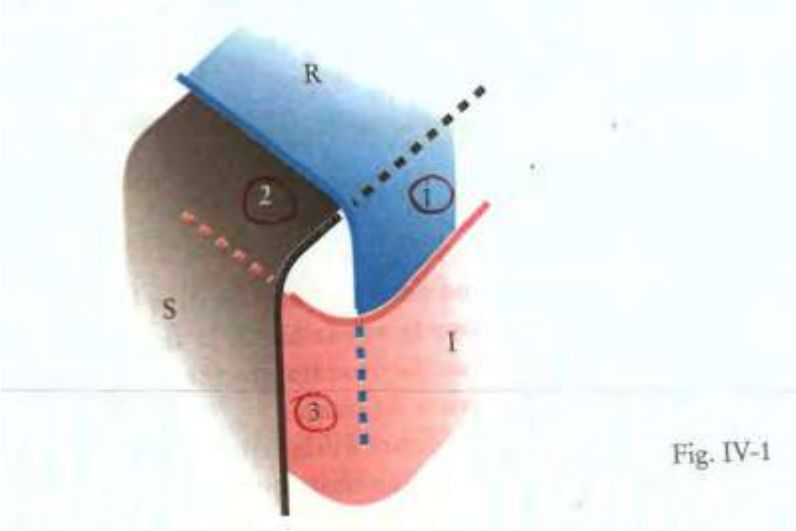

Fig. IV-1

(56) Nevertheless, there are places [on the board] where by perforating these pages, you will only find one of them. [Here] there are three of them. Here, you only find page 2, here only page 1, and here, only page 3. But everywhere else you will find the three, which prevents me from having a plan, since there are three of them.

There are several modes of stating the meaning, that all refer back to the Real that they correspond to. So that you will not get entangled all the same, I am marking the Real for you here [IV-2]. It is marked by the edge of a hole, the Imaginary, here and there the Symbolic, that is so that you can follow. All these meanings refer back to the Real, to the Real that each corresponds to. It is here that there is confirmed the suppleness of the knot, which also creates its necessity. The principle of the knot is that it does not come undone, unless it is broken. What is this unknotting of the knot, which is impossible? It is the return to a form described as trivial, and which is precisely that of the ring of string! So that it is a knot, it is a second degree knot, it is a knot that holds together, as you have already several times heard from my voice, it is a knot that holds together because it has three rings.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

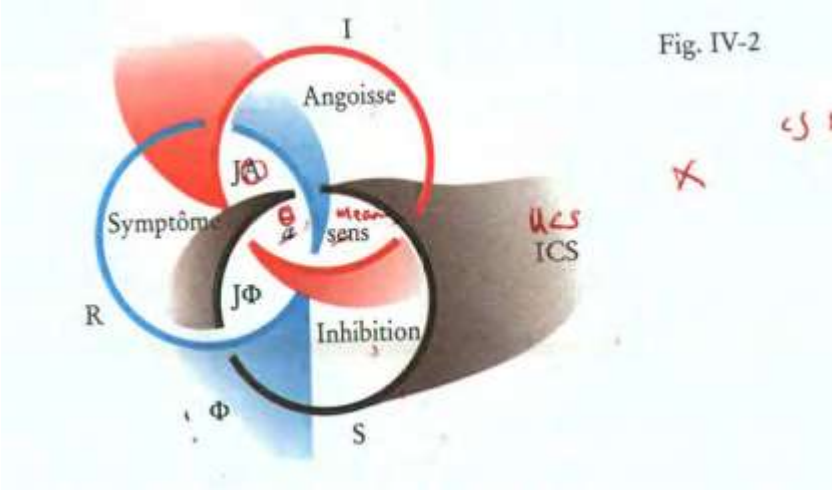

Fig. IV-2

The true knot, the knot with which we busy ourselves in the theory of knots, is that which, as you see here on figure IV-3, I have just added, is precisely what is not transformed by a continuous distortion into the trivial figure of the ring.

If one starts from a knot [IV-3] made with three trivial figures, namely, three rings, it is something that is designated or rather is (57) drawn from the following, it is that by cutting in this way something which is, as one might say, the Borromean knot itself, you will obtain by joining together what you have cut every time, you will obtain the proper figure of a knot in the proper sense of the word [IV-4].

http://www.lacaninireland.com

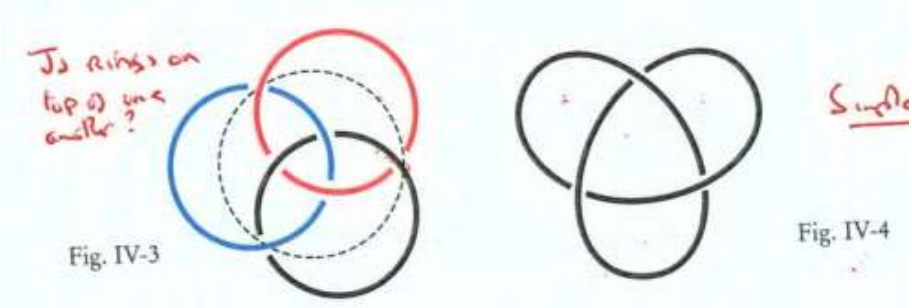

Fig. IV-3

Fig. IV-4

What is the most convenient way of showing that a knot is a knot? For this knot there, the one on the right, is the simplest knot that exists. You get it by simply making a ring of a cord and passing it for example over the right of the piece that you are holding. It is by making the cord re-enter by the left on the inside of the ring that you have thus formed, that you see there being made what is called a knot in a cord, a knot that you can unknot; but which can no longer be unknotted from when on? From the moment that you suppose that the two ends of the cord are rejoined by a splice or indeed that you suppose that this cord has no end, stretches to the thinkable limits or more exactly goes beyond even these limits. In which case, you will properly speaking be dealing with the most simple knot, this knot which, when you close it, has the form that you see there on the right, namely, what is called un noeud-trèfle, clover-leaf in English.

It is clover in that it is three. It outlines, flattened out it allows there to be drawn, not three fields, but four fields. These are fields that you rediscover in the form, the form of the Borromean knot, the one that is only made up of this: one of each figure that I called trivial, the ring of string, one of each of these figure makes from two others a knot, namely, that it is by being three that there is a link, knot-link that is constituted for the two others.

If you hear talk sometimes about a four dimensional world you will know that in this world, calculable but not imaginable, there could not be such knots. Impossible to knot a cord in it, if in fact this world exists, impossible to knot a cord in it because of the fact that every figure, whatever it may be, is supported not by a line but by a cord

http://www.lacaninireland.com

consistency, that every figure of this kind can be distorted into any other whatsoever.

Nevertheless, if the thing was imaginable for you, it would be possible to understand, namely, by hearsay, because moreover the demonstration of it is not simple, but is doable, the fact is that in a space that is supposed to be of four dimensions, it is not the consistencies of lines but of surfaces that can make a knot. Namely, that there subsist in the indefinite order, dimensions supposable as being more than three with which there is constituted, this indeed is where I must stop, with which there is constituted assuredly our world, namely, our representation. When I said world, should I not have said our real, on this single condition that it is seen that the world, here as representation, depends on the conjunction of these three consistencies that I name Symbolic, Imaginary and Real, the consistencies moreover being supposed to them. But that it is a matter of three consistencies and that every representation depends on them, is something that is well designed to suggest to us that there is more in the experience that necessitates, I would say, this trivision, this division into three, of diverse consistencies, that it is from that, without our being able to settle it, that it can be supposed that the consequence should be our representation of space as it is, namely, in three dimensions.

The question evoked, at this time of my statement, is something that responds to the notion of consistency: what can be supposed, since the term consistency presupposes that of demonstration, what can be supposed to be a demonstration in the Real? Nothing other supposes it than the consistency of which the cord is here the support. The cord here is, as I might say, the foundation of agreement (l'accord). To make a leap into that which, from what I am stating, will only be produced a small later, I would say that the cord thus becomes the symptom of the way in which the Symbolic consists. Which does not go badly after all with the fact that language bears witness to us that the formula to be threadbare (montrer la corde), by which there is (59) designated the wearing-out of a cloth, has its bearing, since when all is said and done to be threadbare, namely, that the weaving is no longer camouflaged in something where metaphorical use is so permanent, is no longer camouflaged in what is called – with the idea that in saying that, one is saying something – in what is called the material (l'étoffe). The material of something is what, as near as may be, will give the image of substance, and which moreover is usual in the use made of it. It is a matter in this formula of which I spoke, to be threadbare, of seeing that there is no material that is not woven.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I had prepared for you a paper, because it is too complicated to draw on the board, made a whole tissue, uniquely made up of Borromean knots. One could cover the surface of the blackboard with it. It is easy to see that one arrives at what I might call a hexagonal fabric. You must not believe nevertheless, that the section of any one of the rings of tissue, let us call them that here, will free anything whatsoever from what it is knotted to, since by only cutting a single one of them, the six other rings freed by one cut, held together moreover, held together by the six times three, eighteen other rings with which it is knotted in a Borromean way.

If I earlier produced prematurely, but it has to be done – it is even the law of language that something should come out before being able to be commented on – if I produced the term symptom, it is indeed because the Symbolic is what from consistency makes the simplest metaphor. Not that the circular figure is firstly a figure, namely imaginable. It is even there that the notion of the good form was founded. And this notion of the good form is indeed something that is designed, as I might say, to make re-enter into the Real what is involved in the Imaginary. And I would say more, there is a kinship of the good form with meaning, which should be noted. The order of meaning is configured, as one might say naturally from what this form of the circle designates. The consistency supposed to the Symbolic is in agreement with this image that is in a way primary and we had to wait for psychoanalysis to see that it is linked to the order of this body on which the Imaginary depends. For who doubts, it is even on this slender thread that there survived everything that is called philosophy down to today, who doubts that there is a different order than the one in which the body believes it moves around in? But this order of the body is not any more explained for all that.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Why does the eye see spherically while it is indisputably perceived as (60) a sphere, while the ear, you should note hears sphere just as much, even though it is presented in a different form that everyone knows is that of a snail? So then can we not at least question whether, if the two organs so manifestly diffeomorphic, if I can express myself in this way, perceive in the same way spherically, is it by taking things starting from my object described as small o that by a necessary conjunction which links the small o itself to make a ball of in fact of the small o under different forms. Except for the fact that it does not have a form, but it is thinkable in a dominant way, orally or moreover, as I might say shittily (chialement), the common factor of the small o, is to be linked to the orifices of the body. And what is the impact of the fact that the eye and the ear are also orifices on the fact that perception for both is spherical?

Without the small o, something is lacking in any possible theory of any reference, of any appearance of harmony, and this from the fact that the condition of the subject, the supposed subject, is to be only supposable, only knowing something by being himself, qua subject, caused by an object which is not what he knows, what he imagines he knows (connaitre), namely, which is not the Other of knowing as such, but that on the contrary, this object, the small o-object, removes this Other. The Other is thus, the Other that I write with a capital O, the Other is thus a matrix with a double entrance, of which the small o constitutes one of these entrances, and of which the other…what are we going to say about it? Is it the One of the signifier?

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Let us begin to question whether it is not thinkable there? I would say that it is even thanks to that, that I was able one day, if in fact that some of those who are here were there, to couple for you the One and my small o, that on that occasion, I had put it in relationship to the one by supposing it to be of the golden number. This was rather useful to me in introducing that which, that where I had already been led to by the experience, namely, that it can be read rather well there that between this One and this small o, there is strictly no rationally determinable relationship. The golden number, as you remember, is 1/o = 1 + o; from this there results that no proportion is ever graspable between the 1 and the o, that the difference between the 1 and the o will always be an o^2 and so on indefinitely, a power of o, namely, that there is never any reason for the overlapping of the one by the other to end, that the difference will be as small as it can be represented, that there is even a limit but that within this limit, there will never be a (61) conjunction, a copulation of any kind between 1 and o.

Does that mean that the One of meaning, for this is what the Symbolic has as a signifying effect, is something related to what I called the matrix, the matrix that removes the Other from its double entry. The One of meaning is not to be confused with what makes the One of the signifier. The One of meaning is being, being specified by the unconscious, in so far as it ek-sists, that it ek-sists at least to the body. For if there is one thing that is striking, it is that it ek-sists in the dis-body (dis-corps). There is nothing in the unconscious - if it is made as I have stated to you - that makes an agreement with the body. The unconscious is discordant. The unconscious is that which, by speaking, determines the subject as being, but being to be removed from this metonymy, by which I support desire, as forever impossible to say as such.

If I say that the small o is what causes desire, this means that it is not the object of it. It is not its direct or indirect complement, but simply

http://www.lacaninireland.com

this cause which, to play on the word as I did in my first discourse at Rome, this cause which always talks (cause). The subject is caused by an object that can only be noted by a writing, and that indeed is why a step is made in the theory. What is irreducible in this is not a language-effect, because the effect of language is pathein, it is the passion of the body. But from language there is inscribable, there can be noted in so far as language does not have an effect, this radical abstraction which is the object, the object that I designate, that I write with the figure of writing o and about which nothing is thinkable, except for the fact that everything that is subject, subject of thought that one believes to be Being, is determined by it. The One of meaning is so little involved here that what it is as an effect, effect [is made up of] from the One of the signifier. We know it and I am insisting on it, the One of the signifier only operates in fact by being able to be employed to designate any signified whatsoever.

The Imaginary and the Real are here knotted to this One of the signifier. What would we say about it if not that as regards their quality, what Charles Sanders-Peirce calls the firstness of what divides them up as different qualities, where put for example, how divide among them on this occasion something like life or indeed death? Who knows where to situate them, since moreover the signifier, the one of the signifier as such, causes just as muchl on one or the other of the aspects? One would be wrong to believe that from two, from the (62) Real and from the Imaginary, it is the Imaginary that is mortal and that it is the Real that is living. Only the ordinary of the use of a signifier can be said to be arbitrary. But where does this arbitrary come from, if not from a structured discourse!

Will I evoke here the title of a journal, Ornicar, that you see appearing at Vincennes, under my auspices. Is it not an example of what the signifier determines? Here it does so by being agrammatical, this by presenting only one category of grammar. But it is by this that it demonstrates the configuration as such, the one, as I might say, which with regard to Icarus only ornaments it. Language is only an ornure. There is only rhetoric, as Descartes underlines in rule X. Dialectic can only be supposed from the use of what goes astray towards a mathematically ordered ordinary, namely, towards a discourse, the one that associates, not the phoneme, even understood in the broadest sense, but the subject determined by Being, namely, by desire.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

What is the affect of ek-sisting, starting from my terms? It is to see, with regard to this field where I situate here the unconscious, namely, this interval between, as I might say, two consistencies, the one that is noted here by an edge that I made the edge of a page [IV-1] and the one that is buckled here [IV-2], is buckled, being buckled implying the hole without which there is no knot. What is the affect of existing? It concerns this field in which not just anything whatsoever is said, but where already the texture, the trellis of what I designated for you earlier by a double entry, of the crossing of the small o with what is defined as being from the signifier. What is it that makes ek-sistence from this unconscious? This is what I depicted here [IV-2] and what I underline just now as a support of the symptom.

What is it to say the symptom? It is the function of the symptom, a function to be understood as the mathematical formulation f(x) would do. What is this x? This is what can be expressed of the unconscious by a letter, in so far, that only in the letter is the identity of self to self isolated from every quality. From the unconscious every One, in so far as it sustains the signifier in which the unconscious consists, every One is capable of being written by a letter. No doubt, there needs to be a convention. But the strange thing is that this is what the symptom operates in an untamed way. What does not cease to be written in the symptom stems from that.

Not long ago someone, someone that I listen to in my practice – and nothing of what I tell you comes from anywhere other than from this (63) practice, this indeed is what constitutes the difficulty, the difficulty I have in transmitting it to you – someone with regard to the symptom articulated to me this something that would compare it to points of suspension.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The important thing is the reference to writing. The repetition of the symptom is this something that I have just said is writing in an untamed way, this for what is involved in the symptom as it is presented in my practice. That the term should have come from elsewhere, namely, from the symptom as Marx defined it in the social, takes nothing away from the well-foundedness of its employment, as I might say, in the private. That fact that the symptom in the social is defined by unreasonableness does not prevent it being signalled by all sorts of rationalisations as regards each one. All rationalisation comes from a particular rationale, namely, not of exception but of anyone whatsoever. Anyone whatsoever must be able to make an exception in order that the function of the exception may become a model. But the reciprocal is not true. The exception must not be found in just anyone to constitute, by this fact, a model. This is the ordinary state of affairs. Anyone at all who reaches the function of exception that the father has, we know with what result, that of his Verwerfung, or of his rejection, in most cases, through the filiation that the father generates with the psychotic results that I have exposed.

A father has only a right to respect, indeed to love, if the aforesaid, the aforesaid love, the aforesaid respect, is, you are not going to believe your ears, per-versely (père-versement) orientated, namely, made by a woman (fait d'une femme), the small o-object which causes her desire. But what this woman picks up in the small o, if I may express myself in this way, has nothing to do with the question! What she is occupied with, are the other o-objects who are the children with whom the father nevertheless intervenes, exceptionally in the right case, to maintain in repression, in the correct half-God (mi-Dieu) if you will allow me, the version of his perversion that is proper to him, the only guarantee of his function of father, which is the function, the function of the symptom that I wrote it there, as such. For that, it is enough that he should be a model of the function. That is what the father ought to be, in so far as he can only be an exception, he cannot be the model of the function except by realising its type. What matter if he has symptoms, if he adds to that something of the paternal perversion, namely, that the cause of it is a woman that he has acquired to give her children and, that whether he wants to or not he takes paternal care of (64) them. Normality is not the paternal virtue par excellence, but simply the proper mi-Dieu described just now. In other words the correct non-saying, naturally on condition that this non-saying should not be stitched up in white thread, namely, that one does not see right away in short what is at stake in what he does not say.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is rare! It is rare and it will renew the subject to say that it is rare that he succeeds in this correct mi-Dieu! It will renew the subject when I will have the time to take it up again for you. I said it simply in passing to you in an article on Schreber. Here there is nothing worse, there is nothing worse than the father who proclaims the law on everything, above all no father educator! But rather standing back from any magisterium.

I am going to end like that by talking to you about a woman. Well then, this indeed is all I did to avoid speaking about a woman, since I tell you that The woman does not ek-sist. Naturally all the journalists said that I had said that women did not exist! There are things like that that one cannot…le donne…that are expressed in short…things like that that one… They are not even, not even capable of noticing that to say The woman, is not the same thing as to say women, while they mouth on about the woman all the time, is that not so! The woman, is obviously something who can be perfectly, perfectly well outlined. All women, as they say, but I, I also say that women are not-all so then that creates a little objection, does it not! But The woman is, let us say that it is all the women, but then it is an empty set,

http://www.lacaninireland.com

because this set theory, is all the same something that allows a little bit of seriousness to be put into the use of this term all.

Yeah! A woman first of all, the question is only posed for the other, namely, of the one for whom there is a set definable by this thing that is written on the board. It is not J(φ), it is not phallic enjoyment, it is that, $\overline{\Phi}$; $\overline{\Phi}$ ek-sists, $\overline{\Phi}$ is the phallus. What is the phallus? Well then, since of course people drag out... hum! anyway I am the one who drags things out... who drags along the whole convoy. So then I will not tell you today what the phallus is.

In short, all the same, you can have all the same a little suspicion about it. If phallic enjoyment is there, it must be that the phallus must be something else, huh? So then, the phallus, what is it? In short, I am asking you the question because I cannot go into it today for very (65) long. It is enjoyment without the organ, or the organ without enjoyment? In short, it is in this form that I am asking you to give meaning, alas, to this figure.

Anyway! I am going to skip this step. For the one encumbered with a phallus, what is a woman? It is a symptom. It is a symptom and that can be seen, that can be seen from the structure there that I am in the process of explaining to you. It is clear that if there is no enjoyment of the Other as such, namely, if there is no guarantee that can be met in the enjoyment of the body of the Other which ensures that to enjoy the Other as such exists, here is the most manifest example of the hole, of what is only supported from the small o-object itself, but by misunderstanding, by confusion. A woman, no more than a man, is not an o-object. She has her own, that I mentioned earlier, that she occupies herself with, that has nothing to do with the one by whom she is supported in some desire or other. To make this a woman a symptom is all the same to situate her in this articulation to the point where phallic enjoyment as such is moreover her affair. Contrary to what is said, the woman has to undergo castration neither more nor less than the man. She is, with regard to what is involved in her

http://www.lacaninireland.com

function of symptom all together at the same point as her man. It must simply be said how, for her, this ek-sistence, this ek-sistence of the real that is the phallus I mentioned earlier, the one on which I left you with your tongue hanging out, it's a matter of knowing what corresponds to it for her. You must not imagine that it is the little yoke that Freud talks about! It has nothing to do with that.

These points of suspension of the symptom are in fact questioning points, as I might say, in the non-relationship. I would like all the same to open up what I am introducing here to show you from what angle this definition of the symptom is justified. What is striking in the symptom, in this something which gives a little peck to the unconscious, is that it is believed. There are so few sexual relationships that I recommend for that the reading of something which is a very beautiful novel Ondine. Ondine manifests what is at stake. A woman in the life of a man is something he believes in, he believes that there is one, sometimes two or three, and what moreover is interesting here is that he can only believe in one. He thinks that there is a species, in the style of sylphs or water sprites (ondins). (66) What is it to believe in sylphs or water sprites? I point out to you that one says believe in (croire à) in this case. And even that the French tongue adds to it this reinforcement of what is not believe in, but believe in it (croire y), believe there. What does believing in it mean? Believing in it only strictly means as follows: it can only mean, semantically, believing in beings in so far as they can say something. I would ask you to find me an exception for this definition. If they are beings who can say nothing, say properly speaking, namely state what is distinguished as truth or as lie, it means nothing. Only that, the fragility of this believing in it to which manifestly there is reduced the fact of non-relationship so tangibly cross-checked everywhere, I mean that it crosschecks. There is no doubt that whoever comes to present us with a symptom believes in it. What does that mean? If he asks our help, our aid, it is because he believes the symptom is capable of saying something, that it must only be deciphered. It is the same for what is involved in a woman, except for this, which happens, but which is not obvious, the fact is that one believes that she effectively says something, it is there that you come a cropper. To believe in it, one believes her. One believes what she says. This is what is called love. And that is why it is a feeling that I described on occasion as comic. It is the well known comic, the comic of psychosis. That is why we are usually told that love is a madness. The difference is nevertheless manifest between believing 'in', a symptom, or believing 'it'. This is what makes the difference between neurosis and psychosis. In psychosis, the voices, it's all there, they believe in them. Not only do they believe in them, but they believe them. Now it is all there, in this limit.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Believing her is, thank God, a widespread condition because, all the same, it provides company, you are no longer all alone. And that is why love is precious, eh!, rarely realised, as everyone knows only lasting for a time and all the same made up of the fact that it is essentially this breaking down of the wall where one can only give yourself a bump on the forehead, in short, that is at stake. If there is no sexual relationship, it is certain that love, love is classified according to a certain number of cases whose petals Stendhal has very well plucked, in short. There is the love of esteem, there is that in short. It is not at all incompatible with the love of passion, is that not so, nor with the love of taste; (l'amour-estime, -passion, -gout). But all the same it is the major love, it is the one which is founded on the (67) fact that one believes her, that one believes her because one has never had the proof that she is not absolutely authentic. But this believing her is all the same this something about which one is totally blinded, which acts as a stopper, as I might say, this is what I already said, to believing it, which is something that can be very seriously put in question. For to believe that there is one of them, God knows where that takes you, that takes you precisely towards believing that there is The, The which is altogether a fallacious belief. Nobody says the sylph or the water sprite. There is a water sprite or a sylph, there is a spirit. There are spirits, for some people. But all of this never gives anything except a plural. It is a matter of knowing what is its meaning. What meaning is there in believing it and whether there is not something altogether necessitated in the fact that, in order to believe in it, there is no better way than to believe her.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Voilà, it is ten to two. I introduced today something, I introduced something that I believe to be able, to be able to be of use to you. Because the business of points of suspension earlier, it was someone who said this to me about a connection, is that not so about what is involved in women, and my God, that fits so well that in the practice, is that not so to say that a woman is a symptom, as no one has ever done up to the present, I believed I should do so.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 5: Tuesday 11 February 1975

I was told that the last time people heard nothing. It was explained to me since that it is because tape recorders are being hung on the loudspeakers. So then I would be grateful to the people who are in the process precisely of hanging them to take them away, so that all the same the loudspeakers may be of some use. At the same time, I would like the people who might find themselves in the position of not hearing anything to make a sign to me, so that I do not trust the loudspeakers and try to raise my voice. Because it is obviously painful to hear the remark, since there are some people who come to see me, to hear the remark that perhaps indeed I said interesting things, the preceding day or the day before that, that they were there, but that they did not hear.

I am delighted that today all the same, because I chose to come on Mardi gras, that the doors are not too congested. This could be an opportunity for me, to confide something in you. I reported to you, reported because it was instructive for me, I reported to you the fact that I had been at Nice, that I had accepted any title whatsoever. In short, I would say that it was in virtue of any one whatsoever that I had accepted, this title, obviously a little shocking for me, of The Lacanian phenomenon. And then I had pointed out to you that, in sum, I had provoked it, but that this informed me about something, which is perhaps a presumption, that what I say, has meaning effects. It seems in measuring things that these effects are not immediate, but (70) with the time that I have put into it and also, it must be said, the perseverance, since when all is said and done, for me, at least, it took 20 years for me to notice them, I mean for me to record them, that it should appear to me that this has had effects and I told you how surprised I was. One never knows whether a surprise is good or bad, a surprise is a surprise, it is outside the field of the agreeable or the disagreeable, since after all what is called good or bad is agreeable or disagreeable. So then [when] a surprise is lucky, let us say, this signifies what is called an encounter, namely, when all is said and done something that comes to you from yourself. I hope that this happens to you from time to time. So then I was able to renew this surprise that I am calling lucky, rather than good or bad, by going since, since I left you until the first Tuesday of February, first, in short, the second, the one that I speak on, I made a little trip to Strasbourg where I was able to note without even being too surprised at it because it is the Strasbourg group that takes charge of it, that I had effects, meaning effects in Germany. I mean that, from the Germans that I met in the Strasbourg group, I obtained when all is said and done questions which gave me the lucky surprise that I spoke about just now.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I was less surprised than at Nice, given that it was the Strasbourg group that were taking care of it – not that no one was taking care of what I was saying at Nice! – but in short it happened, like that, that I was expecting less. It must be said that, in the interval, I cheered up a little, and that that was perhaps the reason that however lucky it was, the surprise was less at Strasbourg. I had a greater one, because, I have just spent a week, you'll never guess where? I have just spent a week in London. It is quite certain that neither the English, nor I will not say English psychoanalysts, I only know one who is English, and even then he is probably a Scot!…Lalangue, I think it is the English lalangue that creates an obstacle. That is not very promising, because the English lalangue is in the process of becoming universal, I mean, that it is making its way. Anyway, I cannot say that there are not people who strive to translate me into it. Those who read me, like that, from time to time, can get, can have an idea in short of how difficult it is to translate me into the English lalangue.

(71) One must all the same recognise things as they are. I am not the first to have noted this resistance of the English lalangue to the unconscious. I made remarks, like that, I allowed myself to write

http://www.lacaninireland.com

something that was well or less received which I am used to, something on returning from a journey to Japan where I believe I said for the Japanese something that is opposed to the play, and even to the handling to the unconscious as such in what I called at the time, in a little article that I wrote, that I brought out I no longer know where, I completely forget, that I called Lituraterre. I thought I saw, in a certain, let us say, duplicity, duplicity in the case of the Japanese lalangue, of pronunciation, I thought I saw there something that reduplicated by the system of writing which is also double, I believed I saw there a certain special difficulty, a special difficulty in operating on the plane of the unconscious, and precisely in something which ought to appear a help to it, if what is involved in the unconscious is localised at the locus of the Other and if I made the remark that there is no Other of the Other, namely, that what in my little schema depicting the Borromean knot (IV-2) is characterised by a special accentuation of the hole in what faces up, as I might say, in what faces up to the Symbolic and that I highlighted, I think the last time, by putting there, by putting there a J followed by a capital O, that I translated in short, that I tried to state as designating the enjoyment of the Other, not a subjective but an objective genitive. And I underlined that it is here that there is very especially situated something which, I believe, legitimately, healthily, corrects the notion that Freud has of Eros as a fusion, as a union.

I put the accent, in this connection, like that incidentally, more or less before having brought out this Borromean knot, I put the accent on the fact that it is very difficult to for two bodies to melt into one another. Not only is it very difficult but it is an obstacle of everyday experience and that if one finds its place well indicated in a schema, it is all the same of a nature to encourage us, concerning the value of what I am calling, here, a scheme (schème).

Today I must open up, open up the path to a certain number, I will not say of equivalences, but of correspondences. It is quite obvious that I have several times in my scribbling work, since it is with rough drawings that I prepare what I have to say to you here, encountered (72) these equivalences, and that I look twice at them before sharing them with you. I am rather prudent. I do not try to speak without rhyme or reason.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Good! Is there here, for example, anyone who knows, because I do not know whether François Wahl is there, is there someone here who knows whether Queen Victoria by Lytton Strachey – who is a well known, indeed celebrated author, I read at one time a little book translated, if I remember correctly, by Stock, about Elizabeth and the Count of Essex – is anyone here in a position to tell me, since there are people who are at Seuil, are there any of them here? I think that they would be able to tell me whether Lytton Strachey on Queen Victoria has been published in translation by Seuil. [In the audience]: 'In Seuil, no' – What's that? I can't hear properly. It has not been published? That really pisses me off. It really pisses me off, because I would have recommended you to read it. Yes that really pisses me off! Who was it that said that to me? Good, anyway, I'm very annoyed, because that could be found everywhere in the form of a Penguin book, but it is out of print so then I cannot recommend you to read it, but in short, all those who can get their hands on it, because there are all the same libraries and there are also second hand bookshops, all those who can lay their hands on this Queen Victoria by Lytton Strachey, I warmly invite them to read it, because on my return from England, that is to say last Saturday and Sunday, I could not put this book down. I could not put it down and that does not mean that I am going to talk to you about it today, because I must, to make something of it, in short, make it enter into my discourse I would have to titrate it, I would have to melt it down, I would have to wring it dry, I would have to squeeze the juice out of it, it is – I may well have taken pleasure in it – it is too tiring, and then I don't have the time.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Nevertheless, it could, it seems to me, show that there is perhaps more than one origin of this stupefying phenomenon of the discovery of the unconscious. If the 19th Century, it seems to me, had not been so astonishingly dominated by what I must really call the action of a woman, namely, Queen Victoria, well then, it would perhaps not have been realised the degree to which this kind of havoc was required in order that with it there should occur what I am calling in short an awakening. The awakening is one of my old refrains. It is a flash of (73) lightening. It is situated for me, in short when it happens to me, not often, it is situated for me, for me, that does not mean that that is how it is for everybody, it is situated for me at the moment when effectively I am emerging from sleep. I have at that moment a brief flash of lucidity, that does not last, of course, I enter like everyone else into this dream that is called reality, namely, into the discourses of which I form part, and among which I try to open up for you the path of analytic discourse. It is a very painful effort.

I believe that this book seems to me to make something tangible for you, in short tangible with a particular relief, the fact that love has nothing to do with the sexual relationship. And to confirm that this starts, not, I am going to say, from the woman, since precisely as regards this, I saw, I saw once again, in short it is a point on which even people who are most friendly to me, I mean those who believe they should pay homage to me vacillate and even come off the tracks, it must be said! If, if I say that The woman does not exist, there is obviously no way back, as I might say, but a woman, a woman among others, a woman well isolated in the English context by this kind of prodigious selection that has nothing to do with the discourse of the master, it is because there is an aristocracy that there is a discourse of the master. This aristocracy moreover does not have a lot to do with a local selection, as I might say. The true masters, are not those who are the, those who could be called worldly, in short nice people, people who are good company, people who know one another, in short, or who believe they know one another…The fate which ensured that a certain Albert of Saxe-Coborg fell into the hands of the Queen, he had no penchant, that is what is marvellous in short, this is what Lytton Strachey underlines, not the slightest penchant for women. But when one encounters a vagina dentata, if I can express myself thus, of the exceptional proportions of Queen Victoria, in short, a woman who is Queen, namely, what is really the best thing done in terms of vagina dentata! It is even an essential condition. In short, Semiramis must have had a vagina dentata, it is inevitable, it can be seen moreover when Degas makes a drawing of her. Elizabeth of England must also, in short, that can be seen for Essex. It had consequences… Why did it not have the same for him who is called, when they designed the museum that subsists to their memory the Victoria and Albert, because you do not say Victoria – and – you say Victor (ia) and Albert, why did the Albert in question not suffer the fate of Essex? It (74) is because he did not…it is not even sure that he did not undergo it, because he died very young. He died very young of what is called a natural death, but you will look very closely at that, I hope. You will look very closely at that, this seems to me the most marvellous thing there can be had as an announcement of this truth that I had found without it, in short, this truth of the sexual non-relationship.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It seems to me an altogether sensational illustration, and since all the same all of this happened very quickly, and in sum had gone through its principal episodes before the birth of Freud, it is not, it seems to me all the same not a reason for saying that if Freud had not emerged there, by some mysterious encounter of History, immediately after this exercise of what women have, I do not know if it is a power – people are very, very fascinated by notions, categories like that, power, knowledge, all that. They are silly notions in fact, silly notions which leave the whole place to women, and I did not say The woman, to the women who are not concerned with it, but whose power goes immeasurably beyond all the categories. Good, in short, God rest the soul of r–and Albert! It is certain that what I am saying does not quite go in the direction, despite everything, of what women can, nor take their chance, if one can call that a chance in a kind of integration into the categories of the man. I mean, neither power, nor knowledge, in fact they know about them, they know so much more about them, in short, is that not so, from the very fact of being a woman that it is to this indeed that I take off my hat. And the only thing that astonishes me, is not so much as I said like that on occasion, that they know better how to treat the unconscious, I am not too sure. Their category with respect to the unconscious is very obviously of a greater force, they are less bogged down in it. They treat it with a savagery, indeed a liberty of approach which is quite gripping for example in the case of Melanie Klein. It is something that, like that, I leave to the meditation of each one and women analysts are certainly more at ease with respect to the unconscious. They busy themselves with it, they do not busy themselves with it, it must be said, without it being, without it being at the expense…it is perhaps here that the idea of merit is upset, that they lose something of their chance in it which, simply by being one among women is in a way without measure. If I (75) had, which obviously would never come into my head, if I had to localise somewhere the idea of liberty, it would obviously be in a woman that I would incarnate it. A woman, not obligatorily anyone whatsoever, because they are not-all and the anyone whatsoever slides towards the all.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Good, let us leave that to one side. Let us leave that to one side because it is a subject which, fundamentally, like Freud himself, I could say that I can make neither head nor tail of (J'y perds mon latin). Which is not a bad way of saying things. But in short, if you get your hands on it, I had the good luck that a person who is one of those who had invited me there, I mean to London, that a person gave me this out of print thing, in short, his own copy in a word, and I think it is a read that no one here should miss if he has a little something, a little touch, a little vibration with respect to what I am saying. Good…

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is obviously quite extraordinary, I am passing onto another subject, quite extraordinary to see that the art, the very art that has treated subjects that are called geometrical in the name of the fact that a prohibition is brought to bear by a certain religion on human representation, that even Arab art then, to call it by its name, makes the friezes but that among the friezes and these plaits that it involves, there is no Borromean knot. Even though the Borromean knot lends itself, lends itself to a quite flourishing richness of figures of which there is precisely no trace of in any art. It is something that in itself is very surprising. It is not easy, it is not easy to give an explanation for that, if not perhaps that if no one has sensed its importance this is all the same designed to give us this dimension that something was required that does not at all go without the requirement of the emergence of what I will call certain consistencies. It is precisely those I give to the Symbolic, to the Imaginary and to the Real. But it is by homogenising them that I give them this consistency, and to homogenise them is to restore them to the value of what commonly in short is considered as the lowest. One might well ask in the name of what? It is to give them a consistency in a word from the Imaginary. It is indeed in that that there is something to be corrected. The consistency of the Imaginary is strictly equivalent to that of the Symbolic, as to that of the Real. It is even by reason of the fact that they are knotted in this way, namely, in a way that puts them strictly in a relationship to one another, the one with respect to the two others, (76) in the same relationship; it is even here that an effort must be made which is of the order of a meaning effect, that is of the order of a meaning effect, I mean that analytic interpretation altogether implies a tipping over in the bearing of this meaning effect. It is certain that it is brought to bear, analytic interpretation is brought to bear in a way that goes much further than the word. The word is an object of elaboration for the analysand, but what the analyst says – for he says – what the analyst says has effects about which it is not nothing to say that transference plays a role in it, but, it is not nothing but it does not illuminate anything. It would be a matter of saying how the interpretation is brought to bear, and that it does not inevitably imply a stating. It is quite obvious that too many analysts have the habit of keeping their mouths shut, I dare to believe, I mean to shut up, not to open it, as they say, I am talking about the mouth. But I dare to believe that their silence is not simply the result of a bad habit but of a sufficient apprehension of the import of a silent saying. I dare to believe it, but I am not sure of it. From the moment we enter into this field, there is no proof. There is no proof, if not in the fact that an appropriate silence does not always succeed.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

What I am trying to do here – where, alas, I chatter, I chatter a lot – is all the same designed to change the perspective about what is involved in a meaning effect. I would say that this meaning effect consists in squeezing it, squeezing it but of course on condition that it is done in the right way, namely, squeezing it by a knot, and not just any one. I am very astonished at succeeding in substituting, I believe, this meaning effect as it makes a knot, and a knot in the right way, for what I would call what happens at a perfectly designatable point, designatable on the knot itself, something in which I do not believe I participate at all, if not at this precise point, and which is called the fascination effect. For, to tell the truth, it is what, it is on this cord that there slides, that there are brought to bear most of the effects of art, and it is the only criterion that can be found which separates it from what science, for its part, manages to co-ordinate. That indeed why that a man of letters, like I don't know, Valery, for example, is content with remaining on the fact that it is a matter of explaining, on fascination effects, whose analysis is all the same required.

The meaning effect required of analytic discourse is not Imaginary, it is not Symbolic either, it must be Real. And what I am occupied with (77) this year, is in trying to closely squeeze what the Real of a meaning effect may be. Because on the one hand, it is clear that we are used to this meaning effect being conveyed by words and not being without reflection, without Imaginary undulation. One could even say that even on my little schema [on the board] as I reproduced it for you the last time, as I am going to redo it no – get into the habit, is that not so, of drawing it like that, namely, not to do what is done, what is regularly done, in short the junction once one has started with this élan – the meaning effect is that, it is at the connection of the Symbolic and the Imaginary that I situated it. It does not in appearance have a relationship with this, namely, the circle consisting of the Real, in principle it only has a relationship of exteriority. I say in principle, because that is why it is there, flattened out. It is flattened out from this fact that we cannot think otherwise. We only think on the flat.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

It is enough to depict this Borromean knot [on the board] differently. You are going to see the trouble of course that this is going to give us, is that not so. You see already…Ah! That is what is marvellous, it's that…[he draws on the board],[V-1]. Let us take it like that. I could of course have taken it in any way whatsoever.

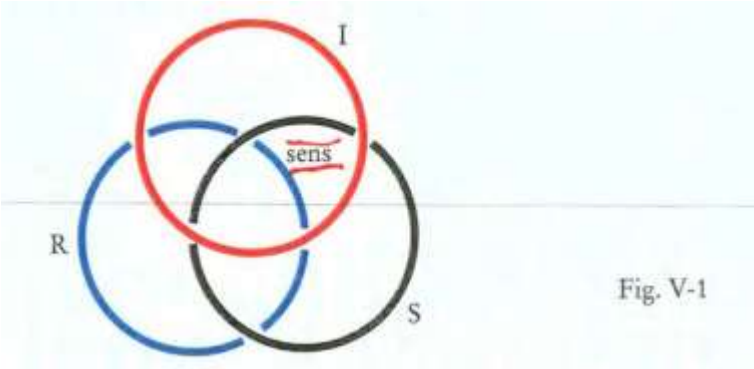

Fig. V-1

You clearly see that what is at stake is to make this knot Borromean, namely, that you clearly see the two that are depicted here separate easily from one another. There is not only one way and only one single way, because there is more than one to make this knot Borromean. This is what I am depicting to you with all the awkwardness which, I hope, will also be yours on this occasion. Because I want to show you that the difficulty is this. You see that by (78) the fact that the third buckle that I added passes, as I might say, across the two ears that allow to be distinguished the passage of this

http://www.lacaninireland.com

element of the knot to the inside of what I would call the hole of the third knot, it is in this measure that the knot holds together.

Do we have to stop there? Namely, to think that three consistent elements are enough, one of which makes a knot of the two others. There is already something that we posit with this knot, something which goes against the image described as concatenation. It is in so far as the discourse at stake does not constitute a chain, namely, that there is no reciprocity of the passage of one of these consistencies into the hole that the other offers it, namely, that one of the consistencies, in the common sense of the term, is not knotted to the other, I mean, does not make a chain, it is in this that there is specified the relationship of the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real. This is how the question is put first of knowing whether the meaning effect in its Real stems from the use of words, I am saying use in the usual sense of the term, or simply by there being uttered (leur jaculation), as I might say, it is the term that is used for what concerns words. From all time many things have made people think, but the distinction was not made in this use of the uttering. People believed that it was the words that were important. While if we give ourselves the trouble of isolating the character of the signifier we clearly see that uttering preserves a meaning, a meaning that can be isolated.

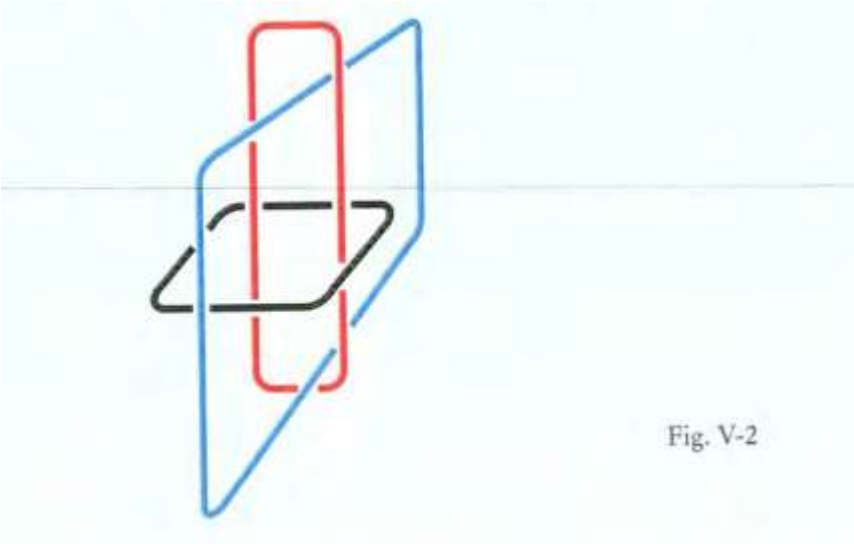

Fig. V-2

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Does that mean that it is here, in this that we should trust, for it to come about that the saying makes a knot? As distinct from the word which very often slips, allows there to slip, and that our intervention with regard to what the analysand is asked to provide, namely, as they say, everything that passes through his head, which does not for all that in any way imply that this only bla-blah, for behind precisely there is the unconscious. And it is because of the fact that there is the unconscious that already in what he says, there are things that make a knot, that there is already saying (du dire), if we specify the saying as being what makes a knot.

It is not enough to call this knot the Real - the Imaginary in this schema is not an imaginary ring. If the knot holds together, it is precisely because the Imaginary ought to be taken in it proper consistency and that, no doubt, since this schema is what presses us, at least through my mediation, the fact is that the use of the Symbolic is obviously not to be taken there, as everything indicates in the technique of analysis, in the common sense of the word. The Symbolic is not simply blah-blah. What they have in common is that. It is not the Real, that is the Real! The Real, is that there should be something that is common to them in their consistency. Now, this consistency resides simply in the fact of being able to make a knot. Is a mental knot real? That is the question. I agree that I am not making things easy for you today, but it is all the same to give you the answer immediately: there is the Real, the mental knot, there is the Real of ek-sistence. There is the Real of ek-sistence, as I write it from these equivalences which I told you earlier it was my goal to introduce today. I am speaking, I am speaking prudently about correspondence, I am speaking now about functions. And that is why I am putting forward the word equivalence.

It is rather curious, if we wish to give some support to what we are putting forward, that this precisely forces us not to put the Real in consistency. And consistency, to designate it by its name, I mean by its correspondence, consistency, I would say, is of the Imaginary order, which is demonstrated, which is demonstrated lengthily in all human history. And what ought to inspire in us a singular prudence, is that much of the consistency, all the consistency that already has been proved is pure imagination. I am bringing back the Imaginary here to its stress on meaning. Consistency for the parlêtre, for the (80) speaking-being, is what is fabricated and what is invented. On this occasion, it is the knot in so far as it is plaited. But precisely this is the last word on the business, as I might say. It is not in so far as it has been plaited that it ek-sists, even if I do not make a figure of my Borromean knot on the board, it ek-sists. For, once it is traced out, anyone can clearly see that it is impossible for it not to remain what it is in the Real, namely, a knot. And this indeed is why I believe I am putting forward something which may perhaps be useful to the analysts who are listening to me in their practice. It is that they should know that what they are plaiting, that what they are plaiting in terms of the Imaginary does not any the less ek-sist. That this ek-sistence is what corresponds to the Real. There is something, thank God, that has introduced us to this notion of ek-sistence, it is the use of the writing in connection with this something which, on this occasion, is called a variable, linked, designated by the letter x. There exists an x that can be brought into f(x), namely, into a function of x, whether this function is a function in the general sense of the term or simply an equation. In the case of an equation, it can happen that no root exists, as it is expressed, if an equation is always something equal to zero. It can happen that there is no root, that no root exists, and when it does not exist, that does not upset us, we make it exist, namely, that we invent the category of the imaginary root and what is more, that gives results.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Here lies the vacillating point by which one sees that the term imaginary does not mean pure imagination, since moreover, if we can bring it about that the Imaginary ek-sists, it is because another Real is at stake. I am saying that the meaning effect ek-sists, and that in this, it is Real. This is not apologetics, it is consistency, Imaginary consistency, no doubt, but it seems that there is a whole common domain of the Imaginary function that for its part lasts and holds together. I can only dialogue with someone that I have fabricated to understand me at the level at which I speak, and this indeed is why I am not only astonished that you are so numerous, but I cannot even believe that I fabricated each one of you to comprehend me. You should know simply that this is not what is at stake in analysis. It is simply a matter of accounting for what ek-sists as interpretation. The astonishing thing is that to work, as I might say, on these three functions, of the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real, I fabricated enough people at a distance who had only to open – when all is said (81) and done I cannot even believe that there was ever an Englishman who did more than that, to look a little bit or to open my books, when they know French, because it is not yet translated – and that all the same there is something that allowed them to respond to in it. What is meant by the fact that there ek-sists a construction whose consistency must not be imaginary? There is only a single condition which is quite readable, readable here on the blackboard, for that there must be a hole. And this is what brings us to what is called the topology of the torus which is the one by which for a long time I was, I cannot say altogether willingly, it was not one of these things that were so familiar to me, even though everyone knows well what a bangle is, simply what I note, is that mathematical topology, the one being entitled such and constituting the introduction of these relationships to the soft (mou), to the woolly (flou), as my dear friend Guilbaud expresses it, and with that to the knot, should be something, which, in mathematical theory, gives me so much trouble and will give you just as much, I must say, because I do not see how a theory of knots needs to pass through the function described as filters, for example, or to require the consideration of sets, the ones open, the others closed, when these terms of open and of closed take on an imaginary consistency no doubt, but a consistency quite different from the practice of knots.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

http://www.lacaninireland.com

The hole of which I speak, which seems to me ought to be put in the centre of this, which seems to me the point from which we can take off from this circular thinking, from this thinking that obligatorily flattens out, and which by that fact, simply by that fact, says that what is within it [V-3], is something other than what is outside, while it is

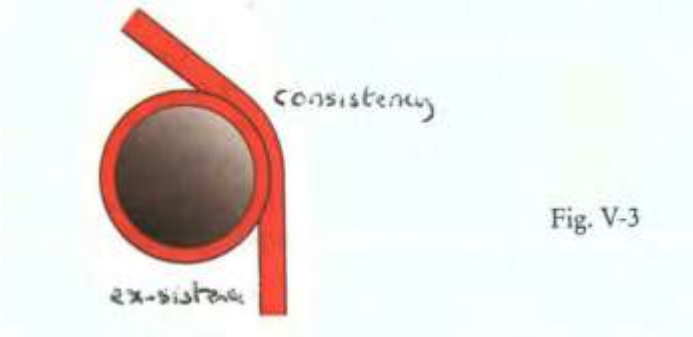

Fig. V-3

(82) enough to imagine it, to imagine it as consistent cord to clearly see that the inside that is at stake here and the outside, are exactly the same thing. There is only one inside, the one that we imagine as being the interior of the torus. But precisely, the introduction of the figure of the torus consists, in not taking account of this inside of the torus. This indeed is the relief and the importance of what is provided to us.

The last time, in connection with my knot, I made the remark and I even drew the figure of the fact that if we start from the requirement of making a Borromean knot not of three, but of four, we must suppose these three independent toruses [on the board] namely, to draw them like this [V-4, an error of Lacan's, taken up in the following session]: here is the one above, the one that is intermediary and the one that is beneath.

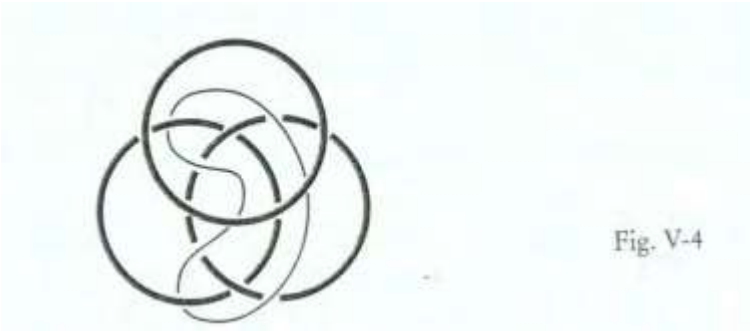

Fig. V-4

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I depicted for you the last time how, by a figure which is that of a fourth torus, these three depicted as independent can be knotted, can and must be knotted, and I even made an allusion to the fact, which is that in Freud, there is an elision of my reduction to the Imaginary, to the Symbolic and to the Real, and as being all three knotted with one another, and that what Freud establishes with his Name-of-the-Father, which is identical to psychical reality, to what he calls psychical reality, specifically to religious reality, for it is exactly the same thing, that it is thus by this function, by this function of the dream that Freud establishes the link of the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real.

Those who, I hope, were here the last time, preserved, I think, the notes, the outline, of the simply way in which here there can be traced out this torus [on the board] like, of course, here. I believe if I remember correctly…I could draw it, it is possible that I might make a (83) mistake, because it is not at all easy. Let us try like that, all the same this amuses me, it amuses me because each time one gets lost in it! Let's see, starting from this…Ah! What do we get from that? Yeah, this seems to have succeeded by good luck, namely, to hold together, namely, to reproduce what I gave you the last time.

But this is not what is important. What is important to me, is the following; this figure, this figure here, let us suppose it is my knot, namely,, as you see, here what I traced out the last time as third circle, as third cord, knots nothing. How can we make the drawing on this of what would knot these three?

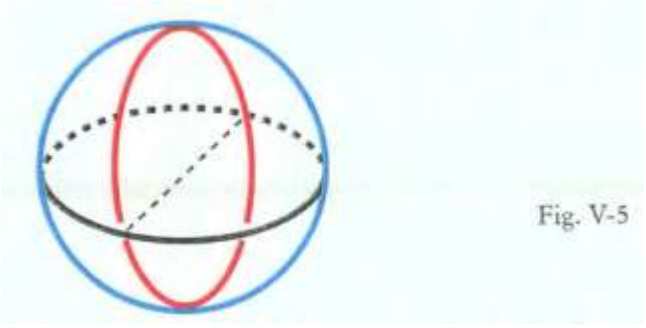

Fig. V-5

http://www.lacaninireland.com

I am going to present it to you in another way which is this one [V-5]. It is very easy to conceive of it, in the form that was materialised in a thousand and one ways throughout the ages, namely, astrolabes. It is very easy to conceive of three metallic circles here where we find our bearings much more easily, of course, since we are only able to make a geometry of solids. [On the board] Here is how I am going to represent them; suppose something which was very frequently produced throughout the ages, in naval instruments. I am going to draw it for you simply. Here is a circle seen head on. The equatorial circle that I am drawing for you now is seen flattened out, and that is why I pretended to draw it for you in perspective. Let us now make a third vertical circle and let us trace out this little dotted line to give you the notion of the way in which you ought to see it in perspective. It is a distinct way because it appeals, it appeals, without any hope moreover, to your sense of space, you who do not have one anymore than anybody else! You think you are seeing things in relief, but you do not even imagine in relief.

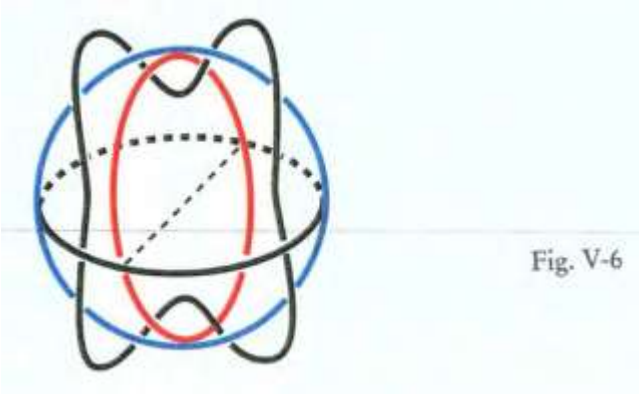

Fig. V-6

I would like here [V-6] to depict how there is conceived in space the outline of what I gave you earlier, what I posed as a problem to you earlier about what can unite these three, the disunited Imaginary, Symbolic and Real. If you proceed in this way, you will see that you have to trace out this line, this consistency; that it is necessary and sufficient that this should be, let us say, depicted for there to be a knot here, a knot of four, a knot starting from a disjunction conceived as originating the Symbolic the Imaginary and the Real. I would advise you to keep a note of it because it is of a rather fruitful nature to make

http://www.lacaninireland.com

you reflect on what is involved in this function of knot, namely, why, for example, this line that I isolated as pink [in black on the drawing] must pass twice for us in front and above of this circle the only flattened out one, and pass, be content to pass in short within the one which here occupies the second rank with regard to an idea that we could have of the outside, of the middle and of the inside, of depth. This is largely sufficient in effect and it is illustrative of the function of the knot.

I will posit, as I might say, this year the question of knowing whether, as regards what is involved, namely, the knotting of the Imaginary, of the Symbolic and of the Real, there is required in short this supplementary function of an extra torus, the one whose consistency is to be referred to the function described as that of the Father. It is indeed because these things have interested me for a long time, even though I had not yet at that time found this way of depicting them, that I began The Names-of-the-father. There are in effect many ways of illustrating the way in which Freud, as is obvious in his text, only makes the conjunction of the Symbolic, the Imaginary and the Real (85) hold up through the Names-of-the father. Is this indispensable? It is not because that would be indispensable and I am saying the contrary that it could always be shown to be false that it is in fact so, always!

It is certain that when I began to do the seminar on The Names-of-the-Father, and that I, as some people know, at least those who were there, that I put an end to, I had surely – it is not for nothing that I had called it The (Les) Names-of-the-Father and not The (Le) Name-of-the-Father! I had a certain number of ideas about the way in which the analytic domain, discourse, takes temporary support (suppléance) from Freud's putting forward of the Names-of-the-Father. It is not because this support is not indispensable that it does not take place. Our Imaginary, our Symbolic and our Real are perhaps for each one of us still in a state of sufficient dissociation for the Name-of-the-Father alone to be able to make the Borromean knot, and to hold all that together, to make a knot of the Symbolic, the Imaginary and of the Real. But you must not imagine that - it would indeed not be my usual tone – that I am in the process of prophesying that we can in any way do without the Name- of-the-Father in analysis and for that matter the Name-of-the- Father elsewhere, that we can in any way do without for our Symbolic, our Imaginary and our Real since it is the fate of all of you not to take off quite well each one in his own direction. It is certain, without our being able to say that this constitutes a progress, because it is hard to see how a further knot on one's back, on one's neck and elsewhere, it is hard to see how a knot, a knot reduced to its strictest would constitute a progress, from the simple fact that it is a minimum. It surely constitutes a progress in the Imaginary, namely, a progress in consistency. It is quite certain that in the present state of things, you are each and every one of you as inconsistent as your fathers, but it is precisely from the fact of being entirely dependent on them that you are in your present condition.

http://www.lacaninireland.com

http://www.lacaninireland.com

Seminar 6: Tuesday 18 February 1975

The last time, I bore witness to you about my experiences of wandering, and since I was disappointed that the Mardi-gras had not thinned out the fullness of this room, since I was disappointed about that, I allowed myself to slide into telling you what I think.

Nevertheless today for reasons that, I must say, are personal to me, because my work was a bit disturbed this week, I would like to take up the relay of what seemed to me to be required and which, after all, I can imagine, demanded some time. Today this time seems to me, I repeat, for simple personal reasons, the time might well have come – at least, I hope so – for some, some among you, to ask me, to ask me questions to which, I repeat, I would be happy at least to be able to answer to what I might seem in the present state of things to have an answer for.

I would really be very, very grateful to these people who certainly in the sense that I understand it, ek-sist, to these people if they would throw me the ball, as I might say; and to the person that will devote himself to it first, because after all, it is enough for one to decide, for others to be found who will open up the path. There you are! I am appealing to whoever would be willing to speak first, man or woman (le premier ou la première). I would really like to be asked a question. First of all that would give me the note of what might take hold. It seems to me that the last time already, in putting forward what I said about an effort made, to distinguish, not simply to distinguish, and I will show you when the occasion arises where that starts from…it starts from a flattening out of the knot. In the knot there must be distinguished the fact that it is very difficult to bring it (88) into mathematical theory, this to the point that, let us say, I have found nothing whatsoever that corresponds to this knot, to this knot which – I was led to it in short step by step – to the knot qua

http://www.lacaninireland.com

